PUBLISHERS' PREFACE.

The publishers believe, in issuing this volume, that they have not only equaled, but excelled all promises made at the outstart. Many writers have been employed on the work, and the best talent possible procured in the department of illustrations and the mechanical production of the book. While aid has been received from hundreds of citizens of the three counties, it may be fair (and not invidious) to mention several of those who were chiefly instrumental in assisting in the compilation of the work. First among these (as the leading historical authority and writer in the Delaware Valley) is Luke W. Brodhead, who has contributed much valuable material, for the most part of which he is given especial credit in the proper place.

In every one of the three counties the editor and assistants have had the courteous help of county and borough officials, of the press, of the clergy, and of many individuals who are not comprised in those professions.

In Wayne County, among others who contributed in written matter or orally to the work were Francis B. Penniman, E. A. Penniman, Dwight Reed, M.D., Henry Wilson, Esq., Rev. J. J. Doherty, Thomas J. Ham, editor of the Wayne County Herald, E. F. Torrey, writer of the history of the Honesdale National Bank, I. N. Foster; some articles—such as he had written and, in some instances, published—were purchased from Mr. John Torrey.

In Pike County the chief sources of information upon the larger matters of history were C. R. Biddis, John C. Westbrook and Hon. William F. Bross, ex-Lieutenant-Governor of Illinois, a resident for many years of Milford, and Colonel C. N. Pine.

In Monroe County especial thanks are due to Mr. Brodhead, heretofore mentioned, Dr. F. Knighton, A. V. Coolbaugh, Robert R. De Puy, Mrs. Jeannette Hollinshead, William S. Recs, Stephen Holmes, Esq., and Judge Samuel S. Dreher.

The editor of the history was Alfred Matthews, and his assistants, not especially named or accredited with their work elsewhere, were Marion Stuart Cann, of Scranton, Rhamanthus M. Stocker, Esq., of Honesdale, and E. O. Wagner, of New York.

HISTORY

COUNTIES OF WAYNE, PIKE AND MONROE,

IN THE

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

CHAPTER I.

The Aboriginal Inhabitants—The Delawares or Minsis—Their Chiefs—Indian Nomenclature.

ACTUAL knowledge of the Aboriginal people who inhabited the region from the lower waters of the North River to the Chesapeake, and the vast wilderness now comprised in the thickly populated, wealthy states of New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania, may be said to date from 1609, when, upon September 15th, Henry Hudson sailed, in his little ship the Half Moon, up the royal river which bears his name, and rode at anchor in the majestic tide just above the Highlands. The Indians whom he there met were the Lenni Lenape, who afterwards came to be commonly called the Delawares. Full of simple sublimity and lofty poetry was the conception these savages first formed of the strange white-faced men in dress, bearing and speech different from their own, who came in the winged canoe to their shores. In their astonishment they called out to one another, "Behold! the Gods are come to visit us!" They at first considered these hitherto unknown beings as messengers of peace sent to them from the abode of the Great Spirit, and welcomed and honored them with sacrificial feasts and with gifts. Hudson recorded that above the Highlands "they found a very loving people and very old men, and were well used." The Lenni Lenape handed down the tradition of their reception of the Dutch upon the Hudson and the island where it came about that New York was built, and always maintained that none of the enemy—the Iroquois, or Five Nations—were present, though they sent for their friends, the Mohicans, to participate in the joy of the occasion.

Hudson touched the extreme northern and eastern portion of the country occupied by the Lenape. The Iroquois, the other great branch of the Algonquin race, occupied the region of the upper Hudson, upon its west shore, and their villages sparsely dotted the wilderness northward to the St. Lawrence, and westward to the great lakes, but from the lower waters of the Hudson, southward and westward throughout the territory included in New Jersey and eastern Pennsylvania, the forest-covered hills and plains constituted the land of the Lenape, and their nation was centralized upon the river Delaware and its affluents.

The Lenni Lenape, as they called themselves or the Delawares[1] as they have been very

[1] The name 'Delaware,' which we give to these people is unknown in their own language * * they thought the whites had given it to them in derision but they were reconciled to it, on being told that it was the name of a great white chief, Lord de la Warre, which had been given to them and their river. As they are fond of being named after distinguished men, they were rather pleased, considering it as a compliment.—Heckewelder.

The Dutch called them Mahikandeos; the French, Abenakis.

commonly and erroneously denominated by many writers, claimed great antiquity and superiority over other aboriginal nations. Indeed the name Lenni Lenape signifies "the original people"—a race of human beings who are the same that they were in the beginning, unchanged and unmixed. They asserted that they had existed from the beginning of time, and many Indian nations, the Miamis, Wyandots, Shawanese and more than twenty other tribes or nations admitted their antiquity and called them "Grandfathers." Their own tradition of the advent of the nation upon the Delaware and the eastern sea-coast is poetical and interesting and not entirely unsupported by evidence, (which however it is beyond the scope of this work to adduce). The legend runs that a great many hundred years ago, their ancestors had dwelt in a far away country beyond the Father of Waters—the Mamæsi Sipu, or Mississippi—and near the wide sea, in which the sun sank every night. They had, very long before the white men came to their country, traveled eastward, seeking a fairer land, of which their prophets had told them, and as they neared the western shore of the great Mississippi they had met another mighty nation of men, of whose very existence they had been in ignorance. These people they say were the Mengwe or Iroquois, and this was the first meeting of these two nations, destined to remain in the east for centuries as neighbors and enemies. They journeyed on together, neither in warfare nor friendship, but presently they found that they must unite their forces against a common enemy. East of the Father of Waters they discovered a race called the Allegwi, occupying a vast domain, and not only stronger in number than themselves, but equally brave and more skilled in war. They had, indeed, fortified towns and numerous strongholds. The Allegwi permitted a part of the emigrating nations to pass the border of their country, and having thus caused a division of their antagonists, fell upon them with great fury to annihilate them. But the main body of the allied Mengwe and Lenape rallying from the first shock, made resistance with such desperate energy that they defeated the Allegwi, and sweeping them forward as the wind does the dry leaves of the forest, they invaded the country, and during a long and bloody war won victory after victory, until they had not only entirely vanquished, but well-nigh exterminated them. Their country, in which their earth fortifications remained the only reminder of the dispersed nation, was occupied by the victors. After this both the Mengwe and the Lenape ranged eastward, the former keeping to the northward, and the latter to the southward, until they reached respectively the Hudson and the Delaware, the latter of which they called the Lenape Wihitttuck. Upon its banks, and in the wild region watered by its tributaries, they found the land they had journeyed in quest of from the setting sun. Whether or not we believe as a whole this legend,[1] it is a fact that the two nations were located as described when the first accurate knowledge of them was obtained by the whites.

The Iroquois usually called the Five Nations, because consisting of the confederated tribes of the Mohawks, Senecas, Cayugas, Onondagas and Oneidas, becoming about 1712, by the incorporation of the refugee Southern tribe of Tuscaroras, the Six Nations—were almost constantly at war with their neighbors the Lenape or Delawares.

The Delawares were divided into nations in much the same manner as their northern enemies. Of these the most notable were the branches of the Turtle or Unamis, the Turkey or Unalachtgo, and the Wolf or Minsi (corrupted into Monsey). While the domain of the Delawares extended from the sea-coast between the Chesapeake and Long Island Sound back beyond the Susquehanna to the Alleghenies and northward to the hunting-grounds of the Iroquois, it seems not to have been regarded as the common country of the tribes, but to have been set apart for them in more or less distinctly-defined districts. The Unamis and Unalachtgo nations, subdivided into the tribes of Assunpinks, Matas, Chichequaas, Shackamaxons, Tatelows, Nantiocokes and many others, occupied the lower country toward the coast, while the more warlike tribe of the Minsi or Wolf, as Heckewelder informs us, "had chosen to live back of the other tribes, and formed a kind of a bulwark for their protection, watching the motions of the Mengwe, and being at hand to offer aid in case of a rupture with them."

[1] By many this tradition of the emigration of the Lenni Lenape is believed to have a solid foundation in fact, and the Allegwi are regarded as being the Mound-Builders, whose vast works are numerous along the Mississippi, the Ohio, and their tributaries.

"The Minsi," continues the authority from whom we have quoted, "extended their settlements from the Minisink, a place (on the Delaware, in Monroe County) named after them, where they had their council-seat and fire, quite up to the Hudson on the east, and to the west and south far beyond the Susquehanna; their northern boundaries were supposed originally to be the heads of the great rivers Susquehanna and Delaware, and their southern that ridge of hills known in New Jersey by the name of Muskanecum, and in Pennsylvania by those of Lehigh, Coghnewago, etc. Within this boundary were their principal settlements, and even as late as 1742 they had a town with a peach-orchard on the tract of land where Nazareth was afterwards built, another on the Lehigh, and others north of the Blue Ridge, besides many family settlements [1] here and there scattered."

Thus the Minsi tribe were the chief aboriginal occupants of the Delaware Country [2] and of the territory now included within the bounds of the three counties which are the especial province of this work, as well as of the country further south and on the east side of the river.

The Minsis were subdivided into clans, of which not all the names are known. There were the Manassings, the Wampings (who it is supposed were identical with the people who came in time to be called the "Esopus Indians" and who had their chief residence on the Hudson in the vicinity of the town of Esopus), the Cushietonks and others. These clans were sometimes known by other names and sometimes still further subdivided. A few families whose wigwams and cultivated grounds were in the vicinity of a stream or mountain took the name of such stream or mountain. Thus the titles of Lackawacksings, Navisings and Wawausings are occasionally found in old official documents.

The Lenape and the Iroquois confederacy, as has been before remarked, were almost constantly at war, with victory usually upon the side of the former, according to their claim. After the advent of the French in Canada, however, the Iroquois, finding that they could not withstand an enemy upon each side of them, shrewdly sought to placate the Lenape tribes, and, by the use of much skilful diplomacy, induced them to abandon arms and act as mediators between all the nations, to take up the peaceful pursuit of agriculture, and, by avoiding war, promote their own growth as a people, and at the same time exercise an influence toward the preservation of the entire Indian race. Into this trap, devised by the cunning Iroquois, they fell, and for a long period occupied, as they themselves expressed it, the position of women instead of men. The Five Nations, when opportunity presented itself, rewarded with treachery the confidence that the Lenape had reposed in them, and the latter, then resolving to unite their forces and by one great effort destroy their perfidious northern neighbors, again became men. This was before the era of the English in America had really begun, and the Lenape were diverted from their purpose by new and strange occurrences. The English came in great numbers to their coast. They received the new-comers kindly, as they had the Dutch, but in time the English, even the followers of Penn, turned from them and made friends with their enemy, the Iroquois, as the Dutch had done. They never ceased to revere the founder of Pennsylvania, Miquon, as they called him, but laid all of the subsequent wrong to mischievous people who got into power after their good brother had gone away, and who, not content with the land they had given them, contrived, they alleged, by every fraudulent means in their power, to rob them of all their possessions, and brought the hated Mengwe to humiliate them. They always maintained that they were insulted and treated in a degrading manner at treaties to which the English were parties, and particularly at that which took place at Philadelphia, in July, 1742, and at Easton, in November, 1756, when the Six Nations (they had become six by the incorporation of the Tuscaroras, about 1712) were publicly called upon to compel the Lenape to give up the land taken from them by the "Walking Purchase"[1] of 1737. But for this and other outrages they declared they would not have taken up the hatchet against the English in the so-called "French and Indian War" of 1755—1763. It is possible that they would have remained neutral, notwithstanding their grievances, had they not been incited to enmity by the Iroquois.

[1] Concerning some of these settlements, or Indian towns, facts are given in chapter II, drawn from the accounts of the Moravian missionaries.

[2] The Minsi, however, did not always have exclusive possession of the region of the Delaware or even the Minisink (which was so named because understood to be their domain). There were Shawanese upon the Delaware as early as 1698 or 1700, and not much later than the latter date they had passed northward through the Water Gap and make settlements in the Minisink region. The Shawanese were southern Indians, but had prior to 1700 been driven from their home by the Spaniards of Florida. They located on the lower waters of the Susquehanna, the Potomac and finally on the Delaware in the vicinity of Durham. As early as 1737 they were at Wyoming, under the protection of the Iroquois, who considered them excellent guards for that much prized locality.

After the close of the war, in 1763, the Lenape withdrew altogether from the proximity of the white settlements into the wilds of the Susquehanna country, and even the Christian Indians, who had been converted by the Moravians, removed to Wyalusing, a hundred miles from the pioneer settlers, north of the Blue Mountains, the government not feeling that they could be protected within the settlements. They did not long remain there, however, for the Iroquois sold the whole country to the English. Some of the Minsis or Munseys had gone before this to the head-waters of the Allegheny, and those of this tribe who were among the converts at Wyalusing joined them there. Subsequently the Lenape tribes were in Ohio, and a considerable number, chiefly of the Minsis, in Upper Canada, while others were upon the waters of the Wabash, in Indiana. Between the years 1780 and 1790 they began to emigrate from those regions to the territory west of the Mississippi. The remnant of the race thus—if their legend was true—retracing the steps of their ancestors made centuries before.

Of the chiefs of the Lenni Lenape, Tamanend, or Tammany was the most celebrated and illustrious in the whole history of the nation, and yet very little is known of him. He lives principally in tradition, and his name has been perpetuated by frequent application to civic societies among the people who supplanted his race. He lived in the middle of the seventeenth century.[2] In 1683 he, with a lesser chief, affixed their hieroglyphical signatures to a deed conveying to William Penn a tract of land in Bucks County, between the Pennypack and Neshaminy Creeks.[3] He is said to have lived somewhere in the territory now constituting the State of Delaware, and it is traditionally asserted that he also lived for a considerable period upon the west bank of the upper Delaware, in what is now Damascus township, Wayne County. The Connecticut settlers, the Skinners and others, who came there in 1757, and retained the Indian appelation of Cushutunk, as that of their settlement, also called the fertile bottom land "St. Tammany Flat," and in later years his name was applied in its canonized form to a local lodge of the Masonic fraternity. The traditional fame of Tamanend's virtue, wisdom and greatness, became so wide spread among the whites that he was established as St. Tammany, the Patron Saint of America. His name was printed in some old-time calendars and his festival celebrated on the 1st day of May every year. On that day a numerous society of his votaries walked together in procession through the streets of Philadelphia with bucktails adorning their hats, and proceeded to a "wigwam," in a rural locality, where they smoked the calumet of peace and indulged in festivity and mirth. The original Tammany Society in the United States was a Philadelphia organization of high repute, which had no other purpose than pleasure and quaint, but innocent, diversion. The later societies being devoted to partizan politics, have lost the charm which the old society possessed. It is interesting to note, however, that one of the most widely known political associations in the country bears the name of the great chief of the Lenni Lenape who was known, and whose sway was felt, even if he did not live upon the upper Delaware.

Of the character of Tamanend Heckewelder[1] says: "He was in the highest degree endowed with wisdom, virtue, prudence, charity, affability, meekness, hospitality, in short with every good and noble qualification that a human being may possess."

Teedyuscung, Tadeuskund or Tedeuskung, as his name is variously spelled, was foremost among the chiefs of the Lenape, who were well known to the whites, and he was the last ruler of his race on the soil which they longest inhabited—the region of the river whose name they bore. His name is a conspicuous one in colonial Pennsylvania annals, particularly those pertaining to the period of the French and Indian War.

According to his own statement, he was born about the year 1700, in New Jersey, east of Trenton. His father was an Indian of some note, known to the English as Old Captain Harris, and he was also the father of Captain John, of Nazareth, of young Captain Harris, of Tom, of Jo, and of Sam, Evans, named after men of repute among the early settlers of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These sons were feared by the whites who lived around them, for they exhibited resentment as they saw their hunting grounds converted into pastures and ploughed fields. They left the country with reluctance, and migrated northward and westward into Pennsylvania about 1730, passing beyond the white settlers and into the land of their kinsmen, the Minsis, for these Indians were of the Unalachtgo or Turkey tribe of the Lenape race.

All of his life, before he was raised to the station of chief, he passed within the territory of the Minsi—he was an Indian of the Delaware and had become a member of one of the Moravian Indian congregation in 1749, and was baptized in 1750.[2] It was not until 1754 that his nation raised him to the station of a chief and called upon him to assume military command of their fighting men in the impending inter-colonial conflict. A general council of the Lenape tribes was then held, which chose Teedyuscung grand sachem. He was then living at Gnadenhutten, on the Lehigh (in Carbon county), but immediately repaired to Wyoming. He had before been respected as an able counsellor of his nation, but now as "King of the Delawares," he was placed in an exceedingly precarious position. Whatever might have been his disposition towards the English, it was an impossible task to govern his exasperated people. Yet he did much towards lessening the cruelties of the Indians by keeping up an intercourse with the Governor of Pennsylvania, and occasionally drawing many of his people from the theatre of the war to meet the colonial authorities at Easton or Philadelphia. His frequent visits to the Governor and the Quakers, to whom he was much attached, because of their friendship to the Indians, excited much jealousy in his own nation, especially among the Minsis, who believed that he was carrying on some underhand work at Philadelphia detrimental to the nation at large. Whether this was in any measure true or not it is indisputable that Teedyuscung was not uniformly and consistently true, either to his own people or the whites. He fought against, as well as made treaties with the whites, never using his whole influence for peace, and he was at the same time accused by his followers with having made some secret arrangement with the English, whereby a benefit would accrue to himself alone.

The Iroquois or Six Nations were also very bitter against him, although, when he seemed to be promoting most actively the same interest, they were supporting that of the English, and herein lay the secret of the peculiar situation.

[1] "Manners and customs of the Indian nations."

[2] In the record of Moravian baptisms for 1750, Bishop Cammerhoff made an entry which (translated) reads "March 12 To-day I baptized Tatus Kuwit, the chief among Sinners."

The paramount object of Teedyuscung was beyond doubt, the recovery for the Lenni Lenape, of that dignity and power as a nation, which had been treacherously wrested from them by the Iroquois. For this purpose he sought for a time to effect an advantageous alliance with the British colonial government, and with the same object in view he, to a considerable measure, checked his people from making such indiscriminate warfare upon the whites as would arouse an overwhelming hatred, and make such overtures impossible. When he discovered that the realization of his fondest hope was impossible, that no one would examine into the controversy between the Lenape and the Iroquois, and that the latter were on the contrary supported in their unjust pretensions, he "slipt the leash and let loose the dogs of war." It was because the Iroquois recognized his strong and sincere purpose to build up his nation, and because they were jealous of the influence they feared he might obtain among the English, that they exhibited their bitterness towards him and plotted his destruction. In fact there is reason to believe that they compassed, or at least connived at his death. On April 19th, 1763 he was burned to death in his cabin at Wyoming, while asleep under the influence of liquor. A number of Indians were witnesses to the fact that the cabin was fired from the outside. Suspicion fell principally upon the Mingoes, some of whom were said to be concerned in bringing the fatal liquor to the place, which was instrumental to the design.

Thus died Teedyuscung, "King of the Delawares," the last sachem of his people east of the Alleghenies, after he had met with a large measure of success in uniting his people and recovering for them their lost power. At the time of his death he was the acknowledged ruler of no less than ten considerable tribes of the Lenape, and had forced the Iroquois to acknowledge them through him, as their peers.

No Indian of his time was more prominently identified with the colonial history of Pennsylvania. He appeared on the occasion of nearly all the important councils and treaties between the whites and the Delawares from 1742 to the time of his death, and in several of them assumed very important roles. He had much dignity and simple eloquence. In person he was "a portly, well-looking man, endowed with good natural sense, quick of comprehension and very ready in answering the questions put to him." He was ambitious and very desirous of respect and command, liked to have a retinue following him when he went to Philadelphia and to be considered as the king of his country. The doctrines of Christianity which Teedyuscung had learned among the Moravians prior to the Indian War, seemed to have made quite a deep impression upon him. As the head chief of his nation, he was compelled to resort to craft, subtlety, barbarity and bloodshed, and after his activity was over and shortly before he lost his life, he appeared greatly to deplore the career which had by circumstances been forced upon him. "As to externals," he said mournfully, "I possess everything in plenty; but riches are of no use to me, for I have a troubled conscience. I still remember well what it is to feel peace in the heart; but I have now lost all."

Among the minor chiefs of some local renown was Tatamy, from whom Tatamy's Gap, in the Blue Mountains, derived its name. He lived many years, about the middle of the eighteenth century, on the south side of the mountain, at this Gap, where he had a grant of upwards of two hundred acres of land confirmed to him by the Proprietaries' agents, about the year 1737, for valuable services rendered. Moses Tatamy, also called Tademe and Tattemi, was a convert to the teachings of John Brainard, the devoted Moravian missionary among the Indians, and who once visited them in the Delaware Valley. Tatamy acted as interpreter for Brainard. He attended most of the treaties held at Easton with the Indians, when Teedyuscung was chief of the Delawares, and acted as interpreter. Tatamy also made frequent visits to Bethlehem on various missions, and seems to have been treated with respectful consideration. In the account of the Moravian brethren with the commissioners, several entries similar to the following appear: "Nov. 18th 1756 victuals delivered Tattama ye Indian, who came from Easton, and hay and oats for his horse, by order of Mr. Horsfield. S. 2. d. 4."

At the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, the hostile Indians making frequent inroads upon the frontier settlements, a change of residence was deemed necessary to secure the personal safety of Tatamy. He was removed to Frenchtown, on the Delaware. There he was permitted to occupy a small tract of land, and there he yielded up his spirit, near the close of the Revolution.[1]

The language of the Lenni Lenape,—"the pure Castilian of the new world,"—in the opinion of several competent judges, is the most perfect of all the Indian tongues. It is distinguished by beauty, strength and flexibility. It has the power of compressing a whole sentence into a single word. This is done by taking the most important syllable of each word, and sometimes simply a single letter, combining them in slightly varying forms or with different terminations, the laws of euphony being observed, and thus forming a new word, expressing a variety of ideas. The language of the Minsi differed somewhat from that of the southern Delawares, but not sufficiently to be classed as a separate dialect. It was a little broader, more guttural and not quite so pleasant to the ear, and still it was never so harsh as some now commonly-accepted spellings would indicate. As an instance, it may be cited that the "k" which is the final letter of so many Lenape names, particularly of mountains, is not so truly indicative of the original Indian pronunciation as would be the softer "g." Nearly all of the Indian names, particularly those of the Lenape, are rich in rythmical euphony, and some which are exceptions have doubtless received their harshness through the imperfect rendering into English (or, in many cases, Dutch and German).

A small vocabulary of Lenape names applied to mountains, streams and localities in or near the field of which this work treats, and of others employed in the volume, together with their significance, is here appended.

Aquanshicola Creek, (Carbon County), emptying into the Lehigh from the northeast. Corrupted from Achquoanschicola, signifying where we fish with the bush-net.

Cushutunk (Wayne County).—The name given by the Indians to the valley of the Delaware in the vicinity of Damascus, Wayne County, Pa., and Cochecton, Sullivan County, N. Y. Cochecton is a corruption of the original Indian appellation. The name has been translated as the low lands; but from the termination "unk," it is presumable the term was originally applied to the hills bordering the valley. The name is spelled on old maps Cashieqtunk.

Delaware River.—This was called by the Delawares Lenape-wihittuck, i. e. the river of the Lenape. In the language of the Minsi Delawares it was Kit-hánne or Gicht-hánne, signifying the main stream in its region of country.

The Dutch, who were the first white people who sailed up that stream, named it in contradistinction from the North River, Zuydt or South River. It takes its present name from Lord de la Warre, Governor of Virginia, who passed the Capes in 1610.

Easton.—The name given by the Delawares to the site of Easton and afterwards to the town was Lechauwitank, i. e. the place at or within the forks.

Equinunk.—A creek emptying into the Delaware from the southwest, in the northern part of Wayne County. The word is Delaware, and signifies where articles of clothing were distributed.

Lackawannock (Lackawanna).—A stream emptying into the Susquehanna from the northeast, in Lackawanna (formerly Luzerne)

[1] It is erroneously stated by Heckewelder that Tatamy was killed at the Forks settlement, in Northampton County, by a white man, prior to 1754. This usually trustworthy writer has here confused the identity of father and son. It is true that William (or, as he was commonly called, Bill) Tatamy, a son of the old chieftain, was mortally wounded in July, 1757, by a young man (within the limits of Allen township), while straying from a band of Indians who were on their way from Fort Allen to Easton, to attend a treaty. He died from the effects of the gunshot wound, about five weeks later, near Bethlehem. The unprovoked assault greatly incensed the Indians.

County. Corrupted from Lechauwâh-hannek or Lechau-hánnek, signifying the forks of a stream.

LACKAWAXEN.—A branch of the Delaware in Wayne and Pike Counties, corrupted from Lechauwesink, signifying where the roads part, at the forks of the road.

LEHIGH RIVER.—Called by the Delawares Lechauwéki, Lechwicehink or Lechauweckink, signifying where there are forks. This name was given to the river because through it struck an Indian path or thoroughfare, coming from the lower parts of the Delaware country, which thoroughfare, on the left bank of the river, forked off into various trails, leading north and west. The word Lechauweckink was shortened to Lecha, the word still in use by the Germans, of which abbreviation Lehigh is a corruption.

MEECH-HÁNNE signified the main stream; a name applied to the largest of several affluent streams prior to their confluence. This was the name given by the Delawares to the main branch of the Lehigh, between Lackawanna and Monroe Counties, because it was larger than the Tobyhánna or Tunk-hánna.

MASGEEK-HÁNNE (Monroe County).—A name given by the Delawares to a run flowing through the swamp of the Broad Mountain.

MAUCH CHUNK.—Corrupted from machk-tschunk, signifying Bear mountain, or strictly where there is a mountain the resort of bears.

MINISINK.—Corrupted from Mins-ink or Minissink, signifying where there are Minsies,—the home or country of the Minsies.

POCONO.—A stream in Monroe County, emptying into McMichael's Creek, corrupted from Pocohánne, signifying a stream between mountains. Broad Mountain received the name Pocono from this creek.

POHOPOCO or Big Creek.—Emptying into the Lehigh from the north-east, in Carbon County, rising in Monroe, corrupted from Pochkapochka, signifying two mountains bearing down upon each other, with a stream intervening.

POHOQUALINE.—The original name of the Delaware Water Gap, which was called also at different times Pahaqualong and Pahaqualia, meaning a river passing between two mountains. Pahaquarra is a corruption of the original name.

POPONOMING.—A pond or small lake in Hamilton township, Monroe County, corrupted from Papennáminк, signifying where we are gazing.

SHOHOLA.—A stream emptying into the Delaware from the southwest in Pike County. Corrupted from Schawcihilla, signifying weak, faint, depressed. The township of Shohola, in Pike County, was named after this creek.

SHOHOKIN.—A stream emptying into the Delaware from the southwest, in Wayne County, corrupted from Schohácan, signifying glue. Schohacannik, where there is glue—where glue is made.

TOBYHANNA.—A stream of Monroe County, emptying into the Lehigh. Corrupted from Topi-hanne, signifying alder stream—a stream whose banks are fringed with alder.

TUNKHANNA, or Tunkhannock.—A branch of the Tobyhanna, Monroe County. Corrupted from Tank-hánne, the small stream. The smallest of two or more confluents of a river was always called tank-hánne by the Delawares.

WALPACK (New Jersey).—Corrupted from Wahlpeek, signifying a turn-hole or eddy in a stream—here meaning in the Delaware.

WALLENPAUPACK, or Paupack.—A branch of the Lackawaxen dividing Wayne and Pike Counties. Corrupted from Wolinkpapeek, signifying deep and dead water. By some authorities the name of this stream is said to mean swift and slow water, which better characterizes its alternating quiet pools and dashing falls and rapids than does the signification first given.

WYOMING.—Corrupted from M'cheuomi or M'chewcami, signifying extensive flats.

CHAPTER II.

Settlement of the Lower Minisink by the Dutch.

IT is requisite for a proper understanding of the early settlement of the Minisink that some preliminaries should be briefly recited and some explanations be made. First of all, let us define the meaning of Minisink and describe the territory to which the term has been and is still applied. The word is unquestionably derived from the name of the Lenape or Delaware tribe, the Minsi, the seat of whose residence was the region on both sides of the river Delaware, from a point below the famous Water Gap, nearly to its head waters. The significance of the name is: where there are Minsis, or the home of the Minsis. In its most comprehensive meaning, the Minisink was and is the Valley of the Delaware, from the Water Gap to Calicoon, N. Y.;[1] but in the more commonly accepted and accurate meaning, the term can only be considered as applying to the valley from the Gap to Port Jervis, or at furthest to the mouth of the Lackawaxen.[2] Under either of these definitions of its territory, the Minisink includes a narrow, irregular strip of territory following the meanderings of the Delaware, and embracing portions of the three States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York. Of the soil of the latter, it includes much less than of either of the other two; but it was within the New York Minisink that the first recorded visits of white men were made; it was there that the name was earliest applied, and it is there that the name has found securest and most permanent lodgment, in its application first to a great land patent, and afterwards to a township of Orange county—a matter to which we shall have occasion to revert.

Great antiquity has been claimed for the Dutch settlements in the Lower Pennsylvania Minisink, and many careless writers have boldly asserted as if it were a proven fact, that the Dutch were located upon the Delaware in what are now Monroe and Pike counties, not only before the coming of Penn in 1682, but prior to the settlement of the Swedes on the lower Delaware, and that this region was therefore the first in all Pennsylvania occupied by Europeans or white people. There is not a particle of absolute proof for such an assertion and yet there is considerable presumptive evidence tending towards the creation of an opinion, that the region in question, if not the first portion of the Province actually settled was among the first temporarily occupied by white men.

Resting the claim for the early settlement of the Pennsylvania Minisink and of Monroe County solely upon the well authenticated location of Nicholas Depui[3] upon the west side of the Delaware in 1727,[4] and the locality still maintains the distinction of priority of settlement over any other equidistant from Philadelphia. The site of Depui's settlement within the present county of Monroe is about seventy-five miles in an air line from the Pennsylvania metropolis. Now the segment of a circle swept by a seventy-five mile radius from Depui's on the Delaware, to the Southern boundary of the State with Philadelphia as a centre, will be found to pass almost exactly through the centre of Monroe, Carbon, Schuylkill and Lebanon counties; through the western part of Lancaster, crossing the Susquehanna near Columbia and passing Southward, nearly centrally, through York county. Outside of this quarter circle—to the northward and westward—it is believed there were few if any permanent settlements prior to Depui's. Thus Monroe county and the lower Minisink are justly entitled, on thoroughly attested facts, to hold a prominent place among the pioneer settlements of Pennsylvania.

As to the occupation of the Minisink for many years prior to the Depui settlement there can be no doubt—and yet as to the exact time that the first comers arrived in the region there exists no authoritative data. Whether any of the settlers who preceded Depui in the Minisink, as a whole, were located on the Pennsylvania side of the river is very doubtful. There is no weighty authority for the opinion that they did, and no ground for an assertion that

[1] The settlers at Cushutunk, in Damascus township, Wayne County, regarded themselves as within the Minisink country.

[2] The battle opposite the mouth of the Lackawaxen, between the forces of Brant and the whites, on July 22, 1779, has been commonly called "the Battle of the Minisink," indicating that the region was regarded as a part of the Minisink.

[3] See postea this chapter: also the Chapter on Smithfield township in the History of Monroe County.

[4] This date rather than 1725, is now regarded by Mr. Luke W. Brodhead as the proper one to be employed in fixing the time of Depui's location. There is no positive evidence that he was permanently located in the Pennsylvania Minisink prior to 1727, although he doubtless visited the site of his future home, in 1725, the year designated by many writers as that of his settlement. Mr. Brodhead has stated in his work upon the Delaware Water Gap, that he settled at Shawnee in 1725, but more recent investigation have convinced him that the later date is correct.

they did not; but even if it be admitted that some of the people on the Delaware before Depui's time had habitations on the Pennsylvania side, it cannot be claimed that they were more than mere transient dwellers here, or what would be called in more modern colloquial English, "Squatters."

The whole assumption—and it is a reasonable one—that the Dutch were in the Minisink many years before the first recorded permanent settlements were made, rests upon the existence of the old mines in Pahaquarry[1] township, Warren County, N. J., and the "old mine road" from Esopus, now Kingston on the Hudson, to the Delaware, in the vicinity of those mines, and upon a few isolated facts in Dutch Colonial history. And in this connection it may be added that, paradoxical as it may seem, the silence of history proves much concerning these traces of early occupation. The absence of any record of the work done here is the best proof of its antiquity.

Here was a road about one hundred miles in length, constructed with care and so well that it was still in a condition to be easily traveled when the English first obtained knowledge of the country, and here in the mountains of Pahaquarry, about half way between the Delaware Water Gap, and Walpack Bend were extensive openings, the remains of mines in which some enterprising people had sought and found copper.[2] The English had no knowledge of these works until long after they had been abandoned, and the few early records which remotely allude to them have all come from the Dutch.

The Hollanders who had found the Hudson in 1609, built a fort at Albany in 1614, and bought the Island of Manhattan in 1626 for sixty guilders, (twenty-four dollars) had dominion over the country as far west as the Delaware until it was wrested from them by the English in 1664. They had disputed the possession of the lower river with the Swedes and had exercised their usual energy in zealously seeking commerce throughout the region which they claimed, and were beyond, going in the middle of the seventeenth century, at least as far westward as the Susquehanna. That the mines on the Delaware were theirs, is an undeniable inference from the fact of their connection by the "mine road" with one of their chief settlements, Esopus. The work of making both road and mines was done in obedience to the prominent national characteristic of seeking wealth, and it is plain that works of so great an extent and importance must have had their inception many years before the Dutch overthrow, for of course all labor upon and use of them was abandoned after that event. There are some shreds of evidence to support this reasonable and almost universally accepted theory.

The Dutch were the first Europeans who had knowledge of the territory which is now Pennsylvania. Soon after they had established a trading-post at the site of Albany, in 1614, three of their men wandered out into the interior along the Mohawk River and crossed the dividing water-shed to Otsego Lake, the very head of the Susquehanna River. They came down this river, and by the Lackawanna and the Lehigh, passed over to the Delaware River, where, below the Trenton Falls, they were rescued from the Minsis, who held them in captivity, by Captain Hendricksen, who happened to be there exploring the bay and river. These three Hollanders were the first white men that ever set foot on Pennsylvania soil. It is possible that they may have given the first knowledge of the Minisink Country. In 1646, Andreas Huddle attempted to ascend the Delaware, above the Falls, but was stopped by the Indians. It is thought by Hazzard and several other students that he was trying to reach the mines in the Minisink, and that there was, at that time, a Dutch colony there.

[1] This name is corrupted from the original Indian name of the Delaware Water Gap "Pohoqualine," called also at different periods Pahaqualong and Pahaqualia, meaning a river passing between two mountains.

[2] Mr. Luke W. Brodhead says: "The mines appear to have been worked to a considerable extent. Two horizontal drifts of several hundred feet in length penetrate the side of the mountain, a few hundred feet above the river Delaware with several smaller openings adjacent.

A company was formed in 1847 for reworking these mines, at which time large trees were growing on the debris the Holland miners had removed.

The late George R. Graham, of Philadelphia, was at the head of the new organization and during the progress of the work in the summer of 1847 the place was visited by a party of editors, among whom was the late Horace Greeley.

In 1655, Van der Donk published a history in which he says: "Many of the Netherlanders have been far into the country, more than seventy or eighty leagues from the river and seashore. We frequently trade with Indians who come more than ten and twenty days' journey from the interior."

The most direct testimony about the mines, appears in the Albany Records under date of April 25, 1659,[1] where occurred this entry: "We lately saw a small piece of mineral which was such good and pure copper that we deemed it worth inquiring of one Kloes de Ruyter about, as we presume he must know if the fact is as stated. He asserted that there was a copper mine at the Minisink."

This, at least, fixes the fact that a mine was known, somewhere in the Minisink, as early as 1659, two centuries and a quarter ago, or sixty-eight years before the Depui settlement on the Pennsylvania side of the river.

Thomas Budd, in his account of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, published in London, 1684, says: "The Indians go up the Delaware in canoes from the Falls (Trenton) to the Indian town called Minnisink." He speaks of the exceeding rich open lands of the Minisink, but gained no reliable information of the first settlement of this region.

We now leave, for a time, the lower Minisink country, for the purpose of introducing a few facts chronologically in order, concerning the upper Minisink.

The first recorded visit to any part of the Minisink region was by Captain Arent Schuyler, in 1794. He was sent out by Governor Fletcher, who was ruler of the Province of New York under the crown of England, and the mission with which he was charged was to ascertain whether the Monsi Indians had been tampered with by the French; that is, whether the emissaries of the French in Canada had sought to enlist them with the Canadian tribes against the English. Schuyler penetrated the northern Minisink to or near the site of Port Jervis, N. Y., but in his journal he makes no allusion to settlers there or to any knowledge he might have obtained of settlers further south. The journal of his journey is given place here because it is the earliest record of a visit by a white man to the territory under consideration. It reads as follows:

"May it please your Excellency.

"In pursuance to your Excell: commands I have been in the Minissink Country of which I have kept the following journal: viz

"1694 ye 3rd of Feb. I departed from New Yorke for East New Jersey and came that night att Bergentown where I hired two men and a guide

"Ye 4th Sunday morning—I went from Bergen and travilled about Ten English miles beyond Haghkengsack to an Indian place called Peckwes.

"Ye 5th Monday—From Peckwes North and he west I meet about thirty-two miles, snowing and rainy weather.

"Ye 6th Tuesday—I continued my Journey to Magaghkamieck [Indian name for the Neversink] and from thence to within half a days journey of the Minissink.

"Ye 7th Wednesday—About eleven oclock I arrived at the Minissink and there I met with two of their sachems and severall other Indians of whome I enquired after some news, of the French or their Indians had sent for them or been in ye Minissink country.

"Upon which they answered that noe French nor any of the French Indians were nor had been in the Minissink country nor there abouts and did promise yt if ye French should happen to come or yt they heard of it that they will forthwith send a messenger and give yr Excellency notice thereof.

"Inquireing further about news they told me that six days a goe three Christians and two Shawans Indians who went about fifteen months a goe with Arnout Vielle into the Shawans country were passed by the Minissink going for Albany to fetch powder for Arnout and and his company; and further told them that sd Arnout intended to be there with Seaven hundred of ye sd Shawans Indians, loaden wth beaver and peltries att ye time ye Indian corn is about one foot high (which may be in the month of June)

"Arent Schuyler"

In 1696 Governor Fletcher granted authority to certain citizens of Ulster county to obtain deeds from the Indians for lands in the New York Minisink. The document reveals the names of several of the applicants whose descendants ultimately became settlers in the Pennsylvania Minisink (in Pike County) and is therefore of sufficient interest to warrant its insertion here. It reads as follows:

"By his Excellency the Governor in Council the ninth day of January, 1696.

"Whereas Jacob Ruthe, Jacob —— [2] Gerryt ——[2] Aaron Rose, Thomas Naseon, Johannes Westphalen,[3] Thomas Quick, Tennis Quick, Hendrick Janse, Cornelius Switz, Claas Westphalen,[3] Simeon Westphalen,[3] Hendryck Decker, Cornelius De——,[2] Jan Middaugh, Daniel Honaw, Cornelius Claas, Peter Jacobs, Dirck Vandebergh and Cornelius Christian, have made application unto me for license to purchase vacant unimproved land in the Minnisink Country called Great and Little Minnisink, for their encouragement. I have with advice and consent of the council granted and by these presents do grant full liberty to the aforesaid suppliants to purchase from native proprietors four thousand acres, that is for each two hundred acres, in order to their obtaining patents for the same. Provided that they shall make their purchase and return the Indian deed into the Secretary's office in the space of one year and day from and next after the date of these presents, for which this shall be to them a sufficient warrant."[4]

Dated as above, Benjamin Fletcher.

Here we find the earliest mention of several names since well known in Pike County, viz Quick,[5] Decker, and Westphalen (Westfall).

The precise date at which the upper and New York portion of the Minisink was settled cannot be fixed, but there is reason to believe that about 1690 one William Tietsort came to the Delaware and that he was the first settler on the western border of Orange County. He located at Maghaghkemek. In 1697 what was called the Minisink Patent was granted to Arent Schuyler. This was not the Minisink Patent usually alluded to under that name, but a kind of a floating patent of one thousand acres which included a tract of land on the run called by the Indians Minisink, and "before a certain Island called Menayak which is adjacent to or near to a certain tract of land called by the Indians Maghaghkemek." The Swartwout Patent was granted the same year to Thomas Swartwout, Jacob Caudebec, Bernardus Swartwout, Anthony Swartwout, Jan Tyse, Peter Guimar and David Jamison. Then the Chesekook, Waywayanda, and Minisink Patents were granted, respectivly in 1702, 1703 and 1704. The best authorities on the history of Ulster and Orange Counties make the earliest settlements upon and about the site of Port Jervis, (after Tietsorts) to have begun prior to 1700 and name Jacob Caudebec[6] and Peter Guimar,[6] as the first settlers. Some indeed have placed these men in the Minisink as early as 1690, but that is a palpable error for when the Swartwout Patent was granted (1697) Swartwout and Guimar were residents of New Paltz or of Esopus. The location of these settlements was known as the "Upper Neighborhood", being in the valley of the Neversink at Peenpack.[7]

A few years later, probably prior to 1710, a number of families came into what was subsequently called "the Lower Neighborhood" and located on either side of the Neversink, from what is now Huguenot, south to Port Jervis. These families came from Ulster County and were all Hollanders or of Holland descent, as indicated by their names: Cortright, Van Auken,

Westbrook, Decker, Kuykendal, Westfall and others. The settlements from Port Jervis southward were undoubtedly made about the same time as those above and by people connected not only by the ties of nationality but of consanguinity, for the same names as those given and others of Hollandish extraction are found in the records pertaining to the territory all along the New Jersey side of the Delaware to the Water Gap. A student of New Jersey history [1] places the movement southward at an earlier date than some other authorities, saying: "Just prior to the year 1700 many of the Low Dutch farmers from Ulster County, New York, together with fugitives from the States of Europe, principally from France, commenced the establishment of a chain of kindred settlements along the Mackockemack (Neversink) and Delaware Rivers extending from Ulster County on the north to the Delaware Water Gap at the south, and covering a stretch of territory about fifty miles in width and of variable width."

Substantiating this opinion there is documentary evidence. "The Precinct of Minisink" was laid off in what is now the northern part of Sussex county, New Jersey, in 1701. It extended along the river from Carpenter's Point to the lower end of Great Minisink Island and was the first municipal division or organization in old Sussex (now divided into Sussex and Warren counties). That region was then within the jurisdiction of New York, and the inhabitants voted for at least eight years with the people of Ulster County, and afterwards gave their votes in Orange County until the settlement of the boundary line controversy placed them within the jurisdiction of New Jersey. The establishment of a voting precinct in this region presupposes that there were a considerable number of voters in the region.

Edsall [2] is inclined to the opinion that these early settlers, concerning whom there are authentic data, were of the number who worked the Pahaquarry mines, prior to the period on which history sheds its first light, and presumptively before 1664. He says (speaking of the miners and builders of the Esopus Road): "The main body of these men are believed to have returned to their native land, yet a few undoubtedly remained and settled in the vicinity of their abandoned mines. In this county, (Sussex) we class the Depuis, Ryersons and probably the Westbrooks and Schoonmakers (Shoemakers) as among the descendants of those ancient immigrants." As a matter of fact this is possible; it is even probable, but it is by no means "undoubtedly" established.

The whole matter of the early settlement of the lower Minisink so far as it can be proven may be summed up together with two or three mere probabilities as follows: The region was certainly known to the Dutch soon after the middle of the Seventeenth Century. The mines were probably worked and the Esopus road built by some of the people prior to 1664; some of these early adventurers may have remained in the country and become permanent settlers; the actual, authenticated permanent settlement of the region, began in the northern or New York Minisink in the Neversink valley and the vicinity of Port Jervis, about 1697–1700, and extended rapidly southward in the valley of the Delaware to the Water Gap, confined for the most part for many years to the eastern, or New York and New Jersey side of the river; that the settlers were nearly all Holland Dutch, and that the original tide of immigration and the earliest waves of accession rolled from the same source and direction, from Ulster County and Esopus on the Hudson, from the northeast, by way of the Mine road and the valley of the Delaware. With this, and the statement that it is possible there were settlers in the Pennsylvania Minisink, prior to 1727, but that none can be proven earlier than Nicholas Depui's in the year mentioned,—we close a concise summary of what is known and what is simply problematical concerning the beginning of the Minisink settlement.

Having now related something of the early history of the upper Minisink and traced the general movement of population southward in the Delaware Valley, we will revert to the Depui settlement of 1727, made upon lands bought privately from the Indians[1] at Shawnee, in Smithfield township, Monroe County, then Bucks. It was here that was made the second recorded visit by a stranger to this miniature, wilderness surrounded, world, this peaceful Arcadia, practically almost as remote from the busy marts and centres of commerce of the New Continent, as if it had been located a thousand instead of one hundred miles from New York and Philadelphia. The visitor—or obtruder—was Nicholas Scull. The authorities of the Penn province only learned in 1729, that intruders had come upon their lands along the Delaware, and they sent Scull, a surveyor and trusted man of affairs, to investigate the facts. We have an account of this first appearance of a Pennsylvanian in the Minisink—which comes to us from a second, or rather third hand—in the narrative of Samuel Preston, the pioneer of Stockport on the upper Delaware, who himself visited the lower Minisink in 1787. The account which he gives of Scull's visit in 1730 he received from John Lukens, who as a lad accompanied Scull upon his tour, and doubtless talked with him about it in later years to refresh his boyhood memory. Mr. Preston's letters[2] have been often quoted and have been largely instrumental in misleading various careless writers and readers in regard to the antiquity of the Minisink settlement. They contain several manifest errors, and by no means if thoughtfully read, establish any solid ground for the claim of such extreme earliness as many historians make for the permanent settlement of the region—that is of an unbroken, consecutive occupancy of the country from a period antedating 1664. Nevertheless, they are full of interest and suggestiveness. Following is a copy of the letters:

"In 1787, the writer went on his first surveying tour into Northampton County. He was deputy under John Lukens, Surveyor General, and received from him, by way of instructions, the following narrative respecting the settlement of "Minisink" on the Delaware above the Kittany or Blue Mountains: that the settlement was founded a long time before it was known to the Government in Philadelphia. That when the Government was informed of the settlement, they passed a law in 1729 that any such purchase of the Indians should be void, and the purchasers be indicted for forcible entry and detainer, according to the laws of England. That in 1730 they appointed an agent to go and investigate the facts; and the agent so appointed was the famous surveyor, Nicholas Scull; and that he (John Lukens) was Scull's apprentice, to carry chains and learn surveying. That he accompanied Scull, and they both understood and could talk the Indian language. That they had great difficulty in leading their horses through the Water Gap to Meenesink Flats, which were all settled with Hollanders; with several they could only be understood in Indian.

"At the venerable Samuel Depuis' (an error: Nicholas Depui was the person meant, unless

[1] Depui probably knew nothing as to what Province he was in the jurisdiction of. He purchased in 1727, of the Minsi Delawares a large portion of the level land along the river, on which the town of Shawnee now stands and also the two large islands in the Delaware—"Shawano" and Manalamink, and received from the Indians a deed (for a copy of which see the Chapter on Smithfield township, Monroe County). In September, 1733, he purchased the same property, in all six hundred and forty-seven acres, from William Allen, a large land owner, who had bought from the Penns, and then first held legal title under the laws of the Province.

Concerning the purchase from the Indians, Sir William Johnson says (MSS. Sir William Johnson, XXIV. 14.): "An elderly man who lived in the Highlands, and at whose house I dined on my way from New York, some years ago, told me that he lived with or in the neighborhood of Depui and was present when the said Depui purchased the Minisink lands from the Indians: that when they were to sign the deed of sale he made them drunk and never paid them the money agreed upon. He heard the Indians frequently complain of the fraud and declare that they never would be easy until they had satisfaction for their lands."

There was certainly something irregular in the transaction, for the deed contains no consideration and was therefore void according to law, but that Depui was guilty of a positive or purposed injustice does not seem probable, for the Indians are known to have lived on terms of peace with him. Depui was a man of politic, as well as peaceful nature, and far too shrewd to have offended a people among whom he was living almost completely isolated from his own race.

[2] They were originally contributed to Hazard's Register, and dated Stockport, June 6th and 14th, 1828.

indeed the visit was at a much later date than is represented), they found great hospitality and plenty of the necessaries of life. John Lukens said that the first thing that struck his admiration was a grove of apple trees, of size far beyond any near Philadelphia. That N. Scull and himself examined the banks, and were fully of the opinion that all those flats had at some former age been a deep lake, before the river broke through the mountain, and that the best interpretation they could make of Minisink, was the water is gone.

"That S. Depuis told them that when the river was frozen he had a good road to Esopus from the Mine Holes, in the Mine Road, some hundred miles. That he took his wheat and cider there; and did not appear to have any idea where the river ran, of Philadelphia market or of being in the Government of Pennsylvania.

"They were of the opinion that the first settlements of Hollanders in Minisink were many years older than William Penn's charter; and as S. Depuis had treated them so well they concluded to make a survey of his property or claim, in order to befriend him if necessary. When they began to survey the Indians gathered around, and one old Indian laid his hand on Scull's shoulder and said, 'Put up iron string and go home.' They then quit and returned.

"I had it in charge, from John Lukens, to learn more particulars respecting the Mine road to Esopus, etc. I found Nicholas Depuis, Esq., son of Samuel, living in a spacious stone house in great plenty and affluence. The old Mine Holes were a few miles above, on the Jersey side of the river by the lower point of Pahaquarry Flat; that the Minisink settlement extended forty miles or more on both sides of the river. That he had well known the Mine Road to Esopus, and used, before he opened the boat-channel through Foul Rift, to drive on it, several times, every winter with loads of wheat and cider, as also did his neighbors, to purchase his salt and necessities, in Esopus,[1] having then no other market or knowledge where the river run to; that after a navigable channel was opened through Foul Rift they generally took to boating and most of the settlement turned their trade down stream, the mine road became less and less traveled.

"This interview with the amiable Nicholas Depui was in June, 1787. He then appeared about sixty years of age. I interrogated as to the particulars of what he knew, as to when and by whom the Mine road was made, and what was the ore they dug and hauled on it, what was the date and from whence or how came the first settlers of Minisink in such great numbers as to take up all the flats on both sides of the river for forty miles. He could only give traditionary accounts of what he had heard from older people, without date, in substance as follows:

"That in some former age there came a company of miners from Holland; supposed from the great labor expended in making that road, about one hundred miles, that they were very rich or great people, in working the two mines —one on the Delaware, where the mountain nearly approaches the lower point of Paaquarry Flat—the other at the north foot of the same mountain, near half way from the Delaware and Esopus. He ever understood that abundance of ore had been hauled on that road, but never could learn whether lead or silver; That the first settlers came from Holland to seek a place of quiet, being persecuted for their relig-

[1] The Mine road was repaired from time to time and served the settlers along its line through New Jersey and New York, as well as those of the lower Minisink, as an outlet to the market on the Hudson River. The road very early claimed the attention of the provincial authorities of New York. That some work of repairing had been done prior to 1734, and that further work was contemplated is indicated by the following extract from the records of the General Assembly of New York:

"General Assembly, Die Sabbati, May 11th, 1734.

"The petition of Jacobus Swartwout, William Provost, William Cool and others, freeholders and inhabitants, residing and living in Minisink, in the County of Orange and Ulster, was presented to the house, &c., setting forth that several persons in West Jersey and Pennsylvania having no other way to transport their produce than through the Minisink, and there was but about 40 miles more to repair before they come to Esopus, &c., that they be compelled to work on said road and assist in repairing it, to the house of Egbert Dewitt, in the town of Roche-ter in the County of Ulster.

"Resolved, That leave be given to bring in a bill according to the prayer of the Petition."

ion. I believe they were Armenians.[1] They followed the Mine road to the large flats on the Delaware; that smooth, cleared land suited their views; that they bona fide bought the improvements of the native Indians, most of whom then moved to the Susquehanna; that with such as remained there was peace until 1755. I then went to view the Paaquarry Mine holes. There appeared to have been a great abundance of labor done there at some former time, but the mouths of these holes were caved full and overgrown with bushes. I concluded to myself if there ever was a rich mine under that mountain it must be there yet, in close confinement. The other old men I conversed with gave their traditions similar to Nicholas Depui, and they all appeared to be grandsons of the first settlers, and very ignorant as to the dates and things relating to chronology.

"In the summer of 1789 I began to build on this place;[2] then came two venerable gentlemen on a surveying expedition. They were the late General James Clinton, the father of the late De Witt Clinton, and Christopher Tappan, Esq., Clerk and Recorder of Ulster County (N. Y.). For many years before they had both been surveyors under General Clinton's father, when he was Surveyor-General. In order to learn some history from gentlemen of their general knowledge, I accompanied them in the woods. They both well knew the mine holes, mine road, &c., and as there were no kind of documents or records thereof, united in the opinion that it was a work transacted while the State of New York belonged to the Government of Holland; that it fell to the English in 1664; and that the change of government stopped the mining business, and that road must have been made years before such digging could have been done. That it undoubtedly must have been the first good road of that extent made in any part of the United States."

[1] An evident confusion. The Depuis were French and did leave their country because of religious persecution, but the Holland Dutch, who formed the greater part of the early population of the Minisink, did not leave for such reason.

[2] Stockport, on the Delaware, Buckingham township, Wayne County.

The Van Campens settled about the same time as the Depuis, but five miles above them and on the Jersey side of the river. They did not come to the west shore until many years later. Just who followed the Depuis on the Pennsylvania side of the river can not now be told, but it seems probable that the stream may have been crossed at various places between Port Jervis and the Water Gap within a few years after 1727. Andrew Dingman, of Kinderhook, is known to have settled on the west side of the river, at "Dingman Choice" (Dingman's Ferry, in what is now Delaware township, Pike County) in 1735, and he had near neighbors very soon after that date, if not at once. Another important settlement the date of which is well authenticated was that of Daniel Brodhead, made in 1737, on Analoming creek (afterward called Brodheads), where East Stroudsburg now is. His settlement was called Dansbury, and became noted, during the Indian War beginning in 1755, and the family became one of the most prominent in the whole Minisink country.[1] Scull says that in 1730 there were settlements upon both sides of the river for a distance of more than forty miles, and yet his testimony on that point has little value for there is no reason to believe he ascended the valley above Depui's, and he mentions no names of people on either side of the river, although he speaks of "other old men"—all of whom, for anything he says to the contrary may have been upon the Jersey side. Smith in his History of New Jersey says that in 1756 the settlements were far more numerous on the east than on the west shore of the river. That the former was especially well peopled in what is now the northern part of Sussex County, New Jersey, as early as 1739, we have documentary proof. This region from the vicinity of Port Jervis down to a point about opposite the site of Milford was, as heretofore explained, constituted "the Minisink precinct" of Orange County, N. J. In 1739 the inhabitants of this precincts were taxed to assist in the building of the first county "goal" or jail of Goshen. The original tax warrant issued under the seals of the several justices of the peace of the county of Orange, among them being that of Anthony Westbrook,[1] of Minisink, is still in existence, and shows just who, in 1739, were the taxable inhabitants of that part of the Minisink. It will be noted that the names of very many are the same which are to be found in the records of a later period pertaining to the Pennsylvania side of the river. Following are the names as given in the return testified to by Johanes Westbrook:

As to the inhabitants of the Pennsylvania Minisink (in the region now included in Monroe and Pike Counties), there exists documentary proof that there were a considerable number as early as 1746. In that year was taken the first action of which there is any record, for the formation of Smithfield township, the first municipal division north of the Blue Mountains. The petition of the settlers for the setting off of a township in this region contains the names of twenty-seven persons, all doubtless landholders, and nearly all presumably the heads of families. Thus we know that, besides Nicholas Depui and the Brodheads, there were living here prior to the middle of the eighteenth century Christopher Denmark, Bernard Stroud, Piatro J. Westbrook, James Hyndshaw, Daniel and Aaron Depui, John Courtright, Rudolphus Schoonover, Beama Scoonmaker (Shoemaker), John Decker, Patt Ker, William McNab, Abram Clark, John Pierce, Robert Hannah, Samuel Vanaroun, Valentine Snyder, John Boss, Jonathan Gerenly, Isaac Tak, Joseph Savin, Richard Howell, Lambert Bush, John Riley, John Honog and Thomas Herson.[2]

The foregoing did not, by any means, include all of the taxable inhabitants. A petition, dated only two years later (1748), contains the additional names of Adam Snell, John Baker, Samuel Drake, John Teed, John Garlinghouse, Edward Halley, John McDowell, Samuel Holmes, Joshua Parker, Benjamin Teed, William Macknot, James Powell, Andrew Robinson, James Phillips, Elisha Johnson, Johnson Decker, Samuel Barber, Jonathan Barber, Benjamin Barber, James Carle, Aia Clark, David Teed, Daniel Roberts, John McMichel, John Hilliman, —— Seitz, —— Jennings, Edward Snell, Thomas Hill and John Brink.

A document of 1753 gives other names, viz.: Daniel Shoemaker, Daniel Zaner, Honre Zaner, Samuel Goodrich, Ephraim Culver, Joseph Soely, Edward Botts. None of these lists contain the names of the Van Campens, Quicks, Overfields, Bossarts, Dingmans, Van Vliets, Van Ettens, Van Akens and others, nearly all of whom are known to have been in the territory prior to the time of the circulation of the petition last cited. Some of them, however, lived so far distant (above the Bushkill) from the main body of the settlers, that their influence was not sought in aid of the measures which the petitioners advocated.

[1] Anthony Westbrook, of Minisink precinct, County of Orange and Province of New York," lived in what is now Montague, Sussex County, N. J., opposite the place where Milford, the county seat of Pike, was afterwards built, and he and Peter Lambartus Bouick, owned the Jersey flats adjoining and a large tract of country extending back upon the mountains. He was of the same family afterwards, and to this day numerous in Pike and Monroe Counties.

[2] These names are, for the most part, spelled as found in the original petition. See Smithfield township.

In 1752 when Northampton County was set off from Bucks, the township of Smithfield, which was supposed to include all of the settlements of the country north of the mountains, was accredited with a population of five hundred, the whole territory of the new county (including not only its present territory but all of Lehigh, Carbon, Monroe, Pike and Wayne and parts of Luzerne and Schuylkill), being estimated to contain a few less than six thousand people.[1]

By the year 1742 four churches had been built conjointly by the settlers in the New Jersey and Pennsylvania Minisink. Only one, of them was upon the Pennsylvania side, and that was located at Shawnee, two miles above Dupui's, in Smithfield. The others were the "Machakomach, near the site of Port Jervis, N. Y., the "Minisink" at Montague, and the third at Walpack. The movement toward their establishment began as early as 1737. The Rev. Johannes Casparus Freyenmoet was sent as a young man to Holland, to be educated for the ministry, and on his return took charge of all four churches in 1742.

The effect of the settlement of the territory now included in Northampton County (Bucks until 1752) must not be forgotten. That region was settled, though sparsely, before the first authenticated, permanent settlements were made in the Minisink. The current set in, slowly at first, but with constantly increasing volume, from Philadelphia and Bucks County, but the tide did not rise and flow over the mountains to mingle with the Dutch population in what is now Monroe County in appreciable strength until about 1780.

The population of that portion of northern Bucks, which became Northampton, was almost from the beginning a mixed one, containing Irish, Scotch-Irish, English and German bloods, all varying in customs, habits of thought and religious creed as they did in nationality. The faiths of the Presbyterian, the Lutheran, the Mennonite, the Dunker, the Schwenkfelder, the Reformer, and last but not least, the lowly Moravian, all flourished upon the soil of Northampton County before it came into organized existence as such.

In a report made to the Legislature about the time that Northampton County was erected it is asserted that as early as 1723 the settlements extended above Durham. John Apple, a German, is known to have located in what is now Lower Saucon, just below the Lehigh, in 1726. The first settlement, however, established in numbers sufficient to deserve the name, was that planted in 1728 within the present limits of Allen township (midway between Allentown and the Blue Mountains) by Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, among whom were Thomas Craig, William Craig, Neigal Gray, John Boyd, Hugh Wilson and Samuel Brown. Then followed, in 1730, a colony of the same element, led by Alexander Hunter, and consisting of about thirty families,—the Moodys, Brittons, Rays, Arrisons, Lyles, Moores and others. These located at three different points well up towards the Blue Mountains and the present boundary of Monroe County, in what afterwards became the township of Mount Bethel.

The Germans did not lag far behind the Scotch-Irish. They entered the county at its south part, coming from the region round about Philadelphia, and located on the south bank of the Lehigh. Among the first were George Hess, Adam Schaus (Shouse), Isaac Martens Ysselstein, (a relative of Daniel Brodhead, of Dansbury) and Conrad Reutschi, (a Swiss). The lands were placed regularly in the market in 1735, and they pushed rapidly northward to occupy them, reaching a point (now Lehigh township) near the mountains in 1736, and spreading soon afterwards eastward and westward.

A small but historically important element of population was added to, or rather imbedded in this heterogeneous mass of people, when the humble, unworldly, unselfish, devotedly benevolent Moravians[2] entered the region in 1741.

[1] For a further and detailed account of the settlements in the Minisink see chapters on Smithfield and other old townships in Monroe and Pike counties.

[2] The Moravians were so called because in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries Moravia, a province of the Austrian Empire, was a principal seat of their church. In the Early in that year seventeen of these people, led by Peter Bohler, bought four thousand, one hundred acres of land on that point on the Lehigh River where the Monockasy pours its tributary waters into that stream. By Christmas Eve of the same year they had built a house and a stable, and were entertaining Count Zinzendorf and his daughter, when the "blessed season" commemorated suggested the name Bethlehem as one appropriate to the settlement, and it was adopted. The first house was of logs, one story in height, with attic rooms. Other buildings were soon erected including a chapel for an Indian congregation worshipping at Nain, three miles distant. When, in 1765, the Indians left Nain, the chapel was removed to Bethlehem.

The Moravians immediately began a systematized and zealous missionary work among the Indians throughout Eastern Pennsylvania, ultimately extending it to Ohio and other fields. They occupied a peculiar position in the autonomy of Provincial Pennsylvania, exercised a potent influence in the affairs of state, and exerted a vast power for good in a number of public measures. Their rigid adherence to the system of keeping records has preserved an immense amount of valuable materials for the historian, and to the various works compiled from those records we are indebted for facts which appear on hundreds of pages in the present volume. Holding this fact in view, and also the very intimate relation between these people and various occurrences in the region of which we treat, we deem no apology necessary for the extended observations on the Moravians which are here and elsewhere introduced. The country immediately north of the Blue Mountains was in a historical sense as closely identified with Bethlehem and Nazareth as with the seat of justice—Easton—to which it was tributary, during the momentous latter half of the eighteenth century.

There were always existing intimate relations between the Moravians and the cis-montane inhabitants of Northampton, and when the horrors of Indian war were experienced by the latter, the settlements of the former became their refuge and asylum.

It was for the use of the Moravian missionaries that Daniel Brodhead built a little mission house upon his Dansbury lands (very near the west end of the iron bridge over the Analoming, or Brodhead's Creek, between Stroudsburg and East Stroudsburg), which was the second house of worship erected north of the mountains—the Shawnee Church heretofore alluded to being the first. Here Zinzendorf and other Moravian missionaries visited and preached—some of them before the chapel was built, for we are told it was not dedicated until May 19, 1753—and here was organized a little Moravian society, which, in 1747, according to the records of the sect,[1] consisted of the following "persons early part of the eighteenth century refugees from Moravia fled from that country into Saxony. The official name of this people is the United Brethren, and their archives show that they originated not only in Moravia, but also in Bohemia. As far back as the ninth century these two countries were converted to Christianity. A Protestant movement traceable from the beginning, or nearly so, resulted in the Bohemian Reformation, and the execution of John Huss.

This event took place in 1415, and in 1457 some of his followers founded the Church of the United Brethren, on the estate of Litiz, about one hundred miles east of Prague, on the confines of Silesia. The church numbered about two hundred thousand persons by the year 1517. It rapidly extended, and in 1557, its Polish parishes were constituted a distinct ecclesiastical province. In 1609 it was legally acknowledged as one of the churches of Bohemia and Moravia.

The church was subsequently crushed and had no visible organization, but in 1722 some of its survivors went into Saxony, where they began to build the town of Herrnhut, on the estate of Count Zinzendorf, who had offered them an asylum. He afterward became the leading Bishop of the revived church, and introduced on the continent of Europe, Great Britain, and in America, exclusively Moravian settlements.

The members undertook extensive missions in heathen lands, and work among members of State churches in Europe which excluded proselytism. There are eighty thousand Moravian converts now in Europe who belong to other churches.

Exclusive settlements disappeared from this continent in 1856, fourteen years after that at Bethlehem was given up. What is known as the American Province of the church and the British and the German provinces form one organic whole throughout the world.

There are about seventeen thousand Moravians on this continent, including children, of whom about two thousand reside in Bethlehem.

attached to the Moravian Church," viz.: Daniel and Esther Brodhead, John Baker, John and Catharine Hillman, Joseph and Helen Haines, Edward and Catherine Holly, Francis and Rebecca Jones, William and Mary Clark, John and Hannah McMichael, Daniel Roberts, George and Mary Salathe—in all eighteen persons. The church was burned by the Indians in 1755, and the mission was abandoned. The Moravians had also at the same period missions at Walpack and Pawlin's Kill in the Jersey Minisink.

Some interesting glimpses of the condition of that part of Northampton County, now Monroe, during the period prior to the Indian war, and while the region was jointly occupied by people of the savage and civilized races, are afforded in the journals of the missionaries, who, in 1742, and subsequent years, toiled over the mountains, penetrated the almost unbroken forests, and visited the few squalid Indian villages and isolated settlements of the whites. Count Zinzendorf was the pioneer of these zealous men, who carried the Gospel into "the wilderness and the savage place." Of his three journeys through the region we give an account, which is principally from the pen of Luke W. Brodhead:

"Count Zinzendorf landed at New York on 2nd Dec., 1741; on the 10th he reached Philadelphia; on the 24th he visited the settlement in the Forks of the Delaware and named it Bethlehem, and then returned and preached for some time in Philadelphia and Germantown. On the 20th June following he again repaired to Bethlehem, and having organized the Brethren there into a congregation, completed arrangements for his contemplated visit to the Moravian Mission at Shecomeco, N. Y., and for his tour of exploration into the Indian country.

"On the 24th July, 1742, he set out on his visit to the Indians residing in the first main valley north of the Blue Mountain. He was accompanied by his daughter, the Countess Benigna (then in her seventeenth year), Anton Seyfert, Andrew Eschenback, Jacob Lischey, Henry Muller, William and Johanna Zander (most of whom were missionaries) and an Indian interpreter. Having visited Nazareth, they set out on the morning of the 26th; making a detour a few miles to the northeast, they crossed the Big Bushkill, then called Tatemy's Creek, and came to the 'reserve' of Moses Tatemy, who was farming in a small way on a grant of two hundred acres of land given him by the proprietaries' agents in consideration of services he had rendered as interpreter and messenger to the Indians. He received them well, was communicative, and in conversation gave an account of the mode of sacrifice practiced by his heathen brethren, which afforded Zander an opportunity of speaking to him of the great sacrifice of the Lamb of God, made for the remission of sins.

"Following the Indian path that led past Tatemy's house north into the Minisink, they came to Clistowackin, five miles above on Martin's Creek (one of Brainerd's missionary stations). In the lodge of an Indian medicine man lay his grand-child sick unto death. The Count prayed in behalf of the sufferer, commending him to the keeping of his Redeemer. Zander also spoke, and his words were interpreted to the villagers who had assembled about the lodge. Toward evening they reached a second village inhabited chiefly by Delawares. Having been overtaken by a shower, they gladly accepted the Captain's invitation to enter his hut, dry their clothes and pass the night with him.

"On the morning of the 27th they crossed the Blue Mountain at Tatemy's Gap. They were now in the Indian country, and what was justly the Indians' country, although white settlers were trespassing within its precincts. Keeping on to the northwest some ten (say twelve) miles, they struck the western terminus of the valley of the Pocopoco (Poch-co-poch-co), near what is now Brodheadsville. They turned down the stream, and came to a village on its banks. This had been the home of a well-known Delaware chief, old Captain Harris, father of Teedyuskung, King of the Delawares during their alienation from the English; and here Nicholas Scull and Benjamin Eastburn, surveyors, passed the night on the completion of the one and a half day's walk in September, 1737, which passed into history as the 'Walking Purchase.'

"The Brethren pitched their tent near the lodge of another medicine-man, and here they passed the night, and this was the extreme northern point of their journey. On the morning of the 28th they crossed Chestnut Hill mountain, and came down the narrow valley of the Aquanshicola to a Delaware town, called Miniolagomeka, signifying 'a tract of fertile land surrounded by barrens.' This town consisted of eleven huts and fifty-four inhabitants.

"The village of Miniolagomeka[1] lay in Smith's valley, eight miles west of the Wind Gap, on the north bank of the Aquanshicola, at the intersection of the old Wilkes Barre road, which crossed the mountain at Smith's Gap, in Eldred township, Monroe County. The village was visited many times between 1743 and 1754 by different missionaries from Bethlehem."[2] The second journey of Count Zinzendorf across this mountain path was in August, 1742, on his way to Shecomeco. "On the 11th of August, 1742, Count Zinzendorf, his daughter and Anton Seyfert left Nazareth for Shecomeco, by what might be called the overland route, leading almost due northeast one hundred and twenty-five miles to Kingston, on the Hudson.

"At that time there was no connection by road between Lower Smithfield, in Monroe County, and the comparatively populous part of the Province south of the Lehigh. The great highway from Philadelphia to the Forks terminated near Iron Hill, in Saucon township. All above this was new country. The Blue mountain was passable only with difficulty at three depressions or gaps in that part of its barrier-like extent which Zinzendorf and his companions would cross in their course to the Delaware: at the Wind Gap, at Fox Gap and at Tatemy's Gap, respectively twelve, five and two-and-a-half miles west of the Delaware Water Gap (which was then considered impassible). An old Indian trail, leading into the Minisink, passed over the mountain through Tatemy's Gap. Crossing the Wind Gap (even as late as 1750) was a difficult undertaking, although the presence of an Inn near there at that time would indicate the fact of its having become a thoroughfare.

"In August of the year just named, the Rev. Henry M. Muhlenberg, accompanied by his father-in-law, Conrad Weister, rode to Esopus, and in his journal writes as follows: 'August 3rd we rode on five miles above Nazareth, and put up for the night at a tavern.[3] August 9th, early in the morning, we were in our saddles, climbed the first Blue mountain, and were compelled, in its ascent, to lead our horses several miles over rocks and stones.' It is not improbable, then, that the Count and his fellow-travelers followed the Indian path that led through Tatemy's Gap. The ride of thirty miles to Depui's Ford was unquestionably the most fatiguing part of the journey, for after crossing the river into the Jersey Minisinks, they struck into the Esopus or 'old mine road.'

"Count Zinzendorf's journal continues,—'We crossed the Blue mountain en route for Esopus (August 11th). The road tried our horses severely; we were, however, in a tranquil frame of mind. In the evening we reached the bank of the Delaware, and came to Mr. Depui's,[4] who is a large land-holder and wealthy. While at his house, he had some Indians arrested for robbing his orchard. August 12th (Sunday) his son[5] escorted us to church. We dismounted at the church, and were compelled to listen to two sermons, which wearied us. In the morning the heat was overpowering. In order to avoid being drawn into a religious controversy, I went into the woods and read Josephus. . . . The Dominie is the well-known Casper (Johannes Casparus Freyenmoet), from [2] The village had, in 1753, a population of about fifty-four Indians, who lived in ten huts, clustered about a house built by the Moravians as a residence and a place for holding meetings. The Indians removed to Gnadenhütten, on the Lehigh, in 1754, Secretary Richard Peters having urged his claim to the lands on the Aquanshicola.

Zurich, a well-meaning man I must confess. . . . August 14th, set out early in the morning; rode through the remainder of the wilderness, and reached Momback and Marbletown. . . . Rode on through Hurley to Esopus. Here we met Anna and Christian Frohlich and his wife. . . . In the afternoon we resumed our journey, crossed the north river and halted for the night. . . . August 15th, at noon, we reached Rhinebeck. Having rested, we set out for Shecomeco, and after riding through an almost impenetrable swamp, came to our journey's end at six o'clock in the morning of the 16th. . . . After spending eight days at this place preaching, teaching and exhorting among the Indians, the party set out on their return voyage on the 24th, and on the 27th reached the Minisink. 'Came to the Delaware on the 28th, across which we swam our horses. Anna, as usual, took the lead. August 29th, Jeannet was seriously indisposed and scarcely able to bear up. We, however, pushed our way through the wilderness, crossed the mountain, and after nightfall reached Nazareth.'

On a third journey of the same year Count Zinzendorf with some companions visited Wyoming. His journal says: "We came to the boundary of Shamokin, a precipitous hill, such as I scarce ever saw. Anna, who is most courageous of our number, and a heroine, led in the descent (ascent?). I took the train of her riding habit in my hand to steady me in the saddle, Conrad held to the skirt of my overcoat and Bohler to Conrad's. In this way we mutually supported each other, and the Saviour assisted us in descending the hill in safety."

On their return from another journey to the Susquehanna they came by way of the Great Swamp[1] and Dansbury[2]

Easton, which, as the seat of justice of the immense county of Northampton, once extending to the northern boundary of Pennsylvania, our especial field, and including all of the territory which is here together with much more, was laid out at what was then called the Forks of the Delaware,[2] in May, 1750, by Nicholas Scull, surveyor-general, and William Parsons, Penn's agent. It was established and named in pursuance to an order of Thomas Penn, written to Dr. Graeme and Secretary Peters. "I desire," writes the Proprietor, "that the new town be called Easton, from my Lord Pomfret's house, and whenever there is a new county, that shall be called Northampton." It was only two years later that it became the seat of justice of the newly erected Northampton, and, in the winter of 1752–53, it contained eleven families. From this time on its growth though not rapid, was quite uniform and healthful. Many men of character and ability whom circumstances made prominent in the affairs of eastern Pennsylvania, and whose names are frequently mentioned in these pages, came there to live, and the town assumed from various causes considerable importance, during the Indian War, the period of Pennamite and Yankee disturbance, and through the years of the Revolution in the last, vying with Bethlehem as a Mecca for the distinguished men in civil and military authority.

These settlements within the present limits of Northampton had but little effect for many years upon the occupation of the country north of the mountains. Up to the time of the Revolution nearly all the inhabitants in the region that is now included in Monroe and Pike Counties—the Pennsylvania Minisink—were those who came with the tide of immigration from the Hudson by the Mamakating, Neversink and Delaware Valleys. About 1780, however, a tide of immigration set in from the southward and southwest which mingled a new element of population with the Dutch of the Minisink. This brought mainly the descendants from the early settlers from Philadelphia, Bucks and Northampton Counties, who, finding the most desirable lands south of the mountains already occupied, pushed north across the great barrier and located upon the best lands which were there opened to settlement. These people made farms and homes in Cherry Valley, on Brodheads Creek, and in the valley of the Pocono. Their immigration continued until about the year 1800. Then between the opening of the century and 1820, came a second wave, "flowing," as Mr. Brodhead says,[1] "from the same direction" which brought to Stroudsburg and vicinity a considerable class of our most respectable citizens, mostly from Bucks County. In the same tide came the Germans from what is known as the 'Drylands' of Northampton County. They swept by the valley settlers and located on the higher lands overlooking the river. The whole range of what is known as the Shawnee Hills, extending from Brodhead's Creek to the Delaware, below the mouth of the Bushkill, is almost entirely owned and occupied by this class of people."

[1] The Great Swamp was also known afterwards as the Shades of Death, on account of the suffering endured by the people of Wyoming after the massacre in their attempts to reach the settlements on the Delaware.

[2] Dansbury was the home of Daniel Brodhead, who became acquainted with the Brethren at Bethlehem, soon after their settlement there, on his way to visit his relative, Isaac Ysselstein. At his house the missionaries often lodged as they traveled to or returned from their mission stations north of the mountains. It was about this this time that he built for their use the log church heretofore mentioned.

CHAPTER III.

Release of Title by the Indians—The "Walking Purchase" of 1737—Later Treaties.

The first release of Indian title effected in the Province of Pennsylvania was brought about in 1782 before Penn's arrival, by his Deputy Governor, William Markham. It embraced all of the territory between the Neshaminy and the Delaware, as far up as Wrightstown and Upper Wakefield—about the centre of the present county of Bucks. In 1683 and 1684, Penn himself made other purchases. It has been claimed that in 1686 the Indians granted to Penn, a tract of country commencing on the line of the former purchases, and extending as far northwesterly as a man could ride on horseback in two days. No copy of the treaty or deed was preserved, if any was made, and the extent of the averred purchase remained undecided. On the 17th of September, 1718, the Lenape or Delaware Indians made another treaty by which they confirmed the sales they had previously made and extended them from the Delaware to the Susquehanna. This last-named sale was again confirmed at a treaty council held and concluded on the 11th of October, 1736, at which time twenty-three chiefs of the Six Nations, who presumptuously claimed possession of the whole region, sold to John, Thomas and Richard Penn, all the lands on both sides of the Susquehanna,—eastward, to the heads of the branches, or springs, flowing into the river; northward, to the Kittochtinny Hills; and westward, to the setting sun,—this vague and extravagant description meaning nothing more than that the western boundary was undecided on and indefinite. The actual boundaries of the purchase were the Susquehanna on the west, the Conewago Hills and South Mountain and the Lehigh River between the sites of Bethlehem and Easton, on the north, and the territory included was that which now forms the whole of Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Delaware, Montgomery and Lancaster and parts of Berks, Lehigh and Northampton.

Still another treaty was made also in 1736, by which the Iroquois or Six Nations released their assumed claim to a belt of country lying north of the former purchase and south of the Blue Mountains, and extending southwesterly from the Delaware to and beyond the Susquehanna—in fact, to the present western line of Franklin County—thus including the northern parts of the present Northampton, Lehigh, Berks and the whole of several counties further west.

Settlers had begun to throng into the lower part of the country which it was supposed had been purchased, and they soon pushed above "the Forks of the Delaware," (the confluence of the Lehigh with that river)—and even as we have shown, in the preceding chapter, above the Blue Mountains, along the Delaware (in what is now Smithfield township, Monroe County).

The Delawares, who had been allowed to take only a trivial part in these later transactions, grew restive under what they considered an unwarranted encroachment upon their domain and ignoring the more northerly purchase of 1736, they had several meetings with the proprietaries to form a plan for confirming and carrying out the alleged treaty of 1686, which they averred had been made with their own people, and thus definitely fixing the limits of the territory they had ceded. The first meeting was held at Durham, below Easton, in 1734; another was at Pennsbury, in May, 1735, and the negotiations were concluded at Philadelphia, August 25, 1737. The last meeting resulted in an agreement that the treaty of 1686 should be consummated, and the extent of the purchase was decided in a novel manner. The proprietaries were to receive such portion of the Indian territory as should be included within a line drawn northwesterly from a point in or near Wrightstown as far as a man could walk in a day and a half, and a line drawn from his stopping-place straight to the Delaware, which was of course the eastern boundary.

Thus was brought about the celebrated "Walking Purchase." No event in the history of the region gave so much dissatisfaction to the Indians as the making of this alleged unjust bargain, and it was directly or indirectly productive of dire effects which we shall chronicle in the next chapter.

While the treaty was in negotiation the proprietaries caused a preliminary or trial walk to be made to ascertain what amount of ground could be secured. It appears that this was undertaken as early as April, 1735, and that the trees along the route were blazed, so that the persons to be engaged in the walk deciding the ownership of land might have the advantage of a marked pathway. As soon as the treaty of August 25, 1737, had been consummated, James Steel, receiver-general under Thomas Penn, took measures to secure for the performance of the purchase-walk the man who had "held out the best" in the preliminary walk. It was proposed that he should walk with two others, who were actively to engage in competition, and that Timothy Smith, sheriff of Bucks County, and John Chapman, surveyor, should accompany the trio, provide provisions, etc. The time fixed for the walk under the treaty was September 12, 1737, but it was postponed until the 19th. The preliminaries were all arranged in advance, and Edward Marshall, James Yeates, and Solomon Jennings, all noted for their powers of endurance, and one of them undoubtedly the champion of the trial walk, were employed by the proprietaries to make the decisive effort. It was arranged that the Indians should send some of their young men along to see that the walk was fairly made. The walkers were promised five pounds in money and five hundred acres of land. The place of starting was fixed at a well-known point, a large chestnut-tree near the junction of the Pennsville and Durham roads, at the Wrightstown meeting-house, in Bucks County, very close to the northern boundary of the Markham purchase. Marshall, Yeates, and Jennings stood with their hands upon the tree, and as the sun rose above the horizon the signal was given by Sheriff Smith, and they started. Their route was as straight as the inequalities of the ground and the numerous obstructions would permit, and led for a number of miles along the Durham road (which was then a road in little more than name). It is said that Yeates led the way with a light step, and next came Jennings, with two of the Indian walkers, while Marshall was last, a considerable distance behind the others. He swung a hatchet in his hand, and walked with an easy and careless lope. The walkers reached Red Hill, in Bedminster, in two and a half hours, took dinner with the Indian trader Wilson, on Durham Creek, near where the old furnace stood, crossed the Lehigh a mile below Bethlehem, at what is now Jones Island, and passing the Blue Ridge at Smith's Gap (in what is now Moore township, Northampton County), slept at night on the northern slope. The walk was resumed at sunrise, and terminated at noon, when Marshall, who alone held out, threw himself at length upon the ground and grasped a sapling, which was marked as the end of the line. Jennings first gave out, about two miles north of the Tohickon, and then lagged behind with the followers until the party reached the Lehigh River. He then left for his home, in what is now Salisbury township[1], Lehigh County.

[1] Solomon Jennings had settled some years previous to the "Walking Purchase" on what is now the Geisinger farm, two miles above Bethlehem, and living on the ex-

INDIAN COSTUMES.

Yeates fell at the foot of the mountain, on the morning of the second day, was quite blind when taken up, and died three days later. Marshall, the champion of the walk, was not in the least injured by his exertion, and lived to the age of seventy-nine, dying in Tinicum, Bucks County.[1]

The walk is said to have followed an Indian path which led from the hunting grounds of the Minsis down to Bristol, on the Delaware. The Indians showed their dissatisfaction at the manner in which the so-called "walk" was made, and left the party before it was concluded. It is said that they frequently called upon the walkers not to run. The distance walked, according to the generally-accepted measurement, was sixty-one and one-fourth miles. Nicholas Scull says it was only fifty-five statute miles, while others estimate the distance as high as eighty-six miles.

When the walk had reached the extreme point in a northwesterly direction from the starting-place, it still remained to run the line to the Delaware, and here arose another ground for disagreement. The Indians had expected that a straight line would be drawn to the river at the nearest point, but instead it was run at right angles and reached the river at or near the Lackawaxen, taking in about twice as much territory as would have been included by the other arrangement. The lines embraced nearly all of the lands within the forks of the Delaware (that is, between the Delaware and the Lower Lehigh), in fact all of the valuable land south of the Blue Ridge, in Northampton County, already ceded by the treaty, all of the celebrated Minisink flats, north of the Mountains, to the mouth of the Lackawaxen. The larger part of the present Monroe County and more than half of Pike. Had the line been drawn to the Delaware at the nearest point (which would have been almost due east), instead of at right angles, it would have included only about half as much territory as was secured by the line actually drawn. The quantity of land embraced in the purchase was about five hundred thousand acres. James Steel, writing to Letitia Aubrey in 1737, said that it required about four days to walk from the upper end of the day and a half's journey, and that "after they crossed the great ridge of mountains they saw very little good or even tolerable land fit for settlement."

This walk gave great dissatisfaction to the Indians, and was the principal cause of the council held at Easton in 1756, where it was elaborately discussed. The Indians complained that the walkers walked too fast, that they should have stopped to shoot game and to smoke; in short, should have walked as the Indians usually did when engaged in the hunt. They also found fault with the manner in which the line was run from the stopping-place to the river, claiming that it should have been drawn to the nearest point. The proprietaries were accused of trickery and dishonesty, and the "walking purchase" drew upon them and their associates the bitter hatred of the Delawares. It was the smoldering fire of the feeling thus engendered which by the influence of men and events was fanned into an intense heat eighteen years later, and created great havoc in the region now comprised in Northampton, Monroe and Pike Counties. If the line had been drawn to the nearest point on the Delaware, it would have recrossed the Blue Mountains, and reached the river considerably below the Water Gap, and thus would have included no part of the Minisink, and only a small triangle of territory in the southwestern part of the present county of Monroe.

treme frontier, had become famous as a hunter and a woodsman, a fact which led to his being selected as one of the walkers. He is said to have been extremely fond of whiskey, and it has been averred that it was because of that weakness that he failed in the walk. This, however, may be an injustice to him. It is certain that he never recovered from the effects of his over-exertion, though he lived for twenty years. His son, John Jennings, was elected sheriff of Northampton County in 1762, and again in 1768. It is traditionally asserted that Solomon Jennings received what is now known as the Geisinger farm as a reward for his taking part in the walk, but there is no foundation for that theory of his ownership, and it is well known that he resided upon the property for a number of years prior to 1737. The farm was sold to Jacob Geisinger at public sale in 1764.

[1] The date of his death was November 7, 1789. He was a native of Bustleton, Philadelphia County, where he was born in 1710. He was twice married, and the father of twenty-one children. He lived for a time on the island in the Delaware opposite Tinicum which bears his name.

Concerning this "walking purchase" and some preliminary and subsequent matters of collateral interest, L. W. Brodhead, the well known student of Minisink history, contributes a mass of information drawn largely from Charles Thompson's "An Enquiry into the causes of the Alienation of the Delaware and Shawanese Indians from the British Interest;"[1] and also copies of interesting and valuable Indian letters upon the "Walk," (the originals of which are among the Logan papers in the possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania), and letters from individuals in Smithfield.

The "Enquiry into the causes of the alienation of the Delaware and Shawnee Indians," just alluded to says:

"While they (the Delawares) were paid for their lands on Tulpehocken, they were unjustly, and in a manner forcibly, dispossessed of their land in the forks of the Delaware. At this very time (1733) William Allen, one of the principal gentlemen in Pennsylvania, and a great dealer in land purchased of the proprietors, was selling the land in the Minisinks, which had never been purchased of the Indians; nay, was near forty miles above the Lehigh hills, which was solemnly agreed upon, (by the treaty of 1718) to be the boundary between the English and the Indians. Governor Penn, the founder, had devised to his grandson William, and his heirs, ten thousand acres of land, to be set out in proper and beneficial places, in this province, by his trustees. This ten thousand acres Mr. Allen purchased of William Penn, the grandson, and by virtue of a warrant or order of the trustees to Jacob Taylor, Surveyor General, to survey the said ten thousand acres, he had part of the land located or laid out in the Minisinks, because it was good land, though it was not yet purchased of the Indians.

"Had he contented himself with securing the right, and suffered the lands to remain in the possession of the Indians till it had been duly purchased and paid for, no ill consequences would have ensued. But no sooner had the land been surveyed to him than he began to sell it to those who would immediately settle it. His deed to Nicholas Depui in 1733 is recorded in the rolls of office of Bucks County." "About this time the proprietor published proposals for a lottery of one hundred thousand acres to be laid out anywhere within the province, except on manors, lands already settled, etc. There was no exception of lands unpurchased of the Indians, but rather an express provision for those who had unjustly seated themselves there, since by drawing prizes they might lay them on the lands on which were already seated. By virtue of these tickets, tracts laid out in the forks were quickly taken up and settled. These transactions provoked the Indians."

"The extreme anxiety of the proprietors, as well as their motives, for extending the walk as far as possible, may be best appreciated by a glance at the map, and the peculiar course of the Delaware above the Kittatinny mountain. If the walk had terminated at the Kittatinny, the line from the end of the walk, to intersect the Delaware if drawn at right angles, (as the Surveyor General Eastburn and the land speculaters claimed that it should), would have intersected the Delaware at the Water Gap, and would not have included the Minisink lands, a prominent object of the speculators. The line as actually drawn by Eastburn, strikes the Delaware near Shohola Creek in Pike County. Overreaching, both in its literal and figurative sense, is the term most applicable to the whole transaction."

"The deliberations of the council terminated however unfavorably to the Delawares.

"The Governor complained to the deputies of the Six Nations of the refusal of the Delawares, to remove from the lands embraced in the walking purchase, that they were disturbing the peace, and had the insolence to write letters to some of the magistrates of this government, wherein they had abused the worthy proprietors, and threatened them with the utmost rudeness and ill manners (referring to letters given in the following pages). Canasatego in the name of the deputies of the Six Nations told the Governor, 'That they saw the Delawares had been an unruly people and were altogether in the wrong; that they concluded to remove them.' Then addressing himself to the Delawares in a violent and singular strain of invective, he said, they deserved to be taken by the hair of their head and shaken severely till they had recovered their senses and become sober. For what you have done, we charge you to remove instantly; we don't give you liberty to think about it. You are women. Take the advice of a wise man and remove instantly. You may return to the other side of the Delaware, where you came from; but we do not know whether, considering how you have demeaned yourselves, you will be permitted to live there,—or whether you have not swallowed that land down your throats, as well as the land on this side. We therefore assign you two places to go to, either Wyoming or Shamokin. You may go to either of these places, and then we can have you under our eye, and shall see how you behave. Don't deliberate, but remove away and take this belt of Wampum. He then forbid them ever to intermeddle in land affairs, or ever hereafter pretend to sell any land, and commanded them, as he had something to transact with the English, immediately to depart the council."

The Delawares dared not disobey this peremptory command. They immediately left the council, and soon after removed from the Forks. Some to Wyoming and Shamokin and some to Ohio.

Thus passed away the power as well as the prestige of this remnant of the great Lenni Lenape Nation.

Teedyuscung was the last chief of the tribe on their favorite river. He represented his people at several subsequent councils held at Easton and Philadelphia and displayed a high order of native talent. He possessed a good deal of force of character and was a good speaker, exercising thereby great influence in council, and did much to restore the former reputation of his people. He was a prominent actor in the councils of 1756 and 58. At one of these assemblies he contended for a secretary of his own selection, and demanded a record of the proceedings, in view of the treacherous memory evinced by the Proprietaries at former deliberations. Strange as it may appear, Governor Denny persistently opposed this request; but the chief sustained his demand so ably and with such good and forcible reasoning that the Governor was obliged, though very ungraciously, to yield to his wishes. Of his numerous speeches, space can be spared but for a few extracts.

At the Council at Easton in November 1756, Teedyuscung addressed Governor Denny as follows. ("Pumpshin," a Delaware Indian acting as interpreter)

"Brother: Hear me with patience; you may remember I often desired you to endeavor to apprehend me aright when I am speaking of matters of importance. Brother: I am going to use a comparison in order to represent to you the better what we ought to do.

"When you choose a spot of ground for planting you first prepare the ground, then you put the seed into the earth, but if you don't take pains afterwards you will not obtain fruit. To instance in the Indian corn which is mine, (meaning a Native plant of this country) as is customary I put seven grains in one hill, yet it will come to nothing, tho' the ground be good; tho' at the beginning I take prudent steps, yet if I neglect it afterwards, tho' it may grow up to stalks and leaves, and there may be appearance of Ears there will be only leaves and cobs. In like manner in the present Business, tho' we have begun well, yet if we hereafter use not prudent means we shall not have success answerable to our expectations. God that is above hath furnished us both powers and abilities. As for my part I must confess to my shame, I have not made such improvements of the power given me as I ought, but as I look on you to be more highly favored from above than I am, I wou'd desire you that we would join our endeavors to promote the good work, and that the cause of our uneasiness, begun in the time of our forefathers, may be removed; and if you look into your hearts, and act according to the Abilities given you, you will know the grounds of our uneasiness in some measure from what I have said before in the comparison of the fire; though I was but a boy, yet I wou'd according to my abilities bring a few chips. So with regard to the corn; I can do but little; you can do a great deal; therefore let us all men, women and children, assist in pulling up the weeds, that nothing may hinder the corn from growing to perfection, when this is done, tho' we may not live to enjoy the Fruit ourselves, yet we shou'd remember our children may live and enjoy the Good Fruit, and it is our duty to act for their good."

"Brother: I desire you will attend to these few words, and I will, with all dilligence, endeavor to tell you the truth: the Great Log you mentioned, when kindled, will make a great flame, but it will not kindle of itself, nor continue flaming unless there be Air and Leaves, as well as coals, to make it kindle. I desire we may use our utmost endeavors to make it kindle, tho' what I have told you may relate to matters disagreeable to you, yet if we exert ourselves and act according to our abilities given from above, the events will be agreeable and pleasing to ourselves and of service to our children."

"Brothers: I have to request you that you would give Liberty to all Persons and friends, to reach into these matters; as we are all children of the Most High, we should endeavor to assist and make use of one another, and not only so, but from what I have heard, I believe there is a future State besides this Flesh."

Mr. Brodhead comments as follows:

"The founder of this great Commonwealth was ever the faithful friend of the Minsis and the other tribes in his province. He understood their case perfectly; and had he been permitted to be present at the Council of 1742, the result of their deliberations, we can readily conjecture, would have been greatly different. No pretensions of the Six Nations, nor the alluring promises of gain by their white allies, could have induced him to depart from the plain path of duty.

He knew what these people had suffered, and knew also that they were the rightful owners of the soil. His transactions with them were ever stamped with the impress of humanity and justice. Would that we could say as much of his immediate successors. Well might these poor men lament the loss of such a friend, at a time too when all mankind else seemed to be frowning upon them—when the sun of their greatness was setting in thickening clouds, portentous of the tempest that was to overwhelm them.

"There seems to be no doubt that these Indians desired to live on terms of friendship with the white settlers; they evidently looked upon them as a superior order of beings, and, at first, thinking they were to be made wiser and better by their teaching and example, they made them welcome, so far as the simple native manners of these people could testify. Could we have more conclusive evidence of the friendly disposition of the Minsis than is derived from the fact that for near a quarter of a century they lived quietly and peaceably with the settlers in this valley, and permitted them to cut down their forests and cultivate their best hunting-grounds, all unprotected as the confiding settlers were against their overpowering numbers, and against the means they possessed of exterminating them without warning should they be disposed at any time to do so.

"Yet in all these years we hear of the commission of no single act of violence on the part of the Indians until the general outbreak during the war of 1755.

"But was there not sufficient provocation for this outbreak? Was there not already cause for it in the infamous "walking purchase" of 1737, when the full effect of that fraud became apparent in the loss of their cherished possessions in the Minisink?

"At the Council held in Philadelphia in 1742, called at the request of Governor Thomas Penn, the Delawares and Six Nations were each represented.

"The Governor's object was to make complaints to the latter of the Delawares, as he had threatened in his letter of 1741, and induce the Six Nations to enforce his claim to lands in the Minisink, as well as in the Forks, and oblige them to quit the country. There were of the Six Nations then present two hundred and thirty, the Delawares being under a species of vassalage to that nation.

"The question of the "walking purchase" was discussed at this Council.

"When settlers began to move upon the lands in the Minisink great dissatisfaction was expressed by the Delawares. They declared the "walk" a fraud, especially as to the land claimed north of the Kittatinny, or Blue Mountains, which included the Minisink, their favorite hunting-grounds, and declared their determination to maintain its possession by force.

"That these lands were occupied without their consent the following pathetic letters will show:

(From the Logan MSS. in possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.)

"Memorandum of two letters to Jeremiah Langhorne,[1] J. P. of Bucks County, from sundry Indians:

"Smithfield, Nov. 21, 1740.

"To Mr. Jeremiah Langhorne and all Magistrates of Pennsylvania:

"We pray you that you would take notice of the great wrong we receive in our lands—here are about 100 families settled on it, for what reason they cannot tell.

"They tell that Thos. Penn has sold them the land, which we think must be very strange, that T. Penn should sell them that which was never his, for we never sold him this land. The case was this: That when we were with Penn to treat, as usual with his father, he kept begging and plaguing us to give him some land, and never gives us leave to treat upon any thing until he wearies us out of our lives, but what should we give Penn any lands for—we never had any thing from him but honest dealings and civility. If he lets us alone, we will let him alone. The land we do own to be ours, Begins at the mouth of the Tohickon, runs up along the said branch to the head springs, thence up with a straight line to Patqualing,[1] thence in a straight line to the Blue Mountains, thence to a place called Mahoning, thence along a mountain called Neshameck, thence along the Great Swamp to a Branch of the Delaware River—so along Delaware River to the place where we first began.

"All this is our land except some tracts we have disposed of—The tract of Durham—the tract of Nicholas Depui—The tract of old Weiser we have sold. But for the rest we have never sold and we desire Thos, Penn would take these people off from our land in Peace, that we may not be at the trouble to drive them off, for the land we will hold fast with both our hands nor in privately but in open view of all the Country, and all our friends and relations, that is the Eastern Indians and our uncles the five nations and the Mohicons and the troctweys, Shawanahs, Shawekelan, Tuskeroras & the Iakkesau the last, these all shall be by and hear us speak and we shall stand at our uncle's breast when we shall speak. Now Gentlemen & all others we desire some of your advice & likewise some of your assistance in this affair, for we have lived in brotherly friendship, so we desire to continue the same if so be we can be righted any manner of ways so we remain your friends. (The Indians acknowledge this to be done by their direction.)"

The second letter or petition is addressed to Governor Thomas Penn, dated—

"Smithfield January ye 3, 1741

"Hon[d] Sir

"We are very much wronged and abused of having our lands taken & settled and we know not how or what affor—We have applied ourselves sometime ago to ye authority of the Province to Mr. Langhorne and begged their advice and assistance, but we have received no answer, nor any news as yet—We hope your Excellency will help us, that we may have justice done us according to the Articles made between ye English and our Fathers, which was if we are right informed to live in Brotherly Love together—but not as we live now, for we cannot enjoy our Birth-rights in peace & quietness but we are abused as if we were enemies and not friends, for we dare not speak for our rights, but there is an upcom and in danger of being cut to pieces and destroyed—so that we cannot keep our young people in order and if we do get an honest man to assist in anything that we want, he is in danger of his life as appears now at this time for here is a great uproar and we know not what it is (for it is very strange that we may not have an honest man to take our parts in any just cause, but he must be killed or fly his Country), so if this practice must hold why then we are no more brethren or friends but must be more like open enemies, then we shall ruin and destroy ourselves—It looks very strange that Your Excelly, would take any notice of John McMaken,[2] what he says or what he can do, for he is not a friend of the English nor to us—He is partly a Shawanah, the worst of all Indians—He has lived so long among you (them) that he has got their own nature. He lives a lazy idle life He is an intruder upon the Proprietor and us.

"He buys no land nor settles for a livelihood, but makes a little improvement and so gets a bottle of rum and other truck and goes peddling. He does no good to himself or anybody else. Now he is afraid he shall lose his way of living. He makes a great uproar, and does not care what he does, so he may be revenged upon us, for we do not intend to let him settle any of our land any more.

"Indeed all the rest that make this uproar there is not a creditable person among them, for they think that by uproar, they will scare us to be easy and let them alone in their wicked way to take our land and never give us anything for it—but we are not willing to be served so. Therefore we pray your Excelly. will assist us to settle these affairs, so that we altogether live in Peace and in Brotherly Love, according to our first Articles which we made by our Forefathers.

"We pray it may please your Excelly to send us an answer and although we be Indians we beg leave to subscribe ourselves his Excellencies most humble servants

In surveys of land made in 1718, 1720, 1728, 1805 it was called respectively Pahakqualong, Pahaqualing, Pehoquealin, Pahaqualong. The word signifies a river passing between two mountains.

Copies of letters from Indians to ye Governor & Jeremiah Langhorne. Referred to in Minutes, March 26, 1741.

Following the last letter of the Indians is a letter or petition to the Governor setting forth:—

Jacob Sebring to be an honest and true man &c. and John McMachon a very bad man.

The scribe for the Indians was Jacob Sebring, whose character is vouched for above. He was arrested by the Sheriff of Bucks County for serving them in that capacity.

The following is a memorandum of the Governor's reply, and is endorsed:

"Rough draft of an Intended letter to the Delaware "Indians, 17th March 1741

Sent accordingly May 1st and the answer inclosed" The letter Begins:

"Acknowledge ye rect of these letters pr two Indian messengers two months and 21 days after date and also yt wrote to Jeremiah Langhorne mentions it being wrote in a different style and manner from others had hitherto seen from any Indians in this Goverment, who had sworn themselves to be an honest fair people, ready to perform their agreements, and who had always been treated by us with great tenderness—hopes that those letters were wrote by some evil minded men and that the Indians did not know ye contents which were not true—those relates the purchase made in 1686 and the confirmation with the transactions at Durham and at Pennsbury and describes ye courses of the purchase. Mentions that Sappawinsa and their honest old men were satisfied with and acknowledged it was all true and agreed upon ye day and a half's walk at a third meeting at Philadelphia, were the deeds were all produced and read again in presence of Sappawinca Tishiconk and Nautemus and many white people and Indians who were witnesses wherein they ye Delawares released all right and claim to those lands and promised to appoint some persons to walk ye day and a half which they did and they set out together in order to execute ye agreement—mentions ye fairness of the walk and where they stopped at a mountain and according to ye words in ye deed run a strait line to Delaware River—Then mentions yt as this is the case it is they who have acted wrong &c and told a story in order to break ye friendship, or otherwise they might remember several things—

"Queries, how they could claim lands to ye mouth of Tohickon &c unless you had a mind to break ye peace, or if you had an inclination to keep the peace, how came you to write to J. Langhorne, that several Indians would be with you to demand Justice as if intended to attack and make war on the King's subjects—Desires ye Indians to consider well what they are about—Mentions ye strength of ye English and if forced might easily overcome them—reprimands them for their taking Jacob Sebring out of ye hands of the Sheriff and demands his delivery—after this treaty that their uncles ye five nations had signed a release for these lands to the Proprietors and further desired Onas and James Logan that they would never treat with their cousins ye Delawares about land for that they were a people of no virtue and had nowhere a Council fire burning and who dealt often very unjustly with our friends and brethren the English &c.—Then acquaints them that some of their chiefs are to be here in May and that Mr. Penn will complain to them of their behavior and acquaint them publicly of everything that has passed at which any of ye may come down and be present, provided you come down at your own charge (!!!) for the Proprietors concern you have acted so injustly by them and have so often put them to the expense in several meetings, without intending to do the business that you must not expect to be maintained here—you may send such as are allowed to be of the Delaware Nation because the Jersey or other strange Indians will not be taken any notice of. Mentions he had wrote a letter about 3 months ago and given it to Nicholas Scull to be delivered them, with orders to examine very closely into ye cause of these Disturbances, and that if any injustice was done you by ye inhabitants, they might be punished for such behavior—But that he could not proceed for ye cold and was obliged to return—I now send him again to make this inquiry that he may know who are the principal causes of this uneasiness and that he does not expect they will interfere with

There is also an island in the Delaware, four miles below Belvidere, called Capoose Island.

Dr. Hollister, in his History of the Lackawanna Valley, says. "Capoose himself was a contemporary of Tudyuscung of the Delawares, but so diverse in character and temperament, that while the latter was ambitious for distinction, and prominent in Council gatherings, where he jointly looked after the interests of the Moneys and his own tribe, Capoose, undecked with the emblems of war, lived in amity with the whites, encourgaed the culture of the soil, and left behind him a name untarnished with either blood or carnage."

"It is difficult to read this correspondence without the feeling that deliberate and cruel injustice was done to these simple-minded people — the Indians. The letter of the Governor is, to say the least, hard, unsympathic and mercenary, and is not such an one as the ordinary feeling of humanity would dictate, and most certainly not such a letter as would have been written, under like circumstances, by the founder of the commonwealth.

"The following extracts from two other letters are equally interesting and equally painful, with the former correspondence.

"The letter from William Penn (the grandson) shows that efforts had been made for the sale of the land in the Minisink nine years before the "Walking Purchase."

PROPRIETARY CORRESPONDENCE.

In possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Extract from a letter of William Penn (the grandson) to James Logan.

April 28th, 1728.

I return you thanks for the regard you are pleased to express for my interest in Pennsylvania; and had at first some thought of attending to it myself, persuent to your advice, but finding that not so suitable to my present circumstances as I could have wished, do herewith send a full power of attorney to yourself and Mr. Langhorne, which I hope will be accepted, and doubt not it will under your care be disposed of to as much advantage as if I were present, especially if the Indians can be prevailed upon to suffer a survey to be made of the valuable tract of land you mention, which I hope will not be found impracticable.

To this the following note is appended: The Indians forbade the survey, but promised if young William Penn (for which name they expressed a high veneration) would come over he should have what he pleased.

Extract of a letter from James Logan to the proprietor:—

July 10, 1742.

This is the 10th and last day of my attendance here for a treaty with the chiefs of the Six Nations, who, with the Delawares, between 20 and 30 in number and 8 of Shawnees made up 188 persons with their women and children.

When on the 29th of last month they came to my house where they were entertained till the next afternoon, and then coming thither were joined by about 40 more from the Conestoges, with the Ganawese and soon after by Natimus and his company, who complained very heavily to their uncles of being cheated, after a full hearing have this day been commanded by them (the Six Nations) to quit all that tract entirely and to remove either over to Jersey again or beyond the Hills, but as this has been throughout excellent treaty (for the whites) I shall refer you more particular accounts to more ready pens. This treaty will cost me £20 out of pocket and which I shall not charge a penny to any.

Just twelve years after the unfortunate "Walking Purchase" was made, and while the contention in regard to it was still carried on, a portion of the territorry which it covered and very much more was secured from the Delaware, or Lenape, and the Six Nations by purchase, the consideration being £300 "lawful money of Pennsylvania." This purchase included a belt of country stretching from the Delaware to the Susquehanna; having as its south boundary the Blue Mountains. In this scope of country, thus obtained, lies the whole of the present Monroe County, the greater part of Pike, a very small portion of Wayne (the extreme tip of its southern panhandle), the whole of Carbon and Schuylkill and parts of Lackawanna, Luzerne, Columbia, Northumberland, Dauphin and Lebanon.

The treaty was consummated August 22, 1749, at Philadelphia, the parties being Edward Warner, Lynford Lardner, receiver general of the province, William Peters, Richard Peters, secretary of the province, and others, and the sachems and chiefs of the Six Nations, Delawares, Shamokin and Shawanese Indians. The purchase was described in one of the treaty documents as follows:

"All that Tract and parcel of Land situate, lying and being within the following limits or bounds, and thus described (that is to say): Beginning at the Hills or Mountains called in the language of the Five Nations Indians the Tyanuntasachta or Endless Hills, and by the Delaware Indians the Keckachtany Hills. On the east side of the river Susquehanna, being in the North West line or boundary of the Tract of Land formerly purchased by the said Proprietors from the Said Indian Nations by their Deed of the Eleventh day of October, Anno Dom, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Thirty Six; and from thence running up said river by the several courses thereof to the first or nearest Mountain to the North side of the Mouth of the Creek called in the Language of the said Five Nation Indians Cantaguy, and in the Language of the Delaware Indians Maghonioy, and from thence extending by a direct or straight line to be run from the said Mountain on the north side of said creek to the main branch of Delaware River at the north side of the Mouth of the Creek called Lechawachsein, and from thence to return across Lechawachsein Creek aforesaid, down the River Delaware by the several courses thereof to the Kekachtany Hills aforesaid, and from thence by the range of said Hills to the place of Beginning."[1]

After the treaty of 1749, the first purchase of lands from the Indians, which included any portion of the territory which is the province of this work, was that made in 1768. The treaty was made between the representatives of Thomas and Richard Penn and the Sachems of the Six Nations, at Fort Stanwix (now Rome, N. Y.), and concluded on November 5, 1768. By its terms the Indian title was released from an immense belt of country, northwest of the lands ceded by the treaties of 1749, 1754 and 1758, and extending diagonally across the entire province from the Delaware River, in the northeastern, corner to the boundaries of Virginia on the west and of Virginia and Maryland on the south.

All of the territory of the present Wayne County, except a very small fraction of its southern extremity, was included in this cession, which embraced the whole of Susquehanna, Wyoming, Sullivan, Montour, Green, Washington, Fayette, Westmoreland, Somerset and Cambria, and parts of Lackawanna, Luzerne, Columbia, Northumberland, Union, Snyder, Bradford, Lycoming, Clinton, Centre, Clearfield, Indiana, Armstrong, Allegheny and Beaver.

In the deed from the Six Nations, the territory of the purchase was described as follows:

"All that part of the Province of Pennsylvania not heretofore purchased of the Indians, within the said general boundary line, and beginning in the said Boundary line on the east side of the east Branch of the River Susquehanna, at a place called Owegy, and running with the said boundary Line down the said Branch, on the east side thereof, till it comes opposite the mouth of a Creek called by the Indians Awandac (Tawandee) and across the River, and up the said Creek on the south side thereof and along the range of hills called Burnett's Hills by the English and by the Indians[2]—on the north side of them, to the head of a creek which runs into the West Branch of the Susquehanna; then crossing the said River and running up the same on the South side thereof, the several courses thereof, to the forks of the same River which lies nearest to a place on the River Ohio[3] called Kittanning, and from the said fork, by a straight line to Kittanning aforesaid, and then down the said Ohio by the several courses thereof, to where the western Bounds of the said Province of Pennsylvania crosses the same river, and then with the same western Bounds to the South boundary thereof, and with the South boundary aforesaid to the east side of the Allegheny hills, on the east side of them to the west line of a tract of Land purchased by the Said Proprietors from the Six Nations, and confirmed October 23, 1758, and then with the Northern bounds of that Tract to the River Susquehanna and crossing the River Susquehanna to the northern Boundary line of another tract of Land purchased of the Indians by Deed (August 22, 1749), and then with that northern Line, to the River Delaware at the north side of the mouth of a creek called Lechawachsein, then of the said River Delaware on the west side thereof to the intersection of it by an east line to be drawn from Owegy aforesaid to the Said River Delaware and then with that east Line, to the beginning, at Owegy aforesaid."

[1] Penn. Archives, vol. ii., p. 34.

[2] Meaning the Allegheny, to which the Indians always gave the name Ohio.

[3] At a subsequent treaty at Fort Stanwix (October, 1784), the Pennsylvania Commissioners inquired of the Indians what was their name for the range called by the English "Burnett's Hills," to which they replied that they knew them by no other name than the "Long Mountains." As to the creek called by them "Tiadaghton" they explained that it was the same known by the whites as Pine Creek which flows into the West Branch of the Susquehanna from the northward.

CHAPTER IV.

The Indian War, 1755–1763—Benjamin Franklin Plans the Frontier Defense—Forts Norris, Hamilton, Hyndshaw and Depui.

WHAT is known locally in Eastern Pennsylvania as the Indian War of 1755–1763 was but a comparatively small and partially independent scene, or incident, in that long bloody drama commonly called the French and Indian War, the theatre of which extended from the Hudson and St. Lawrence to Fort Pitt, to Detroit and other points upon the great lakes, and even to Western Michigan.

The greater war consisted of a protracted, stubborn, desperate contest between the French and their Indian allies upon one side, and the English upon the other, for dominion in America, and finally concluded, as all know, with the victory of the latter and the complete overthrow of the power of France in America.

The lesser war which prevailed at the same time, and of which we are to treat in these pages, while in some measure incited by the intrigues of the French, and by the generally inflamed condition of the Indian tribes, was chiefly brought about by local causes, was local in its aim and effects—and in short, practically a separate and distinct campaign. It was essentially a war of the Delawares under Teedyuscung, who was called at that period, "the War Trumpet" of his people; it grew out of the dissatisfaction of the Indians with the terms of several treaties and land purchases, particularly that of 1837, where the Proprietaries' representatives engaged in literally "running" the boundaries of the "Walking Purchase;" and its fury was particularly—almost exclusively—directed toward and sated upon the inhabitants of the region, which the Indians regarded as having been fraudulently taken from them. The field of Teedyuscung's war was, therefore, principally confined to that part of Northampton County north of the Blue Mountains and between the Lehigh and the Delaware—the region now chiefly comprehended in Monroe, Pike, Carbon and Lehigh counties—though in several instances, carried for local causes and the blind hate engendered by the heat of strife, into regions outside of these general boundaries. In fact, the field of the lesser war over-lapped at various times and places the territory of the greater, and so it is in some cases difficult to determine to which general conflict particular hostilities should be attributed.

The connection between the lesser and greater, the local and the general wars, was apparent at the beginning. The French knew that by securing as allies the Delawares and other tribes of Pennsylvania the probabilities of success in their military operations against the English on the Ohio, would be greatly enhanced, and it was for that reason that they flattered and cajoled them. But the Indians were also slow to espouse a doubtful cause, and hence we find that the Indians of Eastern Pennsylvania did not assume an attitude of active hostility until the French had won a signal victory, and one which presaged the success of their arms. Braddock's terrible defeat on the Monongahela, near the site of Pittsburg, on the 9th of July, 1755, proved the direct means of encouraging the disaffected Indians to make indiscriminate war upon the whites, and they followed it with savage zest for several years.

It was then that Teedyuscung who had been led from paths of peace—from the teachings of the Moravians—by the incitement of his ambition to become the "King of his People"—the "War Trumpet of the Delawares," assembled his braves and the allied Mohicans and Shawanese, at Nescopeck, and marked out a campaign which carried terror through the frontier settlements of old Northampton in the fall of 1755, and the succeeding winter. But prior to the open exhibition of his mighty hand in open hostility to the whites among whom he had formerly lived, several atrocities were committed in the interior of the province, particularly along the Susquehanna. There may be said to have begun the Indian war in Pennsylvania—a war desultory, but none the less bloody, fatal and desolating. A settlement on John Penn's creek below Sunbury was sacked on the 18th of October, the great cove on the Conococheague shared the same fate on the 3rd of November, and two weeks later the camp-fires of the Lenape and their allies blazed through the forest, north of the line of frontier settlements from the Susquehanna to the Delaware.

The first fatal blow struck by savage fury near the region which is our especial field in this work, and the one which may be said to have opened the war in Northampton County, was curiously enough directed against the peaceful Moravians upon the Upper Lehigh. Where the wild waters of the Mahanoy poured their tribute to the former stream (near the site of Lehighton in Carbon County), the Moravians had established in 1746, a mission station known as Gnadenhutten, (meaning "Tents of Grace" or more literally "Mercy Huts.") The mission was moved in 1754 to the east side of the Lehigh where upon the site of the present town of Weissport, a village called New Gnadenhutten was built. Here had been located the Mohican Indians, a short time before driven out of Shekomeko, in Connecticut, and Patchgatgoch in New York near the border of the former State, and here too, were a large number of Delawares who had been converted to Christianity. The congregation we are told numbered five hundred souls. Just before the opening of the war some of the Mohicans had been induced by the Delawares, and their allies on the Susquhanna after long persuasion to desert the mission and remove to Wyoming, but nearly as many converted Delawares were about the same time brought from Menialagomeka.[1] So the Indian town remained nearly as large as ever in 1755. Of the Moravian brethren and sisters there were about twenty living upon the west side of the Lehigh. They fondly hoped that their little mission colony and the Christian Indian village might flourish and become a permanent abode of peace, but destiny ruled otherwise, and while they were enjoying a sense of almost complete security they were suddenly and terribly aroused by an Indian attack which swept the little frontier dot of civilization completely out of existence, and left more than half their number slain.

This massacre was doubtless attributable to French machinations or at least to the Indians who had warmly espoused the French cause and there is no convincing evidence that Teedyuscung was so far treacherous to the people from whose faith he was an apostate, as to take an active part in planning or executing the assault. His hands, however red with blood of other victims, were probably not stained by that of his former Moravian friends and spiritual advisers of the place where he was baptized only five years before.[2]

Loskiel says of the period preceding the massacre: "The Indians in the French interest were much incensed that any of the Moravian Indians chose to remain at Gnadenhutten and determined to cut off the settlement. After Braddock's defeat the whole frontier was open to the inroads of the savage foe. Every day disclosed new scenes of barbarity committed by the Indians. The whole country was in terror; the neighbors of the Brethren forsook their dwellings and fled; but the Brethren made a covenant together to remain undaunted in the place allotted them by Providence."[3]

The attack was made late in the evening of November 24th by a large body of Indians; the Mission house was fired and while the glare of the flames lit up the gloom of the surrounding forest, from which the stealthy savages had come, eleven of the inmates perished by the tomahawk and rifle or were burned to death in the building which had been their shelter and home. The house being consumed the murderous horde set fire to the barns and stable, and thus destroyed all of the corn, hay and cattle together with much other property within them. The Meeting house (Gemein haus) a grist and saw mill, a store building and numerous out houses were also burned and all of the portable property of value that was not destroyed was carried away as spoil.[1]

The Indians at the mission on the opposite side of the river were alarmed by the firing and shouts of their savage brothers and offered to attack the enemy without delay, but being advised to the contrary by the missionaries who had escaped, they all fled into the woods.[2]

The people of Bethlehem had seen the lurid glare beyond the Blue Mountains and had been in an agony of suspense in regard to the fate of their brethren.

They apprehended that evil news would be brought to them, and were in a measure prepared for the tidings borne by a breathless messenger between midnight and morning. During the following day it was confirmed by one after another of the poor people who had barely escaped with their lives, and had fled in terror from the fire-illumined scene of murder. By night eight of the white people and about forty of the Indian converts had reached Bethlehem and from this time on, for several days the people of the Lehigh Valley were precipitately pushing southward into the older and larger settlements to escape the savage hordes they imagined might at any instant come upon them. They were filled with the wildest alarm and many came with scarcely clothes enough upon their backs to protect them from the cold, while all were entirely destitute of the means to obtain the necessities of life. There was a general hegira from all that part of the valley north of the Mountains and nearly all the people below, as far down as the Irish settlement, left their homes. The Moravians at Bethlehem and Nazareth and the citizens of Easton extended to these panic-stricken and destitute people, every kindness in their power. The Brethren kept their wagons plying to and fro between Bethlehem and points eight or ten miles up the road, bringing into their hospitable town the woman and children who had become exhausted in their flight and sunk by the way.

The Provincial authorities had failed to read in Braddock's defeat a warning of the danger that was imminent, but the butchery on the Lehigh and the abandonment of the valley brought them to an appreciative sense of the condition of the frontier and they sought at the eleventh—perhaps we may say the twelfth—hour to atone for their remissness of duty. Their measures were two fold. They endeavored to pacify the Indians, and at the same time hastened to put the Province on a war footing, by organizing troops and building a line of defenses along the frontier. Early in December 1755 Governor Morris decided to summon the Indians to a conference and he entrusted the diplomatic delivery of his message to Aaron Depui, Charles Brodhead and Benjamin Shoemaker, all of the county of Northampton, but the effort toward pacification was abortive. By a letter from James Hamilton to Governor Morris dated Easton, December 25, it appears that Depui was then still at home, sick and it was not probable that he would be able to carry the message to Wyoming, so that he "believed the Expectation of the Treaty would fall to the ground"—and it did.

The action taken toward the protection of the frontier, which we shall speak of fully in proper place, was more effective than the measures to bring about conciliation, and it ushered into the arena of military life, for a short career, one of the most illustrious characters in the civil history of America—Benjamin Franklin.

But in the meantime had occurred the first organized Indian invasion of the Minisink country—the first active hostility in which Teedyuscung's hand was exhibited. This was the strong-concerted assault upon the Brodheads, on the site of East Stroudsburg (then known as Dansbury and included in the bounds of Smithfield), and the series of attacks upon other settlers, chiefly within the limits of the present Monroe County, though the general incursion extended also into what is now Pike County, and its effects were felt still further north, in Wayne County, and along the Delaware in New Jersey and New York.

Upon the morning of the 11th of December, 1755, a large body of Indians, variously estimated at from one to two hundred, suddenly appeared at Daniel Brodhead's settlement. Here, besides Brodhead and his several stalwart sons, lived several other families, either in the immediate vicinity or a few miles away. Ephraim Culver had built a mill upon the Brodhead tract this very year and was living there. So also was Francis Jones. Not far away were the McMichaels and the Carmichaels, while Jasper Payne[1] had only a few days before vacated the mission-house, which had been built on the west side of the Analoming Creek, where it is now crossed by the iron bridge in Stroudsburg. Apprehension of danger had been the cause of his removal, and it was fortunate that he had yielded to his fears, for otherwise he would doubtless have fallen a victim to the Indians.

The savages fiercely attacked the Brodhead house, but the master and his sons had barricaded it, and they made a vigorous defense, for they were well armed, accustomed to the use of the rifle, and, having had reason to fear an attack, they were as well provided to with stand it as any single family, within the walls of a log house could be. The Indians did not succeed in surprising any members of the household, nor could they steal up to fire the building, for eyes and rifles commanded every approach. The Indians were only made more fierce by meeting this strong resistance, and they patiently besieged the house, in the meantime, firing the barn and other outbuildings, Culver's mill, and the mission house, and sent small bands to fall upon the other settlers in the region. All day long, mingled with the sound of the crackling flames at Brodhead's, resounded the demoniac yells of the besieging savages and the reports of near and distant firing. It was a perilous time for the inmates of that little log house, surrounded by a hundred or more infuriated Indians, in an almost unbroken forest, literally upon the frontier, and far beyond the hope of succor from the larger settlements; but, if the courage of the small domestic garrison ever failed, their enemy did not know it, and they were obliged to disperse without glutting their thirst for blood. It was supposed that some of the Indians were killed by rifle-shots from the house, and it is not improbable, as the Brodhead boys were famous marksmen; but if any were killed it could not be definitely ascertained, for the Indians, as is well known, had a custom of carrying their fallen from the field.

The Culvers and Francis Jones, who was living with them, fled, and none too soon, for looking back when only a few miles away they saw their dwellings and the mill both in flames and the forms of men moving about the burning buildings. Thus were saved from the tomahawk and scalping knife eight persons, for the Culver family consisted of Ephraim, the father, Elizabeth his wife, Ephraim, Jr., and four girls. Together with Jones they journeyed southward through the forest with all possible haste, not knowing but that they might be pursued, and at length reached Nazareth where they were domiciled in the famous Whitefield House and remained for some time.[2] Jones was for a considerable period an inmate of the "Rose Inn."[3]

The alarming news of the attack on Brodheads was carried to Easton, Philipsburg and other settlements by messengers who spread consternation among the scattered people along their paths, and indeed created great alarm in the places mentioned whose citizens did not think themselves sufficiently remote to be beyond the reach of so large and determined a band of hostile Indians as was reported in Smithfield.

John McMichael, Henry Deysert and Job Bakehorn arrived in Easton from the scene of the outbreak, upon the 12th of December, and made a deposition of what they knew, which was sworn to before Justice William Parsons. As it forms a contemporary account of the first hostile demonstration of the Indians in the territory which is our especial province, and contains some items of information not heretofore given, it is reproduced as follows:

"The 12th day of December, 1755, personally appeared before me, William Parsons, one of his majesty's Justices of the Peace, for the county of Northampton, John McMichael, Henry Deysert, James Tidd and Job Bakehorn, Jr., who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose and declare that yesterday about three of the clock in the forenoon two Indian men came from towards Brodhead's house, who fired on these deponents and several others, who returned the fire and made the Indians turn off; and the said deponents, James Tidd and Job Bakehorn, further say that as they were going round the stack yard of the said McMichael, where they all were, they saw, as they verily believe, at least four Indians on their knees, about twenty purches from the stack yard, who fired at these deponents. And these deponents further say, that they were engaged in the manner aforesaid with the Indians at least three quarters of an hour; and these deponents, John McMichael and Henry Deysert, further say that they saw the barn of the said Brodhead on fire about nine of the clock in the morning, which continued burning till they left the house, being about four in the afternoon, and that they heard shooting and crying at Brodhead's house almost the whole day, and that when they left McMichael's house the dwelling house of the said Broadhead was yet unburnt, being, as they supposed, defended by the people within. And these deponents James Tidd, and Job Bakehorn, further say, that they did not come to McMichael's house until about three in the afternoon, when they could see the barn and barracks of the said Brodhead on fire; and these deponents further say, that they did not see anyone killed on either side, but James Garland, one of their company, was shot through the hand and arm, and further deponents say not.

"Henry Deysert,
"Job Bakehorn,

In another deposition sworn to at Philipsburg on the same day as the foregoing, before Henry Cole, by a young man who fled from the scene, it was stated that the Indians, as near as he could estimate, were about one hundred in number and "were in white people's clothing, only a few match coats."

As late as December 25th James Hamilton, writing to Governor Morris from Easton, where he had gone on a government errand, says,—

"We found the country under the greatest Consternation and every thing that has been said of the distress of the Inhabitants, more than verified upon our own view. The country along the river is absolutely deserted from this place to Brodhead's, nor can there be the least communication between us and them, but by large parties of armed men, everybody being afraid to venture without that security. So that we have had no accounts from there for several days.

"Brodheads was stoutly defended by his sons and others till the Indians thought fit to retire, without being able to take it or set it on fire, tho' they frequently attempted it. It is thought several of them were killed in the attacks, but that is not known with certainty."[1]

On the same day that the trooping horde surrounded and penned in the Brodheads and put to flight the Culvers and other settlers of the vicinity, a small band dissevered itself, and striking westward through the forest in search of isolated settlers whom they could murder and scalp, came to the new farm of Frederick Hoeth,[2] on Pocopoco Creek (in what is now Polk township of Monroe County). The family at this frontiersman's was gathered about the supper-table, unmindful of their approaching doom, when the Indians arrived. The house was new and the crevices between the logs had not been "chinked." The Indians, stealthily approaching and thrusting their guns into these cracks, poured a murderous fire upon the unsuspecting inmates. Two persons fell—Hoeth himself dead—and a woman wounded. Several more shots were fired, and then all who could do so ran out of the house with the forlorn hope of effecting their escape. The Indians immediately set fire to the house, barn and grist-mill. Hoeth's wife ran into the bake-house, which was also set on fire. The poor woman ran out through the flames, was very much burned, and in a mad effort to relieve her agony ran into the stream, where she died. The Indians drew her out and mutilated the inanimate corpse in a horrible manner—"cutting the belly open and used her otherwise inhumanly,"—said one who had cotemporary knowledge of the facts.[1] Three children were burned, one daughter was killed and scalped and two or three more were carried away into captivity. One of the Indians was killed and another wounded in this attack, but how is not stated in the brief cotemporary accounts of the affair which the old colonial documents afford.

Several families in the vicinity narrowly escaped the fury of the party who murdered the Hoeths. The Moravian records contain mention of one of them—a poor Palatine and his wife who arrived, famished and exhausted, at Friedensthal upon the 13th of December. It was late at night when word was brought the man that the Hoeths had been slain and their home burned. There was not a moment to be lost, and so, taking his wife upon his shoulders as she lay in bed (she had but lately given birth to a babe) he fled for his life,[2] as scores of others did, from all the sparsely settled region round about.

Nearly cotemporary with the last described atrocity was the affair at Philip Bossert's, at the locality now known as Bossertsville (in Hamilton township, Monroe County). One Mülhausen, a Palatine, while breaking flax on Bossert's farm, was shot through the body by an unseen Indian, receiving a wound which, it was feared, would prove fatal. One of Bossert's sons, running out of the house on the report of the gun, was shot by the enemy in several places, and soon died. Hereupon old Philip appeared upon the scene of action, and exchanged shots with one of the attacking party, striking him in the small of the back, and sending him away evidently much injured. He, himself, however, received a flesh wound in the arm. At this juncture some of Bossert's neighbors came to the rescue, and the five remaining Indians (for there had been a war party of six) made off. Mülhausen was taken to the Friedensthal Mill and received surgical treatment, but the poor man died on the 3rd of March following (1756).

About the same time a party of savages coming down the Delaware valley destroyed Andrew Dingman's house, in what is now Delaware township, in Pike County.

These attacks it must by no means be supposed were all that occurred in Northampton County, above the mountains, in the latter part of 1755. In fact they did not form a tenth part of the sum of bloodshed and burning and pillaging with which this unhappy region was afflicted. Of the greater number of murders which occurred in this desultory but demoniac frontier war no records have been preserved. Isolated cases of barbarity were lost sight of in the common consternation which prevailed throughout Northampton County, and, indeed, through all inhabited portions of the Province down to within a distance of twenty miles from Philadelphia; for while few murders were committed south of the mountains, the people there were constantly apprehending the fate which had overtaken their northern neighbors.

Teedyuscung's followers came down from Wyoming and the North Branch of the Susquehanna, lay concealed in the "Great Swamp" of Pocono—which then, instead of years afterwards, should have received its fitting name, the "Shades of Death"—and stole stealthily down upon the small exposed settlements, precisely as beasts creep at night from the covering darkness of the jungles, in other lands, to satiate their appetite for blood. Blow after blow fell upon the defenceless people, whose "plantations," as they then were commonly called, sparsely dotted the great wilderness of northern Northampton. Camp-fires gleamed through the forest from the Delaware to the Susquehanna, and ever and anon the more lurid flames which devoured frontiersmen's homes lit up scenes of savage carnage which almost affrighted nature itself; but they died away in the solitude of the wood-covered valleys and hills, and left only dumb evidences of devastation and murder, in the charred timbers of the cabins and mutilated human remains, which often lay until torn asunder by the beasts and carrion birds and dissolved by the elements.

So good an authority as the Secretary of the Province at the close of this year, 1755, in a paper[1] read before the Council, said:

"During all of this month, (December) the Indians have been burning and destroying all before them in the county of Northampton and have already burned fifty houses here, murdered above one hundred Persons and are still continuing their Ravages, Murders and Devastations & have actually overrun and laid waste a great part of that County, even as far as within twelve miles of Easton. * * * This is a brief account of the progress of these Savages since the 18th day of October, on which day was committed the first Inroad ever made by Indians upon this Province since its first Settlement, and in consequence here of all our Frontier Country, which extends from the River Patowmac to the River Delaware, not less than one hundred and fifty miles in length and between twenty and thirty in breadth, but not fully settled, has been entirely deserted, the Houses and Improvements reduced to Ashes, the Cattle, Horses, Grain, Goods & Effects of the Inhabitants either destroyed, burned or carried off by the Indians. Whilst the Poor Planters, with their Wives, Children and Servants, who could get away, being without arms or any kind of Defence have been obliged in this severe season of the year to abandon their Habitations naked and without any support, and throw themselves on the Charity of the other Inhabitants within the Interior Parts of the Province upon whom they are a heavy Burthen.

"Such shocking Descriptions are given by those who have escaped of the horrid Cruelties and indecencies committed by these merciless Savages on the Bodies of the unhappy wretches who fell into their Barbarous hands, especially the Women, without regard to Sex or Age as far exceeds those related of the most abandoned Pirates; Which has occasioned a general consternation and has struck so great a Panic and Damp upon the spirits of the People, that hitherto they have not been able to make any considerable resistance or stand against the Indians."

As one after another the savage strokes of death and destruction fell upon the exposed settlements, the people who escaped fled to Easton and the Moravian towns, which became literally asylums for these distressed people, driven from their homes.

The precipitate evacuation of the country began on the night of the Gnadenhutten massacre and received a fresh impetus with every appearance of the savages. Every day during the last months of the year, some poor, terrified, travel-worn fugitives were received in the older and larger settlements. "They came," says one chronicler, "like hound-driven sheep, a motley crowd of men, women and children—Palatines, many of them, with uncouth names; some of them, as we read, 'with clothes not fit to be seen of mankind;' and some with scarce a sufficiency of rags to cover their nakedness." And so it came about that, upon the 29th of January, 1756, there were almost five hundred refugees in the Moravian settlements alone—two hundred and fifty-three at Nazareth, fifty-two at Gnadenthal, forty-eight at Christians' Spring, twenty-one at "The Rose Inn" and seventy-five at Friedensthal. Of this number two hundred and twenty-six were children.[2] The year had closed gloomily enough, for even the Moravian settlements, far below the mountains, had been threatened, and their inhabitants had good grounds for apprehending that the threats would be carried out. The country north of the mountains was almost completely deserted, and there were evidences of devastation in nearly every locality, which, at the opening of the year, had shown only signs of peace and prosperity springing up where had fallen the first footprints of civilization.

But during this time of terror the provincial government (as heretofore indicated) had not been idle, and the best measures possible for protecting the frontier had been resorted to.

Governor Robert Hunter Morris had, in conjunction with the council, taken action toward placing the province on a war footing immediately after the massacre at Gnadenhutten. It was then that Benjamin Franklin, metaphorically at least, doffed the philosopher's gown and donned the soldier's garb, becoming one of the chief agents of the governor in planning and executing measures for the defense of the frontier. He was appointed early in December, 1755, and he lost no time in undertaking the work entrusted to him. He arrived at Bethlehem upon the eighteenth of the month, with Commissioners Hamilton and Fox, escorted by Captain Trump's company of fifty men from Bucks County, whose "arms, ammunition and blankets, and a hogshead of rum for their use, had been forwarded to Easton in advance."

Franklin divided his time between Easton and Bethlehem, making his headquarters at the latter place from the 7th to the 15th of January. He was to secure the erection of several forts in a line of extend from the Delaware to the Susquehanna, on a line north of and parallel to the Blue Mountains, and to raise troops to garrison them. "I had no difficulty," he says in his autobiography, "in raising men, having soon five hundred and sixty under my command." These soldiers or minute men were comprised in the following companies, viz.: Captain William Parson's company, twenty-four men, and McLaughlin's detachment, twenty men, from Easton; Captains Trump's, Aston's and Wayne's, of fifty men each (except the last, which contained fifty-five), from Bucks County; Captain Volck's (or Foulk's) company of forty-six men from "Allemängel" (now Lynn township, of Lehigh County); Captain Trexler's company of forty-eight men, from townships of Northampton (now in Lehigh County); Captain Wetterholt's company of forty-four men from the same region; Captain Arndt's, of fifty men, from Bucks County; Captains Craig's, Martin's and Hay's companies, from "the Irish settlement," in Northampton County; and Captain Van Etten's company of thirty men, from Upper Smithfield. Besides these, there was a company of sixty men from New Jersey, under command of Colonel John Anderson, and no doubt a number of smaller bodies of which no record has been preserved. Some of these companies served without pay and furnished their own arms and ammunition, but most of the men received about six dollars per month and subsistence.

Immediately after his arrival at Bethlehem, Franklin reported, by letter, to Governor Morris as to what he found there, and indicated his plans for the protection of the frontier. Speaking of the region which is the especial field of this work, he said—

"I have . . allowed thirty men to secure the township of Upper Smithfield" (the region now included in Pike County), "and commissioned Van Etten and Hinshaw (Hyndshaw), Captain and Lieutenant."

The sage, a little later, sent Captain John Van Etten, whom he calls "Vanetta," the following interesting letter of instructions, in which, among other things, he makes mention of a reward offered for Indian scalps:

"At Bethlehem, in the County of "Northampton, January 12, 1756.

"To Captain Vanetta, of the township of Upper Smithfield—

"You are to proceed immediately to raise a company of Foot consisting of 30 able Men, including two Sergeants, with which you are to protect the inhabitants of Upper Smithfield, assisting them while they thresh out and Secure their Corn, and Scouting from time to time, as you judge necessary, on the outside of the settlements, with such of the Inhhabitants as may join you, to discover the Enemy's Approaches, and repel their attacks.

"2. For the better Security of the Inhabitants of that District, you are to post your men as follows: Eight at your own house. Eight at Lieutenant Hinshaw's; Six with a sergeant at Tishock ——, and Six with another Sergeant at or near Henry Cootracht's; and you are to Settle Signals or Means of Suddenly alarming the Inhabitants, and convening your whole Strength with the Militia of your District on any necessary Occasion.

"3. Every man is to be engaged for one month, and as the Province cannot at present furnish Arms or Blankets to your Company, you are to allow every man enlisting and bringing his own arms & Blanket, a Dollar for the use thereof over and above his pay.

"4. You are to furnish your Men with Provisions, not exceeding the Allowance, mentioned in the Paper herewith given you, and your reasonable Accounts for the same shall be allowed and paid.

"5. You are to keep a Diary or Journal of every day's transactions, and an exact Account of the Time when each man enters himself with you, and if any Man desert or die you are to note the Time in your Journal, and the Time of engaging a new Man in his Place, and submit your Journal to the inspection of the Governor when required.

"6. You are to acquaint the men, that if in their ranging they meet with, or are at any time attacked by the Enemy, and kill any of them, Forty Dollars will be allowed and paid by the Government for each Scalp of an Indian enemy so killed, the same produced with proper attestations.[1]

"7. You are to take care that your stores and provisions be not wasted.

"8. If by any Means you gain Intelligence of the Designs of the Enemy, or the March of any of their parties toward any part of the Frontier, you are to send advice thereof to the Governor and to the other Companies in the Neighborhood, as the Occasion may require.

"9. You are to keep good Order among your Men, and prevent Drunkenness and other Immoralities, as much as may be, and not Suffer them to do any Injury to the Inhabitants whom they come to protect.

"10. You are to take Care that the Men keep their Arms clean and in good Order and that their Powder be always kept dry and fit for Use.

"11. You are to make up your Muster Roll at the Month's End in order to receive the Pay of your Company, and to make Oath to the Truth thereof before a Justice of the Peace, and then transmit the same to the Governor.[2]

"B. Franklin."

The frontier defenses which Franklin was called upon to establish, as before intimated, were to consist of a line of forts from the Delaware to the Susquehanna, but his responsibility appears to have been confined to those from the Lehigh eastward. He personally superintended the construction of Fort Allen upon the right bank of the Lehigh (where Weissport, Carbon County, now stands), and he exercised control over the location of Forts Norris, Hamilton and Hyndshaw, all three in what is now Monroe County, the last near the Bushkill, about a quarter of a mile from the Delaware. Brodhead's house at Dansbury, (on the site of East Stroudsburg) and Samuel Depui's, on the Delaware in Smithfield township, at the mouth of Mill creek were also stockaded.

The line of defense was also extended up the Delaware by the New Jersey people, while some block-houses were built along the same river in Orange and Sullivan Counties, New York, and one on the Pennsylvania side of the river in what is now Damascus township, Wayne County. This was at the mouth of Calkin's creek, and it was built by Moses Thomas and Simeon Calkins and their sons, who were squatter settlers there. During the latter part of the Indian war of 1755–1763, after the Connecticut settlers had located in this vicinity, the Indians gave them some trouble, and murdered at least one of their number.

None of these forts, or block-houses, above Fort Hyndshaw were erected under the general plan for the defense of the frontier, which was undertaken by the Pennsylvania authorities. Those along the east bank of the Delaware, in the Minisink region, were established by the New Jersey government, upon the representation of Judge Abram Van Campen, he having repaired in 1756, after the murders in Northampton County, to Elizabethtown, for the purpose of acquainting the provincial authorities of the defenseless condition of the frontier.

Of the forts within the territory of which we here treat, it is probable that Fort Hamilton, on the site of Stroudsburg,[3] was the first one built. Franklin writing to Governor Morris, December 18, 1755, says: "Captain Wayne tells me that Trump expects the first fort will be built next week." Captain Trump undoubtedly built it, and he had command of it for a time, and was there with a body of men as early as January 15, 1756.[4]

Upon that date, we are told by a trustworthy Moravian historian,[5] "a company of refugees set out from Bethlehem for the mountains, to look after their farms and cattle. Among them being Christian Boemper,—a son of Abraham Boemper, and son-in-law of Frederick Hoeth, who

[1] Similar information was furnished by Franklin to Captain Isaac Wayne in a letter or order written in January, 1756. "You are," he says, "to inform the men of your company that they shall receive a reward from the Government of forty pieces of eight for every Indian they shall kill and scalp in any action they may have with them which I hereby promise to pay upon producing the scalps."—*Penn. [3] The fort occupied ground which can now be best located by the statement that it is in the rear of Judge Samuel S. Dreher's law office, on Elizabeth or Main Street.

[4] While the men of Captain Trump's company were engaged in building the fort, and probably for some time afterward, they were supplied with bread baked in a large family oven at Nazareth, detachments being sent down from the fort regularly to convey it to their hungry comrades. had been murdered a month before,—and Adam Hold, his servant, a Redemptioner. The party and some soldiers who escorted them, fell into the hands of the Indians, near Schupp's Mill, Hold alone escaping with a severe flesh wound in the arm. The killed, according to Captain Trump, were Christian Boemper, Felty Hold, Michael Hold, Lawrence Kunckle and four privates of his company, then stationed at Fort Hamilton."

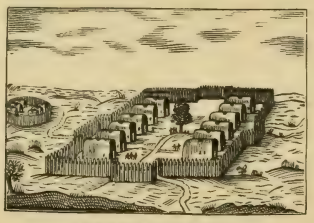
Franklin himself went to the site of Weissport, and built Fort Allen, which he named, as he says in a letter to Governor Morris, "in honor of our old friend," meaning Chief Justice William Allen, a large land-holder and the father of James Allen, who laid out Allentown. He left Bethlehem at the head of a little army January 15, 1756, and erected the work of defense during that and the following month. It was an oblong, one hundred and twenty-five feet in length and fifty in width, and was composed of a stockade twelve feet high, in which most of the palings were a foot thick. It had four bastions, on one of which was mounted a swivel gun. A well was dug under Franklin's orders, which is still in use. Good barracks buildings and a guard-house and magazine were erected within the walls. After he had been at Gnadenhutten nineteen days, Franklin returned to Bethlehem, and thence went to Philadelphia, and thus closed the brief military career of a man destined to achieve a vastly greater renown in civil life. He had no experience in actual warfare, but in the provisions which he made for the protection of the frontier, he exhibited the same strong common sense and varied ingenuity, which in other lines of action did much to make his fame.

Colonel Clapham, a New England officer, who had had much experience in Indian warfare was invested with command of the fort by Franklin upon his retirement. Later it had various commanders. It was regularly garrisoned for a period of five years—1756 to 1761 inclusive—and after the expiration of that period, was occasionally occupied by soldiers. Forts Hamilton and Norris appear to have been garrisoned during the same period that troops were kept at Fort Allen.

Fort Hamilton, which we have shown was built late in 1755 or in January 1756 was visited June 24th, 1756 by James Young, "Commissary General of ye Musters" who made a general tour of inspection to all of the frontier posts of Northampton and Berks Counties. In his journal he says: "At 4 A. M., sett out from Bossarts, at 6 came to Fort Hamilton at about seven miles from Bossarts, a good wagon road, and the land better than any I have seen on the No. side of the mountain. Fort Hamilton stands in a corn-field by a farm-house, in a Plain and Clear country. It is a square with 4 half Bastions all Very ill Contrived and finished; the Staccades open six inches in many Places, and not firm in the ground and may be easily pulled down. Before the gates are some Staccades drove in the Ground to Cover it which I think might be a great Shelter to an Enemy. I therefore ordered to pull them down: I also ordered to fill up the other Staccades where open."

"The Provincial Stores" on hand at Fort Hamilton, were "1 Wall Piece, 14 Gd Muskets, 4 wants repair, 16 Cartootch boxes, filled with Powder and Lead, 28 lbs. Powder, 30 lbs. Lead, 10 Axes, 1 Broad Axe, 26 Tomhaukes, 28 Blankets, 3 Drawing Knives, 3 Splitting knives, 2 adses, 2 Saws, 1 Brass kettle." "I found here a Lieut. and Eight men. 7 were gone to Easton with a Prisoner, Deserted from Gen. Shirleys Regt.[1]"

In April 1757 it was arranged that "the long frontier between Susquehanna and Delaware was to be defended by Col. Weiser's Battalion and all the forts reduced to three"—of which Fort Hamilton was to be one, with a garrison of one hundred men. Colonel James Burd who visited the Fort in —— says in his Journal, "It is a very poor stockade, with one large house in the middle of it, and some families living in it."



This Fort was named after James Hamilton of the Governor's Council.

Fort Norris, located near the present west line of Monroe County in Polk township on Hoeth's Creek, now called Big Creek—was probably the third fort built in the Lehigh—Delaware region, (Fort Hamilton being considered the first and Fort Allen at Gnadenhutten, the second). It was built early in 1756 and was named after Isaac Norris, speaker of the Provincial Assembly. The earliest description of it which has been preserved is that given by Commissary General James Young, who visited it in June 1756, and says in his Journal under date of the 23d : "At 8 A. M., set out (from the Lehigh Gap) for Fort Norris; first 6 miles a good wagon road, along the foot of the North Mountain, the other seven miles hilly and stony—passed three plantations on the road, all deserted and houses burnt down. At 11 A. M., came to Fort Norris; found here a Sergeant commanding 21 men, the Ensign with 12 men out ranging the woods towards Fort Allen, the Captain at Philadelphia for the people's pay since 16th; other Sergeant at Easton on furlough since 20th. This fort stands in a valley about midway between the North Mountain and the Tuscarory, 6 miles from each, on the high road towards the Minisink ; it is a square about eighty feet each way, with 4 half bastions, all very completely stockaded and finished, and very defenceable ; the woods are clear 400 yards around it ; on the bastions are two Swivel guns mounted ; within is a good barrack, a guard-room, store-room and kitchen, also a good well. At 1 o'clock the Ensign with twelve men, returned from ranging the woods—had seen no Indians. Mustered the whole, 34 in number—stout, able men ; the arms loaded and clean, the cartouch boxes filled with 12 rounds per man. Provisions, a large quantity of beef, very ill cured, standing in tubs ; a quantity of biscuits and flour and about fifty gallons of rum." The Provincial stores on hand were "thirteen good muskets (and many more not very good) 38 cartouch boxes, 100 pounds of powder, 300 pounds of lead, 112 blankets, 39 axes, 3 broad axes, 80 tomahawks 6 shovels, 2 grubbing hoes, 5 spades, 5 drawing knives, 9 chissels, 3 adzes, 3 hand-saws, 2 augers, 2 splitting knives"—a very well supplied armory and tool-house. Fort Norris appears to have been in all respects a model frontier post. Its commander was Captain Weatherhold or Wetterholt, a very competent officer. Young states that on his arrival at the fort the Captain had gone to Philadelphia. He had started and gone a few miles when he was overtaken by a messenger and being told of the presence of "ye Commissary General of ye Musters" at his post, returned. He proposed to go with Young to Depui's where he informed him his lieutenant and twenty-six men were stationed, and thither we follow them, stopping as they do at Bosserts, (which was a place of rendezvous and defence, most of the time during the Indian war, though not a regularly established fort,) and making with them a detour to Fort Hyndshaw.

"At 3 P. M., (June 23, 1756) says the Journal, we set out from Fort Norris. . . . At 6 P. M., we came to Philip Bosserts,[1] a farmer 12 miles from Fort Norris. Here we stayed all night. In our way to this house the road very hilly and barren. Past by three Plantations Deserted and the Houses Burnt down. In Bosserts house are 6 Families from other Plantations."

It was near here that Peter Hess, Nicholas Coleman and one Gottleib, were killed in February 1756 by a party of Indians, supposed to have been led by Teedyuscung in person. Hess' body was found in the woods two miles from Bosssert's on the 25th of June, when Young stopped there on his return trip.

From Bossert's Young went to Fort Hamilton early in the morning of the 24th of June, but, as we have already seen that post through his eyes, we pass on. The same morning, still accompanied by Captain Weatherhold, the commissary, went to Samuel Depui's, but as the lieutenant had not made out the muster-roll, he turned his steps northward and journeyed up the Delaware to Fort Hyndshaw, which he says in his journal, "is ten miles higher up the river." He says that there was "a good, plain road from Depui's and many plantations, but all Deserted and the houses Chiefly Burned."

Fort Hyndshaw, says Young, "is a Square 70 feet each way, very slightly Stoccaded. I gave some directions to alter the Bastions, which at present are of very little use. It is clear all around for 300 yards, and stands on the banks of a large creek and about ¼ mile from the river Delaware,[1] and I think it a very important Place for the Defense of this frontier. At 3 P.M. I mustered the people and found them agreeable to the Lieut.'s Roll, Regularly enlisted. . . . Found at this fort Lieut. Jas. Hyndshaw with 25 men. He told me the Captain, (Van Etten) with 5 men, was gone up the River yesterday and did not expect him back before two days. They had been informed from the Jerseys that 6 Indians had been seen and fired at the night before 18 miles up the River."

The Provincial stores here were "11 good muskets, 14 rounds of powder and lead, for 30 men, 4 pounds powder, 30 blankets." Young ordered more powder and lead to be sent up from Fort Norris. It may be added that the colonial records mention that the Fort was further supplied with ammunition from Easton, by Colonel William Parsons, in August, 1756.[2]

Captain John Van Etten, it may be remarked, appears to have commanded at Fort Hyndshaw until as late as June 14, 1757, when he received orders from the governor to remove to Fort Hamilton. On the 19th he left Fort Hyndshaw with all the baggage, and arrived safely at Fort Hamilton the next day. Lieutenant Hyndshaw came to the place seven days later, with a conflicting order from Colonel Weiser, giving him command of Fort Hamilton, but Van Etten appears to have remained there.

Just a month after Young's visit (July 24, 1756), Captain Van Etten wrote from Fort Hyndshaw of a collision with the Indians two days before: "On the 22nd, about fifteen miles from this fort, he sent out a sergeant and 4 men to guard some farmers in their harvest. They had an interview with some Indians who from their conversation (especially after a recent murder had been mentioned) excited suspicion and ran off. Van Etten fired at one, only partially wounding (sic) him with shot; Another Indian running off, 9 guns were fired at and killed him." This appears to have been one of the few instances of wanton killing of the Indians by whites.

But we return to Commissary Young to gain a first glimpse of Fort Depui,[3] the only one of the posts in the region north of the mountains remaining to be described. He came back to this place on the evening of the 24th of June, and in his Journal says:

"At 7 P.M. came to Saml. Depui's, Mustered that part of Captain Weatherholt's company that are stationed here, a Lieut. and 26 men, all regularly enlisted for 6 months, as are the rest of his company. Round Depui's house is a large square, but very slight and ill contrived, stockade, with a swivel gun mounted on each corner. Mr. Depui was not at home, his son, with a son of Mr. Brodhead, keeping house. They expressed themselves as if they thought the Province was obliged to them for allowing this party to be in their house; also made use of very Arrogant Expressions of the Commissioners and the People of Phila., in General." . . .

There were reported here only thirteen good muskets, but that number represented only those included in "Provincial Stores," and doubtless many of the men on duty here, as well as at the other forts, had brought with them their own trusty rifles.

It is quite possible that Young's unfavorable report on Depui's may have been influenced by pique at the manner in which he was received. Col. James Burd, who visited the fort on March 2, 1758, tells quite a different story about it, viz.:

"This is a very fine plantation, situate upon the river Delaware. . . . There is a pretty good stockade here and four swivels mounted, and good accommodations for soldiers. . . . Found here twenty-two good men, fifty pounds of powder, one hundred and twenty-five pounds of lead, no flints, a great quantity of beef. I suppose eight months' provisions for a company, plenty of flour at the mill, about 300 yards off."

[1] Authorities almost unanimously agree that the exact site of Fort Hyndshaw was on the hill in front of Jacob Place's hotel. It is said that there are still—or were in 1880—indications that the fort was thus located, in the marks upon the large maple-trees at the right of the road, after entering it from the river road, these marks being supposed to be the scars left by balls fired from a swivel gun in the fort.

[3] Depui's was visited immediately after the breaking out of the war, in January, 1756, by Captain Isaac Wayne, who went there in command of some soldiers by order of Benjamin Franklin, and thence retired to Nazareth. The Stockade was possibly constructed under Wayne's supervision.

Soldiers were kept at Depui's during the continuance of active Indian hostilities, and in February of 1760, Ensign Hughes was there with twenty-three men, and Mr. Depui was acting as commissary.[1]

The forts within the territory, which is the province of this volume, have now all been described. Those westward of the Lehigh and extending to the Susquehanna, and those along the New Jersey frontier, were similar in size and general characteristics. There were other places of defence—forts, block-houses and stockaded dwelling-houses in Northampton County, at the Moravian settlements and elsewhere. Of the lesser forts there was one at the Lehigh Gap, and one at Wind Gap, and several farmhouses below the mountains were designated as places of rendezvous in case of danger. At these a few soldiers, under a subaltern officer, were frequently to be found, as, for instance, at a farm-house at the Wind Gap, Young, in 1756, met seven men under one of Captain Weatherhold's ensigns.

Together these forts and block-houses constituted quite a formidable barrier against the incursions of the Indians. The most important function which the forts served, however, was to afford permanent places of living and retreat for the soldiers, who, acting as rangers, discovered the presence of lurking bands of savages, and, in a large measure, prevented surprises, such as those which cut off the frontier inhabitants in 1756 and threatened to depopulate the whole country. The soldiers of these little garrisons at Forts Hyndshaw, Depui, Hamilton and Norris also performed very valuable service in protecting the settlers while harvesting and securing their crops.

Notwithstanding the establishment of the forts and the presence of troops all along the border, and notwithstanding the fact, that peace negotiations were entered upon and a treaty actually effected in 1756, numerous murderous incursions were made by the Indians during that and the succeeding years down to 1763, especially in 1757. These were not so much of a part of general hostile demonstration as the former attacks, but were carried on for the most part by small, disconnected, predatory bands.

Soon after the first outbreak of Indian hostilities messengers were despatched to Teedyuscung with an invitation to meet his friends, the children of William Penn, and to tell the causes of his alienation from them. An appeal was also made to the Six Nations to lift up their authoritative hand and stay the destroyer. These measures ultimately proved effectual for Teedyuscung met Governor Morris in treaty at Easton, for the first time, in July, 1756, Governor Denny, in November of that year, and again in November of 1757, but it was not until October 26, 1758, that a general treaty of peace was entered into.

It was during the course of these negotiations, says a historian of Pennsylvania,[2] that Teedyuscung, the Delaware chief, succeeded—by his eloquence, by the weight of his personal character, and by the firmness and cunning of his diplomacy—in redeeming his nation, in a great degree, from their degrading subserviency to the Six Nations; and also in securing from the proprietary government, in substance if not in form, some acknowledgment and reparation for the wrongs done to his nation by the subtleties of the Indian "walk," and by calling in the aid of the Six Nations to drive them from the forks. He would scarcely have succeeded in securing these advantages, had he not been assisted and advised at every step by the Quakers and members of the Friendly Association, who were desirous of preserving peace and of seeing justice done to the Indians. They suggested to Teedyuscung the propriety of having a secretary of his own, (Charles Thompson, Esq.,) to take minutes of what was said and done in council. This was to prevent that convenient forgetfulness which often seized the proprietary secretaries whenever the proprietary interest required it. This measure was strenuously resisted both by the governor and George Croghan, but firmly insisted upon by Teedyuscung. The first council was held in July, 1756; but as the parties were not fully prepared, and the attendance was small, the more important business was deferred until autumn. On the 8th of November 1756, the Indian tribes, Delawares, Shawanese, Mohicans, and Six Nations, represented by their principal chiefs and warriors, met Governor Denny, with his council, commissioners, and secretary, and a great number of citizens of Philadelphia, chiefly Quakers. Great pomp was observed on these occasions. "At three o'clock," says the record, "the governor marched from his lodgings to the place of conference, guarded by a party of the Royal Americans in front and on the flanks, and a detachment of Col. Weiser's provincials in subdivisions in the rear, with colors flying, drums beating, and music playing—which order was always observed in going to the place of conference." Teedyuscung, who represented four tribes, was the chief speaker on the occasion.

"When the governor requested of him to explain the cause of the dissatisfaction and hostility of the Indians, he mentioned several,—among which were, the instigations of the French, and the ill usage or grievances they had suffered both in Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

"When the governor desired to be informed what these grievances were, Teedyuscung replied, 'I have not far to go far an instance: this very ground that is under me (striking it with his foot) was my land and inheritance, and is taken from me by fraud. When I say this ground, I mean all the land lying between Tohiccon creek and Wioming, on the river Susquehanna. I have not only been served so in this government; but the same thing has been done to me as to several tracts in New Jersey, over the river.' The governor asked him what he meant by fraud: Teedyuscung answered, 'When one man had formerly liberty to purchase lands, and he took the deed from the Indians for it, and then dies—after his death his children forge a deed like the true one, with the same Indian names to it, and thereby take lands from the Indians which they never sold,—this is fraud: also, when one king has land beyond the river and another king has land on this side—both bounded by rivers, mountains, and springs, which cannot be moved—and the proprietaries, greedy to purchase lands, buy of one king what belongs to another,—this likewise is fraud.'

"Then the governor asked Teedyuscung whether he had been served so? He answered, 'Yes -I have been served so in this province; all the land extending from Tohiccon, over the great mountain, to Wioming, has been taken from me by fraud; for when I had agreed to sell land to the old proprietary by the course of the river, the young proprietaries came and got it run by a straight course by the compass, and by that means took in double the quantity intended to be sold; and because they had been unwilling to give up the land to the English as far as the walk extended, the governor sent for their cousins the Six Nations, who had always been hard masters to them, to come down and drive them from the land. The English made so many presents to the Six Nations, that they would hear no explanation from the Delawares; and the chief (Connassatego) abused them, and called them women. The Six Nations had, however, given to them and the Shawanese the country on the Juniata for a hunting ground, and had so informed the governor; but notwithstanding this, the latter permitted the whites to go and settle upon those lands. That two years before, the governor had been to Albany to buy more of the lands of the Six Nations, and had described their purchase by points of compass, which they did not understand—including not only the Juniata, but also the West branch of the Susquehanna, which the Indians did not intend to sell; and when all these things were known, they declared they would no longer be friends to the English, who were trying to get all their country from them.'

"He assured the council that they were glad to meet their old friends, the English, to smoke the pipe of peace with them, and hoped that justice would be done to them for all the injuries which they had received."

This conference continued nine days, and at the close a treaty of peace was concluded between the Shawanese and Delawares and the English. The governor also offered to satisfy them for the land in the Forks and the Minisinks, but as many of those concerned in the land were not present, that question, at the suggestion of Teedyuscung, was adjourned, and was fully discussed at a subsequent council held at Easton in July, 1757. The old deeds were called for, but could not all be produced. Teedyuscung was well plied with liquor, and it was with great difficulty that the Quakers could keep him in a proper state to see clearly his own interest, and resist the powerful intrigues of Colonel Croghan with the Six Nations to weaken his influence. It was at length agreed to refer the deeds to the adjudication of the king and council in England, and the question was quieted for a time.

Another council was held at Easton, in the summer of 1758, having for its object more especially the adjustment of all differences with the Six Nations, as well as with the other tribes. All the Six Nations, most of the Delaware tribes, the Shawanese, the Miamis, the Mohicans, Monseys, Nanticokes, Conoys, &c., were represented; in all, about five hundred Indians were present. The governors of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, Sir William Johnson, Col. Croghan, Mr. Chew, Mr. Norris, and other dignitaries, with a great number of Quakers, also attended. Teedyuscung, who had been very influential in forming the council, acted as principal speaker for many of the tribes; but the Six Nations took great umbrage at the importance which he assumed, and endeavored to destroy his influence. Teedyuscung, however, notwithstanding he was well plied with liquor, bore himself with dignity and firmness, refused to succumb to the Six Nations, and was proof against the wiles of Col. Croghan and the governor. The council continued eighteen days. The land questions were discussed—especially the purchase of 1754. All causes of misunderstanding between the English and the Indians being removed, a general peace was concluded on the 26th of October. At the close of this, as at nearly all the other treaties, stores of rum were opened and the Indians present, as usual, soon exhibited its worst effects. Another council was held at Easton in 1761, concerning the Delaware settlement, at Wyoming, in which Teedyuscung took an active part.

Among the hostilities in the region of which we treat, not heretofore alluded to, and occurring for the most part in a period later than has yet been entered upon, were the attacks upon the Marshall family, the capture of the Kellers, the second attack on Bosserts, the killing of Sower and Klein, the burning of Brodhead's house, and several small skirmishes in the vicinity of Forts Hamilton, Hyndshaw and Depui.

The Indians appear never to have forgiven or lost sight of Edward Marshall, the champion of the "Walking Purchase"[1] of 1737, by which they were cheated out of their hunting grounds. He lived south of the mountains, about where the village of Slateford now is, and as early as 1748, seven years before the Indian war began, they had attacked his family and neighbors, and killed one of his sons. When the war broke out Marshall and his family, after being once attacked, moved across the river into New Jersey, but they returned in the Spring of 1756, and their home was again attacked by the savages in the Spring of 1757. A party of sixteen Indians appeared before the house one day, while Marshall was absent, and began firing upon all who were in sight. They shot a daughter as she was attempting to escape, but though she was pierced from back to breast by a rifle ball, she succeeded in getting away, and eventually recovered. They took Marshall's wife, who was not in a condition to make a rapid flight, and after leading her some miles away, killed and scalped her, and left her body in the woods. Thus Marshall suffered for his remarkable feat performed for the benefit of the Proprietaries, and for which he was never paid. He himself escaped the vengeance of the Indians, and although he had some hair-breadth escapes from death at their hands, lived to be an old man, and died a natural death.

In April, 1757, one Casper Countryman (or Gundryman) a lad of about seventeen years, was killed and scalped within three hundred yards of Fort Hamilton. Captain John Van Etten with seven men went down from Fort Hyndshaw, on the 21st, the day after the murder, and gave the body burial.

On the 25th of April, Van Etten sent Sergeant Leonard Denn and two men down to Depui's for provisions. They were waylaid by a band of Indians, and when within two miles from Depui's, Denn was shot and killed. His comrades fled and, reaching the fort (Hyndshaw), gave warning of the presence of Indians, whereupon, we are told, "The drummer beat an alarm and the neighbors all gathered into the fort.[2] Van Etten and seven men went immediately to the scene of the attack, and found the body of the Sergeant, "scalped and entirely stripped, and shamefully cut, so much so that his bowels were spread upon the ground." A wagon being procured from Depui's, the body was taken there, guarded during the night, and on the next day given "Christian burial."

Other murders were committed about the same time by small lurking bands of savages, as appears from letters written by Mayor Parsons, of Easton, to Governor Denny, enclosing depositions taken by him. We quote from one made by Michael Roup:

"The 24th of April, 1757, appeared before me, William Parsons, Esq., &c., Michael Roup, of Lower Smithfield, Northampton County, . . and did depose and declare, That his neighbor, Philip Bozart, being at Fort Norris last Saturday week, heard a letter read there, which was dispatched by Major Parsons to acquaint the garrison that he had received information that some enemy Indians intended shortly to come and attack the inhabitants at and about Minisinks, and to desire them to be on their guard, which was soon made known to all the neighboring inhabitants . . That on Friday morning last, John Le Fever, passing by the houses of Philip Bozart and others, informed them that the Indians had murdered Caspar Gundryman last Monday evening; whereupon this deponent went immediately to the house of Philip Bozart to consult what was best to be done, their houses being half a mile apart. That they concluded at last for the neighbors to collect themselves together, as many as they could, in some one house. And this deponent further saith, that he immediately returned home and loaded his wagon, as fast as he could, with his most valuable effects, which he carried to Bozart's house; that as soon as he had unloaded his wagon, he drove to his son-in-law's, Peter Soan's house, about two miles, and loaded as much of his effects, as the time and hurry would admit, and took them also to Bozart's, where nine families were retired; that a great number of the inhabitants were also retired to the houses of Conrad Bittenbender and John McDowell; that Bozart's house is seven miles from Fort Hamilton and twelve from Fort Norris. And this deponent further saith, that yesterday morning (the 23d of April), about nine o'clock, the said Peter Soan and Christian Klein, with his daughter, about thirteen years of age, went from Bozart's house to the house of the said Klein, and thence to Soan's house to look after the cattle and bring more effects. That about half an hour after the above three persons were gone from Bozart's, a certain George Hartleib, who had also fled with his family to Bozart's, and who had been at his own house, about a mile from Soan's, to look after his creatures and bring away what he could, returned to Bozart and reported that he had heard three guns fired very quick, one after another, towards Soan's place, which made them all conclude the above three persons were all killed by the Indians. And this deponent further saith, that their little company were afraid to venture to go and see what had happened that day, as they had many women and children to care for, who, if they had been left might have fallen an easy prey to the enemy. And this deponent further saith, that this morning nine men of their neighborhood armed themselves as well as they could and went towards Peter Soan's place in order to discover what had become of the three persons; that when they came within about three hundred yards of the house they found the bodies of the said Soan and Klein lying about twenty feet from each other, killed and scalped, but did not find Klein's daughter. Soan was killed by a bullet, which entered the upper part of his back and came out at his breast. Klein was killed with their tomahawks.

"The nine men now immediately returned to Bozart's and reported as above. Deponent was not one of the nine, but remained with the women and children; that the rest of the men desired deponent to come to Easton and acquaint the justice with what had happened; that the nine men did not think it safe to bury the dead, &c."

An account of the killing of several men, soon after the foregoing occurrence, is afforded by George Ebert, who was taken prisoner at the same time, but, escaping, returned in June, and made a deposition of the facts upon the 20th before Parsons at Easton. He said (in substance) that on or about the 2d of May last (1757) he, with about eighteen armed men, went with two wagons from Plainfield township to assist the inhabitants of Lower Smithfield, who had a few days before been attacked by the Indians, and some of them murdered, to bring off some of their best effects; that about noon of the same day they came to the house of Conrad Bittenbender, to which divers of the neighbors had fled. Here one of the wagons, with about ten men, among them Ebert, halted to load up the poor people's household goods, and the rest of the company, with the other wagons, were sent forward about a mile to the house of Philip Bozart, to which place others of the neighbors had fled, with such of their effects as they could in their confusion carry. Ebert, Conrad Bittenbender, Peter Shaeffer, John Nolf, Jacob Roth, Michael Kiersfer, one Keins and another man (whose name Ebert forgot) then went into the woods about two miles to seek their neighbor's horses, and were returning with them, when they were attacked, about half a mile from Bittenbender's, by fifteen Indians, who fired upon them, killed Bittenbender, Jacob Roth and John Nolf (as the deponent believed), and took Peter Shaeffer, who had received two flesh wounds, and himself, Ebert, prisoners, and set off immediately for the north.

On the evening of the next day they fell in with another party of about twenty-four Indians, who had Abraham Miller and his mother and Adam Snell's daughter prisoners, and that night they marched on together as far as Diahoga (Tioga), where they separated, the other prisoners, with the exception of Abraham Miller, being taken away and never afterward seen by Ebert. When they had gone about a day's journey beyond Tioga, the Indians, on encamping, loosed the two prisoners, whom they had before bound every night, and finding themselves at liberty, Miller and Ebert made their escape in the night. They fled to Tioga, where they were concealed for four weeks by French Margaret, and then, on her advice, made their way homeward. They were assisted and directed on their way by all of the Indians "this side" (southward) of Tioga (which proves that Teedyuscung's followers were now observing peace, and that the Indians who were carrying on hostilities at this time were of other tribes, directly in the French interest), and they finally arrived at Fort Hamilton, after about seven weeks' absence.

Parsons also forwarded a letter about the time this deposition was taken, giving an account of a large body of Indians attacking and burning Brodhead's house (which, it will be borne in mind, was the scene of the first attack in this region, in 1755) and the killing of one Tidd.

This was an affair which occurred on the 23rd of June, 1757. Captain John Van Etten, formerly of Fort Hyndshaw, had then recently taken command of Fort Hamilton, and we find the following in his journal[1] concerning this attack: "In the morning, near eleven o'clock, the fort was alarmed by some of the neighbors, who had made their escape from the enemy. Five of them in company, near Brodhead's house (a mile from the fort), seeking their horses, in order to go to mill, were fired upon by the enemy, and they said that one of them, John Tidd, by name, was killed. Whereupon I immediately drafted nine men, myself making the tenth, in as private a manner as possible, and privately went back into the mountains in order to make a discovery, giving strict orders to those left to fire the wall piece to alarm us, if any attack should be attempted on the fort in my absence. There were but six men left at the fort. Coming in sight of said house, on the back side, I perceived some smoke arise near the house; then traveling about a quarter of a mile, in order to surround them, we heard four guns, the first of which was much louder than the rest. I expected the fort was attacked; whereupon we retreated about a quarter of a mile, and hearing no more guns, my counsel was to go to the house; but my pilot, who was well acquainted with the woods, thought it best to place ourselves in ambush, for they would come that way, he said. As we ascended the mountain in order to place ourselves, we saw the house in a blaze, and the pilot thought best to retire a little nearer between the house and the fort, where we might have a better view; and in the retreat we heard fourteen guns fired as quick in succession as one could count. Then we placed ourselves in two companies, the better to waylay them. The party that was nearest between the house and the fort saw twenty-seven endeavoring to get between them and the fort. I, with the other party, saw five more coming on the other side; we found that we were discovered, and likely to be surrounded by a vast number; wherefore we all retreated, and got between them and the fort; then halting, they came in view. I then challenged them to come, and fired at them; and although at a considerable distance, it was generally thought one of them was killed, by their squalling and making off. Then we all returned to the fort. Immediately upon our return, a scout of thirteen men from the Jerseys, who were in search of Edward Marshall's wife, who was killed some time ago, came to the fort, being led there by seeing the smoke and hearing the guns fired, who all seemed forward to go after the Indians, when I, with nine men, went out with them; but having got some distance out, they would go to the house to see whether the said man (meaning Tidd) was killed. Being come, we found him killed and scalped; his body and face were cut inhumanly. There were also some cattle lying dead on the ground." The next day Tidd was buried under the direction of Captain Van Etten.

The ravages of the Indians were continued during the summer and fall. Bozart who had made a brave stand and whose house had been a place of refuge for the neighboring inhabitants as we have seen, was finally forced to flee below the mountains. Even that region was not exempt from invasion, and several raids were made there in the fall of 1757. Among others who suffered there were the Kellers of Plainfield township, Northampton County, afterwards settlers within the present limits of Monroe. On the 15th of September their home was suddenly surrounded by Indians, while the head of the family, Joseph Keller, was away and his wife and two sons, Joseph and Jacob, were captured and borne away to Canada, the attacking party being one of the tribe attached to the French. Mrs. Keller was in captivity until 1760, when she secured her liberty and made her way to her husband and family. Joseph Keller also was restored to his home, but not until after seven years had elapsed.[1]

After 1757 the cases of Indian atrocity were few and isolated, yet there was a constant fear that the scenes of the preceding years would be repeated. Troops were kept upon the frontier and in 1758 there were almost four hundred men on constant duty in Northampton County. Captain Van Etten, at Fort Hyndshaw, had thirty men, under his constant command; Captain Craig, at Fort Hamilton, had forty-one; Lieutenant Weatherhold, at Brodhead's, had twenty-six; Ensign Sterling at Tietz's (sometimes called Teed's) house, at the Wind Gap, had eleven; Captain Orndt, at Fort Norris, had fifty, and there were various other bodies of from five to sixty men at other posts.

There were no soldiers located at Depui's during the early part of this year and the family appears to have had considerable ground for alarm and made an appeal for assistance. Early in June a wandering band of Indians, acting under the management of the French, came down the Delaware and created great consternation among the inhabitants. It was feared that the lower Minisink would be invaded, but it escaped that calamity. A letter from Samuel Depui to a friend of the Governor reflects the general feeling of fear that prevailed at this time and gives information concerning some affairs that occurred up the river,—

"SMITHFIELD, JUNE 15, 1758—AT NIGHT.

"Inclosed, I send you Captain Bull's letter to me, from Fort Allen, with an acct of Indians supposed to be on their way to this part of the Frontiers or Minisinks, which is much to be feared will prove most fatal to this part, as it is at present the most Defenceless. The bearer of Mr. Bull's letter informs me that he saw 11 Indians between this and Fort Allen, but he Luckily made his escape. To this he is willing to be qualified (sworn). I hope Dr Sir you will be kind enough to take his qualification, and Transmitt it to his Honour our Governeur with a state of our present Defenceless circumstances, interceding for us by imploring his honor to aid and assist us as much as in his power, as your influence I humbly apprehend is Great and yourself well acquainted with our Defenceless Situation. Much mischief has been done in the Minesinks some time ago of which I believe you are by this time acquainted. Last Thursday the Indians began to renew their Barbarities by killing and scalping two men and slightly wounding another in the Minesinks, and this morning we heared the Disagreeable news of a Fort being taken at the upper end of the Minesinks by a party of Indians said to be 40 in number. The white men it is said belonging to that Garrison were Farmers, and were out on their plantations when the Indians fired on them and killed them, whereupon the Indians marched up to the Fort and took all of the women and children captive and carryed them away, and last night the Indians stole a ferry Boat at a place called Wallpack; and brought from the Jersey shore to this side a large number of Indians, as appeared by their Tracks on the sand banks; so that we are in continual fear of their approach. I wish we may be able to Defend ourselves against them until it be in his Honour's power to assist us under God, he being our protector, and I make no doubt from the Fatherly care his honour has been pleased to exercise over us since his succession to the province, that he will be willing to acquiesce with your reasonable and just sentiments. . . .[1] "SAMUEL DUPUI."

Nearly five years of almost uninterrupted peace ensued between 1758 and the summer of 1763, when "the last act in the drama of the French and Indian War" was inaugurated by the mighty Ottawa chieftain, Pontiac.. While the region of which we treat—the territory now included in Monroe, Pike and Wayne Counties—was far away from the chief theatre of that war, it is indisputable that the several incursions of the Indians directed against the people of that region were brought about through the sympathy of disaffection, engendered by Pontiac's scheme.

The last act in the local war was a brief, but not a bloodless one. The Indians made their appearance in Smithfield and they struck a savage blow in Whitehall (now in Lehigh County), subsequently attacked Captain Weatherhold's command, which had been organized to punish them, on the Lehigh, at John Stenton's, and sent marauding bands against numerous isolated settlements, among them that on the Upper Delaware, in what is now Damascus township, Wayne County, and along the east bank, in Sullivan County, New York, a region which had only six years before received (upon the Pennsylvania side) its first settlers.[2]

The ensuing months were months of harassing anxiety for the inhabitants of the older settlements, who had known the terrors of Indian war in 1755–56–57, but they promptly took steps towards strengthening themselves for the apprehended onslaught. The troops had been for the most part withdrawn from the forts and block-houses, and the people, rejoicing in the sense of security and freedom, had actively resumed the avocations of peace. But now all was changed; Bethlehem, long quiet, again resounded with the tramp of soldiery; there was a stir in Easton, Allentown and all of the lesser villages of the Northampton frontier, while everywhere throughout the threatened region the inhabitants again took up arms, formed military companies (where they were numerous enough) and resorted to all of the precautions they had learned to practice during Teedyuscung's war.

In Smithfield a military company was formed, with John Van Campen as captain—for which there was fortunately little service and no actual war. A record of the organization of this volunteer company, in the form of a memorial to the provincial authorities, has been preserved and is of interest. It reads as follows:

"LOWER SMITHFIELD 1st September 1763

"To the Honorable James Hamilton Esq' Lieutenant Governor and Commander in Chief of the Province of Pennsylvania:

The apprehended attack was not made.

The settlers upon the upper Delaware did not escape so lightly as those in the Minisink region, and, indeed, sustained a very heavy stroke. As we have already seen, a block-house was built at the mouth of Calkin's Creek (in the present boundaries of Damascus township, Wayne County) in 1755, and Joseph Skinner had fallen a victim to the Indians there as early as 1759 or 1760. The savages appear, however, to have had no general enmity toward the Cushutunk settlers or those on the opposite bank of the river, and they escaped molestation during the dark period in which the inhabitants of the lower part of Northampton County were constantly scourged. They lived beyond the limits of the lands of which the Delawares claimed they had been deprived by fraud, and they had secured, in 1754, a more or less clear title to their lands from the Six Nations.[1] Still it is probable that the Delaware followers of Teedyuscung, if not wholly responsible for the attack on Cushutunk and Cochecton, and the settlements on the east side of the Delaware down to the Lackawaxen, were at least concerned in it. The chief had been killed by or at the instigation of some of the Six Nation Indians, on April 19, 1763, and his disaffected people, released from his restraining influence, may have very naturally looked upon the extinction of the white settlements placed, by Iroquois influence, upon lands which they themselves claimed to own, as a legitimate mode of retaliation. Beyond this, they were actuated by a general thirst for blood.

However probable or improbable these conjectures may be, it is a fact that the Indian party who marched against the Cushutunk settlement came from Wyoming by way of the Lackawaxen, and thence up the Delaware, hoping, no doubt, to hem in the inhabitants and cut off communication between them and the people of the Minisink region southward—the region around and below the site of Port Jervis.

The time of the attack was the fall of 1763. The settlement on the Pennsylvania side of the river then included about thirty log houses, a block-house, and—according to some authorities—a grist and saw-mill, and there were a much larger number of houses upon the New York side of the river, extending from opposite the cluster of habitations at Cushutunk—from Cochecton, N. Y.—quite down to the Lackawaxen. The people of Cushutunk, being apprised of the approach of the war-party by fugitives from below, and warned to prepare for an attack, repaired to the block-house at the mouth of Calkin's Creek, and made preparations to stand a siege. Besides the women and children, there were but three persons in the immediate vicinity of the block-house—Moses Thomas, Sr., Hilkiah Willis, who had come up with his family from Narrowsburg, and one Witters. The Indians did not make an attack as soon as had been apprehended, and the people were thus thrown off their guard. The enemy had reached the neighborhood, however, and the woods were full of skulking savages. Suddenly they appeared near the little fort, and in the first onslaught Thomas and Willis, who had been out on a reconnoissance, were killed. Witters succeeded in reaching the block-house, and he and the women and children then bravely defended it, and by subterfuges led the Indians to think that it contained a far more formidable garrison than was the case. Witters sent a boy, Moses Thomas[2] (second) to the neighborhood northward to inform the people of approaching danger, and they fled through the wilderness to Esopus (Kingston). He also sent two boys, Elias Thomas and Jacob Denny, neither of whom was over eleven years of age, to the Minisink region for aid. All day and all night long the little garrison, consisting of several women and children and one man, Witters, stood at the loopholes of the block-house, guns in hand, and watched their stealthy foes moving about the besieged house under cover of the trees and bushes and the darkness. Once they tried to fire some straw, which had been stacked against or near the side of the house, and almost succeeded, but the Indian who attempted the deed fell, before he accomplished it, a victim to Witter's rifle. This intimidated the other Indians to such a degree that, as the siege seemed hopeless, they made preparations to move off. They did not do this, however, until they had secured the body of the dead Indian and burned all of the undefended buildings.

Upon the second day men came up from the Minisink in canoes, the boys having reached there safely and given the alarm. The dead bodies of Thomas and Ellis were buried and the survivors taken down the river, where they were safe from any repetition of the attack, which had so nearly proved fatal to all. It is said that when the party set off in the canoes an idiot child was left behind, notwithstanding the entreaties of its mother that it should be taken, and that the bones of this child, so cruelly abandoned, were subsequently found near the block-house and buried.[1]

Several settlers between Cochecton and Narrowsburg were killed and a number of houses burned while the Indians were making their way up the river. There were living at the time in this locality a few peaceable Indians called Cushutunks, who condemned this unprovoked attack upon the whites, and promised, in case of another incursion, to assist the settlers.

It was the outbreak of 1763 which led John Penn, a grandson of the good William, he being Lieutenant-Governor of the province, to offer, in 1764, a large bounty for Indian scalps. This action is sometimes erroneously alluded to as the first offer by the English of money premiums for the killing of their savage enemies; but, as a matter of fact, Benjamin Franklin made a similar proposition to pay for scalps nine years before,[2] though he fixed the bounty at only forty dollars, about one-third of the sum offered by John Penn, and did not make it apply to females and children, as did the latter. The bounties announced by Penn were: "For every male above the age of ten years captured, $150; scalped, being killed, $134; for every female Indian enemy and every male under the age of ten years captured, $130; for every female above the age of ten years scalped, being killed, $30."

Happily the Indian war was concluded before the promulgation of this inhuman scalp bounty, and an era of peace inaugurated, which was not broken until the War of the Revolution opened; and the struggling colonists, in addition to fighting the soldiers of the crown, had to watch the powerful Six Nations, who were incited to frequent hostilities by the machinations of the British and Tories. Then, again, the settlers in Northern Northampton—in the region now included in the three counties which form the subject of this work—suffered the frequent asperities and terrors of Indian war.

CHAPTER V.

Connecticut Men Settle on the Upper Delaware—Cushutunk, Wyoming and Wallenpaupack, or "Lackawack" Settlements—The "Pennamite War."

WHILE the Minisink, first settled upon the Pennsylvania side in 1727, had received small but constant accessions of population from the Water Gap to the site of Port Jervis, and had a fixed and quite numerous population by the middle of the eighteenth century, the region of the Upper Delaware, or at least its west bank, and all of the territory between the Wallenpaupack and the Lackawaxen on the south and the New York State line on the north—a region practically commensurate with the present county of Wayne—was still a pristine wilderness, its soil untouched by the white man's foot, its forests unscathed by his axe and "clearing fire." It was the disputed hunting-ground of the Lenni Lenape, or Delawares and the Iroquois or Six Nations, but the civilized race had not yet contested with the savage, its ownership or possession.

But in the year 1757—just thirty years after the first authenticated settlement of the Lower Pennsylvania Minisink—in June, when nature had arrived at the full sumptuousness of life, even as it had for countless years of immemorial, unhistoric time, a little settlement was indented upon the eastern border of this vernal-clad, unknown land. The strokes of the axe resounded along the river and through the dusky aisles of the forest, and soon the smoke curled upward from the stick and stone chimneys of a half-dozen small, rude, log cabins. The settlers were Daniel Skinner[1] and his sons and possibly a few others, from the town of Preston, New London County, Connecticut. Cushutunk, as they called their settlement, after an Indian village then existing, or said by tradidition to have existed at this locality, was a mere dot of civilization, made with the most humble beginning, and containing three years later, according to good authorities, less than thirty families.

Insignificant as it was, however, in numbers and in individual importance, this little frontier outpost involved momentous issues. It was the first, the pioneer settlement of the Connecticut people within the boundaries of Penn's province,—the initial movement in that general and systematic intrusion which resulted in the settlement of Wyoming and Wallenpaupack, or "Lackawack," the establishment of a Connecticut county on Pennsylvania soil, a determined effort to dismember the State, and all of the varied acts, the dissension and strife and bloodshed of what has been commonly called the "Pennamite War."

Cushutunk and Wyoming were established under the auspices of two separate companies, both of which originated in Connecticut, and were actuated by a common purpose—the colonization of Northern Pennsylvania under the claim that it was covered by the Connecticut charter. Wyoming was founded by what was known as the Connecticut Susquehanna Company, and Cushutunk and the Wallenpaupack settlement by the Delaware Company, of the same colony. Both had precisely the same basis of claim and both sought to accomplish their purposes by exactly the same methods. The Susquehanna Company was the strongest, most persistent, accomplished most, gave the Pennsylvania the most trouble, and hence its action and its principal settlement, Wyoming, have been prominent in history;[2] while the weaker efforts and smaller accomplishment of the Delaware Company have been left in comparative obscurity, although, as we shall exhibit, there is much concerning the settlements of the latter in the colonial records and archives, indicating that the action of the company was of considerable cotemporary interest.

The authority, the purposes and the methods of the two Connecticut organizations being identical, they will, for the sake of convenience, and clearness be here considered in connection with each other.

To begin with, it must be stated that the contest for the possession of Northern Pennsylvania had its origin in the ignorance or indifference of the British monarchs concerning American geography, and consequent confusion in the granting of charters to the several colonies, several of them overlapping, and thus causing conflicts of authority over ownership and possession.

The charter of Connecticut was granted by Charles II. in 1662, and was confirmatory to the charter granted by James I. to "the Grand Council of Plymouth for planting and governing New England in America"-in 1620, and also to a deed given in 1631 by the Earl of Warwick, then president of the Plymouth Council, to Lord Say and Seal, Lord Brooke and others, by which was conveyed to them that part of New England afterwards purchased by the colony of Connecticut. The charter granted to the colony all the lands west of it, to the extent of its breadth, from sea to sea, or "from Narragansett River, one hundred and twenty miles on a straight line, near the shore towards the southwest, as the coast lies towards Virginia, and within that breadth from the Atlantic Ocean to the South Sea."[3] This measurement would bring the southern line of Connecticut nearly or quite to the forty-first degree of north latitude (upon or near which Stroudsburg, Monroe County, is located), and thus had the claim been maintained, Pennsylvania would have been diminished to the extent of over two-fifths of its present territory. The charter included an exception of lands "then actually possessed or inhabited by any other Christian prince or State," and under this exception the Dutch possessions of New York, or the New Netherlands, extending to the Delaware, were exempted from the "sea to sea" charter of Connecticut. The lands of the Dutch were never vested in the British crown until the conquest of 1664, and in 1650 articles of agreement respecting their eastern line had been made between them and Connecticut. On the conquest of the Dutch by the English—their lands having been given to the Duke of York (afterwards James II., brother of Charles II.)—the line established in 1650 was agreed upon as "the western bound of the Colony of Connecticut," as it was the eastern of the Duke's lands—a statement which was afterwards taken advantage of by Pennsylvania and construed into a relinquishment by Connecticut of all claim to lands west of the Delaware, although they had been distinctly included in the charter of 1662.

[1] It is altogether probable that Daniel Skinner had been here on a tour of observation as early as 1755. For details concerning the Skinner family and the early settlement of Cushutunk, see the chapter on Damascus township.

[2] At least sixty works, large and small, and of varying worth, have been written upon Wyoming.

[3] The vaguely-known Pacific was then so called.

By the charter granted to William Penn in 1681 by Charles II., he was invested with the ownership of a vast province—greater than the present State—having the end of the forty-second degree of north latitude, or the beginning of latitude forty-three degrees north for a northern boundary, and thus overlapping by one degree the grant made to Connecticut by the same sovereign nineteen years before. The Pennsylvania charter also included a portion of the lands before granted to Lord Baltimore, just as Lord Baltimore's patent had covered lands long vested in Virginia, and thus there was error all around. The King, however, undoubtedly acted in good faith, if in ignorance. When the Quaker petitioned for his charter it was referred to the attorney-general of the crown, Sir William Jones, who reported that "the tract of land desired by Mr. Penn seems to be undisposed of by His Majesty, except the imaginary lines of New England patents, which are bounded westwardly by the main ocean, should give them a real, though impracticable right to all of those vast territories."

Thus the seed of strife was sown far away across the ocean. The Connecticut people claimed priority and the far-reaching nature of their charter; the proprietaries of Pennsylvania maintained that when their charter was granted the eastern bounds of the Duke of York's lands (New York) had been decided to be the western bounds of Connecticut, which restored the lands westward of the former to the crown and laid them open to a new grant.[1] Beyond these conflicting claims there were many others, Connecticut asserting priority of purchase from the Indians (1754) and priority of occupation, Wyoming being settled by her colonists in 1762, while alleging that the Pennsylvania proprietaries did not purchase from the Indians the considerable portion of the disputed territory until 1768, and did not effect a settlement (at Wyoming) until 1769. In response to the claim of prior purchase from the Indians, the proprietaries asserted that in 1736 they had obtained from them the right of pre-emption of all the lands not before sold to them within the limits of their charter. There were still further conflicting claims and counter-claims, confused and almost innumerable, the more important of which will hereafter be alluded to.

It is worth while in passing to note the fact that confusion of boundaries and the world-old greed of land, which has actuated governments as well as men, led to a contest by four colonies instead of two, for possession of Northeastern Pennsylvania. Not only did Connecticut dispute it stubbornly, and long with the Pennsylvania government, but New York, in 1687, sought to have a portion of the territory annexed to its own, urging that "a line from forty-one degrees forty minutes on the Delaware (Cushutunk or Damascus) to the Falls upon the Susquehanna" should be the boundary line between the province of New York and "Mr. Penn's possessions," while even New Jersey, not satisfied with her "boundary line war" with New York, laid claim—feeble and short-lived—to a fraction of Penn's dominions.

[1] Argument of Mr. Pratt (afterwards Lord Camden), attorney-general to the crown, in reply to a query of the Pennsylvania proprietaries.

The Connecticut-Susquehanna Company was formed in 1753, and consisted at first of eight hundred and forty persons, including a large proportion of the leading men of the colony. Afterwards the number of proprietors was augmented to twelve hundred. "Their action," says Miner, the historian of Wyoming, "may be regarded as an unofficial popular movement of the colony itself."[1] Their purpose was to purchase the Indian title within the charter limits of the colony of Connecticut on the waters of the Susquehanna, and this they did at a council held with the Six Nations Indians in Albany, in July, 1754. The treaty was concluded and a deed executed on the 11th of the month. The consideration for and the boundaries of the purchased lands were given in the deed. After describing the grantors as "the chiefs, sachems and heads of the Six Nations and the native proprietors of the land," and setting forth that the same lies within the limits of the royal charter to Connecticut mentioning the application of the grantees being subjects of King George the Second, and inhabitants of Connecticut, and expressing the good understanding which had mutually subsisted between the parties, their wish for its continuance and the benefits which would result from a settlement, the deed contains these words: "Now, therefore, for and in consideration thereof, and for the further, full and ample consideration of the sum of two thousand pounds of current money of the province of New York, to us, to our full satisfaction, before the ensealing hereof, contended and paid, the receipt whereof, to our full content, we do hereby acknowledge, thereupon do give, grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm to," etc. (here follow the names of the grantees), "which said given and granted tract of lands is butted, bounded and described as followeth, viz.: Beginning from the one and fortieth degree of north latitude at ten miles distance east of Susquehanna River and from thence with a northerly line, ten miles east of the river, to the forty-second or beginning of the forty-third degree of north latitude, and to extend west two degrees of longitude, one hundred and twenty miles, and from thence south to the beginning of the forty-second degree, and from thence east to the aforementioned bounds, which is ten miles east of the Susquehanna River, together with all and every the mines, etc., and all the hereditaments, etc., to have and to hold the above granted and bargained premises etc., to them and their heirs and assigns, forever," etc. These boundaries (better understood by reference to the historical map) included the beautiful Wyoming Valley and a great extent of territory besides, stretching westward to the head-waters of the Allegheny, but no part of the region which forms the subject of this work.

The Pennsylvanians asserted that there were great frauds perpetrated in this purchase; that undue influences were resorted to, the Indians made drunk by one Lydius, an inn-keeper of Albany, in the employ of the Connecticut men, etc., etc.[2]

[1] Miner's "History of Wyoming," p. 68.

[2] These objections, together with some others advanced by the Pennsylvanians, were comprehensively set forth by the Rev. Richard Peters in a letter written to Henry Wilmot from Philadelphia, dated "18th May, 1774," of which the following is a condensation:

"I am desired by the Governor to give you an account of what I know with respect to an Indian Deed under which some private people calling themselves the Susquehanna Company, Inhabitants of the Colony of Connecticut, claim all the lands in Pennsylvania between the 41st & 42nd Degree of Latitude.

"In the year 1741 the Proprietor Thomas Penn went from here to England and from that time to this I have been well acquainted with all Indian negotiations and had great share in their management either as Proprietary, Secretary, or Member of the Council or as Provincial Secretary, which enables me to declare with truth that before the year 1753 I never, that I can remember, heard of any claim set up by the Government or any inhabitants of the Colony of Connecticut to any lands within this Province. In the year 1753 I received information of a claim set up by some Connecticut people within this Province by virtue of the Connecticut Charter, and that there was a party gone into the Indian country to make a purchase of lands between Susquehanna and Delaware, to begin at or near Wyomink. This alarmed Mr. Hamilton and others, and Conrad Weiser, the Indian interpreter, was ordered to give the Six Nations an account of this intelligence and to put them on their guard. Col. Johnson, His Majesty's Indian Agent in the New York government, was also made acquainted with this new project and the intelligence was also communicated to the Governor and Deputy-Governor of Connecticut, who both disavowed the scheme. In the year 1754 a Congress was held at Albany between the Six Nations

The Delaware Company, subsequent to the Susquehanna Company's purchase, bought with less formality the Indian title from certain chiefs of all the land bounded east by the Delaware River, within the forty-second degree of latitude, west to the line of the Susquehanna purchase, viz., ten miles east of that river. It was under the auspices of this company that the Skinner settlement, alluded to at the outset of this chapter, was made in 1757 at Cushutunk, in the present limits of Damascus township, Wayne County.

Both purchases were immediately made known to the Pennsylvania authorities, and, in fact, commissioners from the province were present at the Albany council. The Governor at once wrote Sir William Johnson requesting him, if possible, to induce the Indians to deny the regularity of the purchase, and he took various other means to defeat the Connecticut scheme.

The Susquehanna Company, having completed its purchase, concluded to divide the land into shares, which were to be distributed, and called a general meeting, to be held at Hartford, for that purpose. They had very shrewdly endeavored to interest Pennsylvanians, especially those of the frontier settlements, in their enterprise, and had succeeded in some measure.

In some localities such inducements were made that a majority, or, at least, a considerable number, of the inhabitants unreservedly favored the project and unhesitatingly decided to share in it. This was the case, as we shall presently show, in the old Minisink settlement of Smithfield, comprising nearly all of the then settled portion of what is now Monroe County, and, it may be added, that region had quite a close connection—friendly and unfriendly—with the affairs of the Connecticut-Pennsylvania settlements throughout the whole period of the Pennamite War. There were in the Smithfield settlement men of character on both sides of the controversy, among the most prominent of those steadily loyal to the Pennsylvania interests being Daniel Brodhead. It was upon a warrant issued by him, as one of "His Majesty's Magistrates of the Peace" that the messenger of the Susquehanna Company was arrested when he came to Pennsylvania to invite resident members of the company to the Hartford meeting, and appeared in that part of Northampton County over which Justice Brodhead had jurisdiction. He appears frequently in the archives of the State as a trusty guard of the proand the King's agent, together with the governments of all the Northern Colonies. Mr. John Penn and myself were sent from Pennsylvania as Commissioners by the Governor to this Congress and Mr. Isaac Norris and Mr. Benjamin Franklin on the part of the Assembly. Mr. John Penn was at this time instructed to make as extensive a purchase of lands as the Indians could be persuaded to part with and Belts were sent to the Onandago Council by the Governor to Signify his desire for another purchase.

"Accordingly a large Section of country was treated for, extending to the Western Boundary of the Province; a Deed was executed by the Indians and likewise another Deed confirming to the Proprietaries a former Deed which bound the Indians not to sell to any persons any Lands comprised within the bounds of His Majesty's Charter to the Proprietaries. The Indians declared at this time their absolute refusal to make any grant to Connecticut parties of any lands and declared in their Public Treaty that they would sell none of the Wyoming Country either to them or to us.

"This will show that at that time there was no Indian Deed made to the Connecticut people by the Onondaga Council and if any Deed is set up it must have been obtained in a clandestine manner from private Indians, It was currently reported that one Lydius, of the city of Albany, had, in behalf of the Connecticut people, endeavored by bribes and liquor to get the Indians to execute a Deed lodged with him for this infamous purpose. The persons to whom this pretended deed was made were private persons and acting in violation of their own laws and the right of the Colony of Connecticut to these lands, which Mr. Penn had purchased of them and for which he had given full value. In the General Treaty held at Fort Stanwix by Sir William Johnson, His Majesty's Indian Agent, with all the Six Nations, in 1768, the Indians executed a Deed to the Proprietors of Pennsylvania for all the lands within the bounds of this province so far as they had then Settled the general boundary with His Majesty. This purchase contains most or all the lands claimed by the people of Connecticut, the consideration for the same being the Sum of Eight Thousand Pounds or a like Sum, and in that treaty the attempt of the Connecticut people was mentioned and condemned. This treaty being deemed the basis of all matters relating to lands between the Indians & His Majesty, it was transmitted to the King's ministers & now lies among the public papers in the Privy Council, where it may be consulted.

"As it is supposed that the Susquehanna Company have assigned over their right under this Deed to the Government of Connecticut, I have been thus particular to furnish ample proofs for the invalidating of this pretended Indian Deed if it should ever be set up by the Connecticut Government."—Colonial Records, Vol. X. pp. 178–179.

prietaries' claims. At the very outset of the controversy he is mentioned, as giving valuable information regarding the Connecticut intruders, by William Parsons, who wrote the following to Governor James Hamilton, under date of February 8, 1754: "Having heard that some persons, under pretence of an Authority from the Government of Connecticut, had passed by Daniel Broadhead, Esquire's, in their way to Wyomink, upon Sasquehanna River, in order to view the Lands in those Parts, giving out that those lands were included within the Boundaries of the Royal Charter to the Colony of Connecticut, and that they intended, with a very considerable Number of Families, to go and settle there next Spring, and at the same time inviting the present Settlers within this Province, in their way, to accept of Titles under the Government for Part of those Lands, I went up to Mr. Broadhead's to speak to him and to be more fully informed of the matter. Mr. Broadhead told me that my information was but too true, and that some of his near neighbors had accompanied three Gentleman-like men to Wyomink, who produced a Writing, under a large Seal, which they said was the public Seal of the Government of Connecticut, empowering them to treat and agree with such persons as were disposed to take any of these Lands of them; and, since waiting upon Mr. Broadhead, the same has been confirmed to me by several other Persons of Reputation in these Parts. As I am very apprehensive this affair may not only be very injurious to the Interest of the Honourable the Proprietors, but that it may also be the means of occasioning very great Disorders and Disturbances in the Back Parts of the Province, I thought I should be wanting in my duty if I did not give your Honour this Information."[1]

That the New England agents interested some of the settlers along the Delaware in their land schemes, and that the danger threatened was appreciated, is shown clearly by a letter from Daniel Brodhead to the Council, dated February 21st, less than a fortnight after Mr. Parsons' communication. He says: "There has been and is great Disquietude amongst the people of these parts, occasioned by some New England Gentlemen, to such a Degree that they are all or the Majority of them going to quit and sell their Lands for Trifles; and to my certain Knowledge many of them have advanced Money on said Occasion, in order that they might secure Rights from the New England Proprietaries, which Right I suppose is intended to be on Sasquehanna, at a Place called Wyomink.

"At the time those Gentlemen were here, I was at a Loss how to act, least I should do the thing not just; therefore desire your Honour will be pleased to favour me with your advice, and depend I shall justly obey your Orders in case they come again.

"As I am conscious of acting with the utmost Honesty, both to the Honorable the Proprietaries in every respect and to every one in general, I am resolved so to continue."[2]

Further light is thrown upon the disaffection of the Pennsylvanians at Smithfield by a letter from Daniel Broadhead to Richard Peters, dated "Lower Smithfield, November 13, 1754," and he evinces in it a shrewd foresight of the things that were to follow. He says,—

"I thought it an incumbent Duty on me to inform you to what a Crisis the New Englanders have raised most of the people of our Neighbourhood to in Relation of their settling the Lands of Wyomink. As soon as I received the orders from our late Honourable Governor and Mr. Allen I communicated them to my Brother Justices and likewise desired their Assistance in order to suppress some Persons whom I looked upon to be busy in Seducing our people to join the New Englanders, but found those Parties concerned that by their Slackness the New Englanders have insinuated themselves into our People to a great Height, as an Instance of which I'll beg Leave to mention one particular: There were some Letters came from New England last Week intimating that Wyomink was purchased, and that Thirteen of the Sachems had already signed the Deed, at the same time desiring all the Persons who were concerned to meet at Hartford in Connecticut on the twentieth of this Instant, in order to have their Rights delivered to them. This occasioned a meeting in our Parts to the number of thirty who had already become Adventurers and lodged their money in the Hands of one Robert Parkes, in order to be conveyed to New England. Upon hearing of which I immediately issued out a Warrant and had him brought before me just as he was setting out on his Journey; after some examination left him in Care of the Constable to get Security for his Personal Appearance at our next Court, according to the directions I received from Mr. Allen; but instead of bringing me Security the Constable, who is a Party concerned, let him go, and Mr. Atkins who is one of our Magistrates, at the same time wished I would send him to Goal with said Parkes, and accordingly set off with him for New England as agents for our People. This appears to be a sort of Anarchy which, if not soon stopped, will, I am afraid, prove very detrimental to the Proprietors and to the Peace of this Province."[1]

The contents of this letter being duly communicated to Governor Robert H. Morris, he wrote Mr. Brodhead, expressing sorrow that "some of the People in his county were weak enough to be led away by the Idle tales of some designing Men from New England;" commending him for his action and urging him to act with increased vigor in the future.

The Pennsylvania government was unremitting in its efforts to thwart the plans of the Susquehanna and Delaware Companies. Although the former was the more powerful and better disciplined organization, it did not effect a settlement upon the lands it claimed until 1762, while, as we have seen, the settlement of Cushutunk was made under the authority of the Delaware Company in 1757. It was here, then, that the Pennsylvania officials had first to use or threaten to use coercive measures against the trespassers. Cushutunk was, in 1760, still an insignificant settlement, but it gave the provincial government as much trouble as a gnat lodged in the eye of an elephant might cause that mighty animal. Repeatedly the little band of settlers were warned to depart. Proclamations were made against them and officers ordered to arrest them, but so far as any evidence appears in the State documents, they were never actually molested.

On September 15, 1760, Richard Peters, wrote Lewis Gordon to go to "Cashietan" with two of His Majesty's justices of the peace, take down the names of all the people there, inform them that they were trespassers and warn them, under penalty of arrest, to leave the province.

Gordon, in answering Peters upon September 15th, says: "It occurred to me that if any of the people (of Cusutunk) should happen to be down towards the Minisinks, where they sometimes come to purchase some necessaries, the Noise of our Journey being spread abroad in the Country might reach Cashitunck before we got thither, which would in my opinion greatly disconcert us. For the people being once apprized of our coming (they to be sure) would not permit us to enter their settlements, much less acquaint us with their Names or anything else they could conceal. It was this Conversation, therefore, made me conclude it most proper for us not to go or appear there in our real Characters, but to assume that and the dress of farmers going in quest of Lands to settle upon, by which we might more easily introduce ourselves amongst them, learn all that was necessary, and then, if we should think it prudent, we might discover ourselves tell them our real errand and take our leave."[2]

All of which proves now, after the lapse of a century and a quarter, that Lewis Gordon was a very shrewd, fox-like man, and ardent in his loyalism to the provincial government.

Gordon, who was sheriff of Northampton, did go to the settlement in October, in company with three justices of the peace—one of whom was Aaron Depui, of Smithfield, and learned many facts, which he reported to Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton. As his report gives interesting and valuable particulars,—quite a minute description, in fact, of the otherwise little-known settlement—we give it almost entire. It is dated October 15, 1760, and reads,—

"The Report of the Sheriff and Justices of Northampton County.

"To the Honorable James Hamilton, Esquire, Lieutenant-Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Province of Pennsylvania, etc.

"We, Aaron Dupui, Lewis Klotz, John Moor and Lewis Gordon, beg leave to report to your Honour—

"That in obedience to your Honour's command, We having joined company at the house of Mr. Dupui, set out from thence on Wednesday, the 8th Instant, on our Journey to Cushietunk, where we arrived on Saturday following, and collected the following intelligence, viz.: That the Government of Connecticut, by virtue of their original charter from the Crown, about six or seven years ago, granted to a great number of Persons, not less than eight or nine Hundred, who are called Proprietaries of a large tract of land in the Province of Pennsylvania, extending on the River Delaware, 30 miles Horizontal Measure, beginning nearly opposite to Peter Kuykendahl's, in New Jersey, and so running northwards the said extent, and westward to a Mountain (Moosic range) lying something like half-way between Cushietunk and Susquehanna, in which Tract the Lands at Cushietunk are included, with full power to the said Proprietaries to purchase the said Tract from the Indians; That, in consequence of the said Grant, the said Proprietaries did empower and appoint two of their own Number, Namely, Eldrickens and Whitney, to purchase the same or part thereof from the Delaware Indians; the names of some of them follow, viz.: Mayhios, Mastohop, Attamesick, Westcrank, Christias, Mictauk, Wiselawah, Nolotock Pooth, the King Cattacool, Mawichcomet, Maudlin, Colvelateb, Makeshacomas, Quanaloch, Tangol, Metuxing, Monkychiss, Mechukings; which said purchase was made about six years ago: That afterwards a Second Purchase was made for the said Proprietaries by John Curtius & Peebody, Surveyor (who are also of the number of Proprietaries), from the said Indians, either as a farther purchase in extent or in confirmation of the former; that the said Proprietaries have selected a certain number of themselves whom they have appointed to be a committee to manage and transact all Business relating to said Lands, who have accordingly laid out and surveyed the same, and at Cushietunk have erected three Townships, each of which is to extend in length on Delaware ten miles, and in breadth eight miles.[1] In the Middle Township a large Town is laid out, consisting of eighty and odd Lots, two Hundred acres in each Lott, to each of which a Water Lott of ten Acres appertains; On the Lowlands are built three Logg Houses, one Saw Mill, one Grist Mill, almost finished, and about thirty Cabbins for working people; their number at present is about twenty men, besides Women and Children; about twenty more are gone home for want of Provisions; But they are in full expectation to be joined by One Hundred Families, at least, in the spring. That it is strongly affirmed that every individual member of the Upper House and Chief part of the Lower House of Assembly of Connecticut are interested and concerned in the said purchase; the Governor has not yet thought proper to suffer his name to be made use of, but his son, whose name is Fitch, is one of the Proprietaries; That the lands are sold for 8 or 10 Dollars in hand for 200 Acres, twelve whereof to be cleared and improved and a House built in three years, otherwise to be forfeited; That a large Sum of Money hath been raised and Sent home in order to sollicit a confirmation of this Grant to the said Proprietaries, or to get the ancient Charter renewed, which is said to be forfeited, and the better to affect the same, Affidavits (particularly the affidavit of one Thomas Nottingham, who speaks the Delaware tongue well, and negotiated this bargain with the Indians, and hath been of singular service to us in collecting these Accounts, having since quarreled with the Connecticut people) have been transmitted to England, of the said Proprietaries having purchased the said Tract of Land bona fide from the Indians, and of this Nottingham's being present when the purchase money was paid; That the soil of the said land is said to be good in general; of the three Townships, the upper and lower is said to be very good, the Middle township, where they are settled, being but indifferent. But the deficiency of the Land is abundantly compensated by the goodness of timber, especially the white Pine, hard Maple or Sugar Tree, Beech, Wild Cherry and Black Birch, the finest and plentifulest in the world; That a right hath sold here for £40; a right is supposed to contain 5000 Acres.

"Here follow the names of some of the committee who are also proprietaries, viz.: —— Fitch, son to the present Governor of Connecticut; Isaac Tracey, Benijah Geers, Gebish Fitch, John Curtius, Elisha Tracey, clerk; Benijah Parks, —— Peebody, Surveyor; Moses Thomas, Hezekiah Huntington, Esq., late Governor; Stephen Kinney, Robert Kinnsman, John Burchard.

"Here follow the names of some of the settlers: —— Stanton, —— Trim, Daniel Skinner, Simon Corking, who hath been a Justice and Lieutenant in Connecticut (a busy fellow and a ring leader), —— Holly, John Smith, John Corkins, Jedediah Willis, Jedediah Willis, Jr., James Adams, Benjamin Ashley, Nathan Chapman, Doctor Payne, —— Kellick. That having given these people previous Notice that we had something of importance to deliver to them, about a dozen of them assembled in one of their Houses, where Mr. Gordon addressed them to this purpose; That the Governor of Pennsylvania being informed that some people from Connecticut had presumed to settle themselves on lands at Cushietunk, within his Province, but without his knowledge or permission, and as yet not purchased from the Indians, had sent us (declaring who we are) to enquire if said Information was true, and if we found any person there to warn them off immediately; Which Mr. Gordon (after claiming as well those Lands at Cushietunk as the large Tract by said Government of Connecticut, laid out and surveyed on Susquehanna, as the undoubted Right and property of the Honourable the Proprietaries of Pennsylvania) accordingly did. To this it was answered that they claimed under the Connecticut Government & the Indian purchase, and that they would hold their Lands until it was decided by the highest Authority in whom the true title was vested.

Richard Peters, writing to Sir William Johnson, February 12, 1761, pointedly sets forth the condition of fear and disquietude that the settlement and the scheming of the intruders had caused. "The Connecticut people," he says, "are making their grand push both in England, for a new Grant from the King, and in this province, for a forceable Entry and Detainer of the Indian Lands, on no other pretence than that their Charter extends to the South Seas, and so, like Mad Men, they will cross New York and New Jersey and come to kindle an Indian War in the Bowels of this poor Province. . . . The Governor has wrote you at large on this wicked revival of the Connecticut Claims, and I wish either you or General Amherst cou'd fall on some means to have it laid aside; for it will breed a Civil War among our Back Inhabitants, who are sucking in, all over the Frontiers, the Connecticut poison and Spirit, and will Actually, in my Opinion, go into Rebellion in the opening of the Spring."[2]

The Governor, upon February 20, 1761 ("And in the first year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord, George the Third,") issued a proclamation to the trespassers at Cushutunk, enjoining all to immediately depart. It read, in part, thus,—

"Whereas, Divers persons, the National-born Subjects of his Majesty belonging to some of our neighboring colonies, have lately come into this Province and without Licence or Grant from the Honourable Proprietaries, or Authority from the Government have presumed in a body to possess themselves of and settle upon a large Tract of Land in this Province, not yet purchased from the Indians, near Cushietunck, on the River Delaware and in the parts of Northampton County, and are endeavoring to pursuade and inveigle many of the Inhabitants of this and the neighboring Provinces to Confederate and join with them in their illegal and dangerous Designs, and to assist in settling and holding the said Lands by strong Hand;

"And Whereas, the Delaware Chief Teedyuscung hath made a very earnest and formal Complaint and Remonstrance to me against the said Practices, insisting that the intruders shall be immediately removed by the Government to which they belonged, or by me, and declared if this was not done, the Indians would come and remove them by force and do themselves justice, with which he desired they might be made acquainted beforehand that they might not pretend Ignorance, which has been since accordingly done by my order,

"Wherefore, as well to assert the just Rights of the Proprietaries of this Province to the said Lands, and to preserve the peace and friendship which is now so happily restored and subsisting between us and the Indians, and prevent the terrible consequences that must necessarily arise, by their carrying into Execution their Threats of removing by force the Intruders of the said Lands, as also to warn and prevent any of the Inhabitants of this province from being unwarily drawn in to join the said intruders in their intended design of making settlements in the said Indian Country, I have judged it proper, by and with the Advice of the Council, to issue this proclamation, hereby Strictly requiring and enjoining in his Majesty's Name all and every Person and Persons already settled or residing on the said Lands, immediately to depart and move away from the same; and do hereby forbid all His Majesty's Subjects of this or any other Province or Colony, on any pretence whatever, to intrude upon, settle or possess any of the said Lands, or any other of the Lands within the Limits of this Provice not yet purchased of the Indians, as they will answer the contrary at their peril and on pain of being prosecuted with the utmost Rigour of the Law. And I do hereby also strictly charge, enjoin and require all Sheriffs, Magistrates, Peace Officers and all other His Majesty's Liege people within this Province to exert themselves and use their utmost Endeavors to prosecute and bring to Justice and condign Punishment all offenders in the premises."[3]

Prior to the issuance of this proclamation (February 10th) Governor Hamilton wrote a letter to the Governor of Connecticut, in which he bitterly complained of the settlers, and urged him to use his influence for their withdrawal from the province.

Teedyuscung, who, as we have seen by the Governor's proclamation, seriously disapproved of the continuance of the settlement at Cushutunk, again, in the spring of 1761, strongly urged its effacement. At Easton, on April 6, 1761, with other Delawares, in conference with Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton and Richard Peters, he said (through an interpreter),—

"Brother: you may remember that when I was here in the Fall of the year, I informed you that some New England people were settling the Indians Lands, near a place called Cushietunck, and expressed a great deal of uneasiness at it. You told me that you had likewise heard something of it and had sent the Sheriff and Magistrates of the county bordering on these lands to the place with orders to see what was doing and to warn any persons off whom they should find settling there. . . . I have not heard anything from you since that time and our People are become so uneasy at this new settlement that several of them are moved away to other places, and these now present are come on purpose with me to hear what you have to say about this affair." . . .

"The reason why we were so uneasy is this: About three weeks ago, Robert White came to our town with Thomas King, one of the Six Nation Indians, and told us that they had been at Cushietunck among these People, and that Sir William Johnson had sent to warn them off if they intended to settle there; If only to trade there he desired that they would use the Indians well, and give them no offence; but they made very light of it and said they would not regard either what Sir William Johnson should say, nor the Governor of Pennsylvania, nor the Magistrates, but only what should come from their own Governor. They said that they had bought the land from some Indians who were at the last treaty at Easton, and would settle there. They said, likewise, that in the Spring, when there should be plenty of Grass, they would come and settle the Lands at Wyomink, and that Thomas King had given them leave to settle the Wyomink Land, and if the Indians who lived there should hinder their Settlement, they would fight it out with them and the strongest should hold the Land. Robert White added that they told him that they should be four thousand strong in the Spring and would all come to Wyomink.

"Robert White told us further that they kept continual watch for fear the Indians should shoot them."[1]

Teedyuscung being asked how many Robert White found there, said that there were reported by him thirty families.

Shortly after Teedyuscung's complaint was made, the Lieutenant-Governor sent James Hyndshaw (of Bushkill) to Cushutunk to observe what was going on there and ascertain the temper of the venturesome Quakers. He set out upon his journey April 16 (1761), and, having returned, made report of it upon the 29th. According to this report he reached Kuykendal's tavern "on or near the River Delaware, at Mackhackamack, in Sussex County, West New Jersey," upon the second day of his travel, and there met one Halbert, who said that he was from Connecticut and was going with his family to live at Cushutunk. He learned from Halbert that some of the Indians living upon the Delaware, at or near Cushutunk, (and of whom the New Englanders, it was alleged, had bought their lands), had sent word to Teedyuscung that if he or his followers should make any opposition to the Connecticut people settling either at Cushutunk or Wyoming, they (the senders of the message) would join with the new-comers and settle them there by force.

Upon arriving at Cushutunk, Hyndshaw "put up at the house of Moses Thomas, one of the principal Men of the Settlement, and saw over the door an Advertisement, signed Moses Thomas, giving notice to all the Inhabitants of the Settlement that they were to meet at his, the said Thomas' house, on the Monday following, in order to Chuse a Magistrate and their other Officers for the ensuing Year, and also to consult on other Affairs relating to the Settlement." Thus early was the institution of the New England "Town-Meeting" established in this pioneer settlement.

It happened that Moses Thomas was not at home, and the agent of the Pennsylvania government found him "at work at a new erected Mill for grinding Corn." Thomas said that he "wondered the Lord Penn should send up there a proclamation threatening them with the Indians; that he was settled there under a

[1] Col. Rec., Vol. VIII., p. 595.

Connecticut right, which he thought a good one; but, if it should prove otherwise, he would take and hold his Land under the Lord Penn, it being all one to him." Some Indians who were present told Hyndshaw that if the Governor of Pennsylvania did not send the settlers away, that they would drive them out by force.

He learned that there were quite a number of houses in the settlement, but saw only four. In Moses Thomas' house he "observed that there were a great many Families, the Beds lying as thick on the Floors as they commonly do in a Hospital."

A block-house of good size was in process of construction, which the settlers said was for protection against the Indians, and they intended getting some swivel guns to mount in it.

On returning to Kuykendal's the agent met in all fourteen men armed with guns, who told him that they "were going with Captain Tracey, one of their head men, to settle at Cushietunck." Information was received from these men to the effect that another town had been laid out about eight miles westward of Cushutunk, that "lots for a town" had been laid out "at a place called Leighwackson,[1] within a Tract of Land bought of the Indians by the Proprietaries of Pennsylvania and surveyed for them in 1749, and that they intended to settle it in like manner under the Connecticut right." These reports the people on their way to Cushutunk had learned from the Indians, who also reported that the settlers had marked the trees for a distance twenty miles back from the Delaware.[2]

On Sept. 16, 1761, Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton, having in the mean time heard from the Governor of Connecticut, who, however, did not offer to recall the subjects of his government from the disputed territory, as he had been requested, and receiving the protest of the Six Nation Indians that they had never sold the lands in question, issued a second proclamation, similar to his first, enjoining the Cushutunk settlers to depart and forbidding others to intrude.[3] This proclamation had just as little effect upon the imperturbable "Yankees" as the former one. In the spring of 1762 John Jennings, sheriff of Northampton County, contemplating the arrest of the Cushutunk people, sent John Williamson up to gain intelligence of the number living there and other particulars, and Williamson, executing his commission, duly made a report on June 18th, which showed the sheriff, among other things, that the trespassers held him in contempt, and were as defiant as ever. Williamson's report reads as follows:

"16 Families are settled on the river; their whole settlement extends 7 miles.

who sent them—were in general scarce of provisions, especially bread—get their corn in canoes from Minisink."[1]

The first settlement at Wyoming was made in the spring of 1762—if, indeed, settlement it could be called in which the men, after planting, and, perhaps, securing some of their crops, retired to their Connecticut homes for the winter. In the following spring, however, they came back prepared to establish themselves permanently, bringing their stock, household goods and, it is probable, all that they possessed. But their hopes were doomed to early and sudden blight.

The Delaware Indians, who claimed the lands on the Susquehanna and Delaware, embraced in the Connecticut charter, averred that they had never sold any of their possessions on the former river, though they admitted that some of their lesser chief had, in an irregular way, granted a title to those on the Delaware, and they complained bitterly of the presence of white men upon these lands, which, they asserted, had been "bought from under their feet" of the Six Nations. The provincial authorities were constantly beset with applications to have the trespassers removed, and there were not wanting evidences that the Indians would take the matter in their own hands if the authorities did not intervene. Such was the condition of the Indian mind when Teedyuscung, king of the Delawares, was burned to death in his cabin on the night of April 19, 1763. While this deed was unquestionably committed by his Indian enemies, either by or through the influence of the Six Nations, Indian cunning ascribed the murder to the New England people. The people of the dead chief now became clamorous for the removal of the settlers, and several times importuned the government to drive them from the valley.

The Governor having, in June, 1763, received fresh complaints from the Indians at Wyoming that the Connecticut trespassers were still obstinately prosecuting their settlement on the lands there and at Cushutunk, thought proper, on the 2nd of that month, to issue a third proclamation requiring those intruders forthwith to remove from the lands. He also appointed James Burd and Thomas McKee, Esqs., justices of the peace, and gave them written instructions to proceed to Wyoming, and having convened the people settled there, publicly to read the following proclamation; to use the utmost endeavors, by expostulations and arguments, to prevail on them to relinquish their scheme of settling the lands there, and to depart peaceably without delay; otherwise to cause some of its principals to be apprehended and carried to the "Goal" at Lancaster:

"By the Hon. James Hamilton, Esquire, Lieutenant-Governor and Commander in Chief of the Province of Pennsylvania and the Counties of Newcastle, Kent and Sussex upon Delaware.

"A Proclamation

"Whereas persons, the natural born subjects of His Majesty, belonging to some of the Neighboring Colonies have, without any License or Grant from the Honorable the Proprietaries of this Province, made several Attempts in Bodies to settle upon a large Tract of Land within the limits of this Province not yet purchased from the Indians, lying at and between Wyoming on the Susquehanna and Cushietunck on the Delaware and in the upper part of Northampton County and have called the inhabitants to their aid in holding the lands; And whereas the Delawares, and other tribes of Indians and also the Six Nation Indians have repeatedly made complaints and Remonstrances to me against the said Practices and Attempts, and insisted that the Intruders be removed by the Government to which they belonged, or by me, and declared that otherwise they would remove them by Force, and do themselves Justice, but desired that the Intruders might be previously acquainted therewith; And Whereas Notwithstanding I have already issued two Proclamations to apprise the said Intruders of their Danger and to forbid their settling on the said lands and strictly enjoining those who had already settled to depart; yet I have lately received Information and fresh Complaints from the Indians that divers persons do still persist in their said Design and are now actually settling on the said Land about Wyoming and Cushietunck. Wherefore, In order to procure the Peace and Friendship between us and the Indians and to prevent the carrying in execution of such threats, from which I fear the Indians cannot longer be restrained, as also again to warn any of the inhabitants of this Province against aiding the Intruders, I have judged it proper, before using Force, by and with the advice of Council, to issue this Third Proclamation, requiring in His Majesty's name all persons already settled on the Lands to depart. And do hereby forbid all his Majesty's Subjects to intrude upon any Lands within the Province not yet purchased of the Indians. And hereby strictly charging all Sheriffs, Magistrates, Peace officers and other people within this province to exert themselves to bring to Justice and condign Punishment all Offenders in the Premises.

This proclamation, like those directed exclusively against Cushutunk, availed nothing. The few Connecticut people at Wyoming unfortunately did not heed it. The Indians were sullen. A storm was portending, and upon the 15th of October (1763) it suddenly broke. The Indians, without the slightest warning, raised the war-whoop and fell with fury upon the defenceless village. About twenty men were killed and scalped, and those who escaped a horrible death—men, women and children—fled to the mountains, and after long wandering in the wilderness, destitute of food and almost destitute of clothing, found their way to older settlements and eventually to their Connecticut homes.[2] This was the first massacre of Wyoming—not a part of the Pennamite War, but an example of Indian ferocity in the resentment of real or imagined wrong. The government sent soldiers to the scene of the massacre, but they found the valley deserted by the Indians.

After this terrible experience no attempt was made by the Susquehanna Company to settle Wyoming until 1769. In the meantime the proprietary government had fortified itself with a deed from the Six Nations and other Indians of all that portion of the province, not before bought, which lay in the limits of the Connecticut claim. This was procured at the treaty held in 1768.[3] And now commenced in earnest the strife, foot to foot and hand to hand, for the occupation of the lovely valley of Wyoming and, practically, for the possession of that part of Pennsylvania between the forty-first and forty-second parallels of latitude—the struggle known in history as "the Pennamite War." To give an adequate history of this long, eventful contest between the Pennsylvania and Connecticut immigrants would alone require a volume, and, for that reason and the fact that the leading events of the war occurred on territory of which it is not our province to treat in this work, we attempt only such a brief analysis of important general movements as is necessary to a proper understanding of local events which come within the field which is our subject.

Each party, at the opening of the year 1769, was pretty well prepared to assert and defend its claims. There had been action upon each side something like that of two armies in the field as they prepare to meet for a stubborn campaign. Of the Susquehanna Company's party which determined to effect the planting of a colony at Wyoming, Captain Zebulon Butler, a hero of the French and Indian War, was by common consent regarded the leader, if not actually clothed with official power. There were a number of other strong characters among the Connecticut adventurers, and they were not wanting in friends and adherents within the limits of Pennsylvania.

In Smithfield, on the Delaware (now in Monroe County), as heretofore shown they had active sympathizers, and in several other localities they possessed strength which they could and did rely upon. Miner says of Smithfield that "a number of its principal inhabitants united with the Connecticut people and entered heart and hand into their cause. The aid afforded by these Pennsylvania allies was of the utmost importance to the new colony. Benjamin Shoemaker, one of the Executive Committee, was from this settlement. John McDowell, a wealthy, high-toned Cameronian Scotchman, became a true friend to the Yankees. With Highland zeal he espoused their cause." With subsequent events in mind, he adds: "His granaries and purse were ever tendered to the sufferers with a 'Highland welcome.'"[4]

"On the other hand" continues the author from whom we have just quoted, "the Pro-prietaries designated their leaders and marshaled their forces for the contest." Charles Stewart stands forth most conspicuously upon their side. With him were associated Captain Amos Ogden and John Jennings, high sheriff of Northampton County. These three constituted the chief executive directory to conduct the proprietaries' affairs at Wyoming. To them a lease for a hundred acres of land at Wyoming had been issued, on condition that they should establish an Indian trading-house upon it and defend the valley from encroachment. Other lands had been sold on the express condition that the buyers should defend them with arms, if necessary.

These lessees with several followers were first upon the ground, arriving there in January, 1769, and taking possession of the improvements from which the Connecticut settlers had been driven in 1763.

The forty persons selected by the Susquehanna Company to found a colony arrived at Wyoming on the 8th of February, and found Stewart and his party in possession and well fortified in a block-house at the mouth of Mill Creek. The Connecticut party took possession of another piece of ground, built temporary huts for shelter, and adopted measures which cut the Pennsylvanians off from communication with Philadelphia or the surrounding country. Ogden and Stewart had been warned of the coming of the Yankees by one of the Van Campens,[1] on the Delaware, and had sent to Philadelphia for reinforcements, leaving but ten men in their garrison. As several days elapsed and no aid came, he had recourse to stratagem to effect what he did not dare try by force. He accordingly sent a polite note to the Connecticut men inviting some of their leaders to his house, under pretext of effecting an amicable negotiation concerning their respective titles, and when Isaac Tripp, Vine Elderkin and Benjamin Follett came over, Sheriff Jennings arrested them and took them to Easton, where they were thrown into jail. Their companions could have rescued them, but abstained from making any demonstration through fear of endangering their safety. They were bailed, released and returned to Wyoming. The Yankees increased their settlement after this, and Sheriff Jennings learning of it, went up in March, accompanied by Lewis Gordon, Aaron Depui (of Smithfield) and Henry Hooker, three justices of the peace, and, after breaking their way into a barricaded house, arrested the whole number present (about thirty), and marched them to Easton, as prisoners. They were bailed and returned to Wyoming, where, in April, they were met by a company of two hundred men, sent out from Connecticut. Having now considerable strength, they built a fort, and near it twenty log houses pierced with loop-holes, and now they seemed secure against the Pennamites, and for a time they were. Sheriff Jennings, who, with Ogden, had been for a time absent from Wyoming, assembled as many men as they could induce to follow them and proceeded to Wyoming, where they arrived on May 24th; but they found the enemy too numerous and too well fortified to justify an attack upon them, and returned to Easton, whence Jennings sent the rather discouraging information to the Governor that he "did not believe it possible to raise a force in the county strong enough to dispossess them, they being, by account, upwards of 300 able-bodied men." Two other and larger parties were subsequently sent out, to one of which, commanded by Sheriff Jennings, furnished with a large quantity of arms and provided with an iron four-pound cannon, the Yankees finally capitulated, after Colonel Durkee, one of their leaders, had been captured. Articles were drawn up, by which it was agreed that the greater number of the settlers should leave the country, a few remaining to harvest the crops, and in a few days over two hundred did depart for Connecticut. But they had no sooner left than a party, led by Ogden, began an indiscriminate plundering of the settlement. Cattle, sheep and swine, and property of all kinds, was taken possession of, carried to the Delaware and sold, and the men who had been left, seventeen in number, being thus deprived of the means of subsistence during the winter, were also compelled to return to their friends in New England.

[1] Chapman, p. 75.

Thus the scheme for settling Wyoming was again thwarted.

The Yankees, however, were not long inactive. In February, 1770, in connection with a number of people from Lancaster, they again appeared upon the ground, and they easily took possession of the fort, which had only a small garrison. Ogden remained at the place, with a number of his men, fortified in a blockhouse, which was besieged, and he was obliged to capitulate, and, with his followers, depart from Wyoming, after which his house was burnt in retaliation for the deeds he had committed the year before. This was in April, and in September following, after Governor Penn had issued a proclamation warning the Yankees to depart from Wyoming, Ogden led an armed party against his late victors, took several of them prisoners as they were engaged, unprotected, at their farm-work, and finally captured the fort, after killing a number of their garrison. Captain Butler himself would have been bayoneted by the attacking party after they had gained an entrance had it not been for Captain Craig, who commanded a detachment of Ogden's men. During this siege the Wyoming men attempted to send messengers to Cushutunk, but the paths were watched by Ogden's scouts, who captured them.

From this time on until 1773, when a brief peace ensued, there was almost constant warfare at Wyoming, the parties rapidly alternating in ascendency, sometimes one and sometimes the other being in possession.

A matter of interest in connection with these affairs, and which pertains more particularly to the territory which is our province in this work, was the appointment of Garret Brodhead and John Van Campen, of Smithfield, as justices of the peace to aid in enforcing law at Wyoming in 1770. At a council held in Philadelphia on the 3d of March in that year, the Hon. John Penn and others being present, we find that "The board, having considered the present state of the intrusion and settlements made by the Connecticut people on the proprietary lands within this province, were of the opinion that if two prudent persons living in the north part of Northampton County were immediately vested with the authority of magistrates, it would greatly conduce to the preservation of the peace and better execution of the orders of the Government from time to time, in defeating the measures of those people and checking the progress of their scheme of settlement on the lands at Wyoming and on the Delaware"—and the Governor accordingly appointed the two men named.

The same John Van Campen was engaged in guarding the roads east from Wyoming to cut off communication to or from New England in the summer of 1771. He raised a company for that purpose, at the request of Lewis Gordon, and wrote that "On Friday, the 9th of August, he went up along the Delaware towards Minisink, and by Saturday evening collected nineteen men, and marched them as far as his own house, and proceeded Sunday to Ramey's" (the vicinity of the Raymondskill, in Pike County). He sent a party of six men "to lay on Sheholey (Shohola Creek) road from Wioming to the Delaware, to prevent expresses going that way to New England."

The Smithfield or Stroudsburg settlements were frequently resorted to by the Wyoming people for the purpose of obtaining supplies, when, through the vicissitudes of warfare, they were despoiled of their crops, or prevented by Pennamite sieges from sowing or harvesting them. Thus in the month of February, 1773, the provisions at the Wilkes-Barre settlement were so nearly exhausted that five persons were selected to visit the friendly Scotchman, John McDowell, and other sympathizers in the region of Stroudsburg. In Miner's "Wyoming," John Carey, a lad of sixteen years, is mentioned as one of these five men, and we know from other sources that John Shaw (afterwards a settler within the present limits of Monroe County) was also of the party. "The distance was fifty miles through the wilderness; numerous streams, including the deep and rapid Lehigh, were to be crossed. Had these been frozen over, so as to be passable, their toils would have been sensibly mitigated, but the ice had formed on each side, many feet from the shore, leaving in the centre a deep-rushing flood. Stripping naked, tying their clothes and sacks on their heads and shoulders, cutting a way through the ice from the shore to the open stream, and from the stream to the opposite shore, they waded through, dressed themselves, and found warmth in marching rapidly. Arrived at the good old Scotchman's and sending in to make their errand known, Mr. McDowell came out, rubbing his hands in glee, bade them welcome, but in his Scotch dialect, broad as his benevolence, told them he had a house thronged with company on the occasion of his daughter's wedding. Among the guests were magistrates and others,[1] whose enmity was to be dreaded, if they knew a party of Yankees were within reach, but McDowell gave directions that they should warm themselves noiselessly at an outhouse, then take shelter in the barn, where comfortable blankets were spread on the mow, a most royal supper sent them, with spirits and wine; their sacks were filled with flour and their pockets with provisions. The four men took each an hundred pounds, young Carey seventy-five, and welcome was their return to their half-famished friends at Wilkes-Barre."[2] Similar visits, for a like purpose, were frequently made to McDowell's.

The peace which prevailed in 1773 was taken advantage of by the Connecticut people to perfect their organization and prosecute their plans for possessing and holding jurisdiction over their claim. In that year the government of Connecticut, which, up to that time, had left the Susquehanna and Delaware Companies to manage their own affairs, decided to make its claims to all of the lands within the charter, west of the province of New York, and in a legal manner to support the same. Commissioners were appointed by the General Assembly of Connecticut to negotiate with the proprietaries of Pennsylvania and to make a final settlement of all boundaries and claims in dispute. Having received their full powers, these commissioners, in December, 1773, proceeded to Philadelphia, and opened an amicable discussion of all pending issues with Governor Penn and the Pennsylvania Council. They returned, however, without accomplishing their mission, and immediately afterwards, in January, 1774, the General Court of Connecticut, in pursuance of the policy of exerting the authority of the colony, passed an act by which the country extending from the River Delaware westward fifteen miles beyond Wyoming, and in extent north and south the whole width of the charter bounds, was erected as a county named Westmoreland, and annexed to Litchfield County, Conn.

Under the influence of the general peace which had ensued, and the resolute policy adopted by Connecticut in extending the authority of her jurisdiction over the territory in dispute, the immigration idea was greatly stimulated, and settlers began to throng into the lands of the Susquehanna and Delaware Companies.

The Wallenpaupack or "Lackawack" settlement was made in that year (1774) in what is now Palmyra township, Pike County, and as it was within the boundary of the territory which forms our subject, and also an important settlement, we shall give a detailed account of it.

First, however, it may not be amiss to state that the encouraging aspect of the affairs of Wyoming as early as 1772 had induced some individuals to locate, in the summer of that year, in the general region of the Lackawack settlement (northern Pike County). In proof of this not commonly known fact we find that there was laid before the Provincial Council, June 20, 1772, a letter from Charles Stewart, bearing date of Easton, June 17th, in which the writer acquainted that body with the substance of a message from Garret Brodhead to the effect that "a considerable number of Connecticut people were forming a Settlement on the Proprietaries' manors at Shoholy and Lechawaxin, and other places on the River Delaware, within Pennsylvania." The Governor, by the advice of the Council, directed thereupon that a proclamation be drawn and published, commanding the intruders, in His Majesty's name, to evacuate their illegal settlement.[3]

[1] The Brodheads, Depuis and Van Campens were, in all probability, present on this festal occasion.

[2] Miner's "History of Wyoming," p. 141.

[3] Col. Rec., Vol. X., p. 50.

The Wallenpaupack settlers, or at least the majority of those who composed the colony, arrived early in 1774. It is possible that a few may have been on the ground in 1772, at the time that Garrett Brodhead made mention of intrusion upon the Lackawaxen and Shohola. The men composing the settlement, so far as their names have been preserved, were Uriah Chapman, Esq., Captain Zebulon Parrish, Captain Eliab Varnum, Nathaniel Gates, Zadok Killam, Ephraim Killam, Hezekiah Bingham, John Ansley, Jacob Kimble, Enos Woodward, Isaac Parrish, John Killam, Elijah Winters, John Pellet, Sr., John Pellet, Jr., Abel Kimble and Walter Kimble, all of whom returned to the locality after the War of the Revolution, and the following who did not return, some of whom were killed, viz.: Joshua Varnum, Doctor Amos Parks, Silas Parks, David Gates, Jonathan Haskell, William Pellet, Charles Forsythe, Roger Clark, —— Strong, James Dye, Nathaniel Washburne, Joseph Washburne, —— Fry, James Hallet, Jasper Edwards and Reuben Jones.

As if in designed and marked defiance of the proprietaries, this body of men selected for their settlement the Wallenpaupack Manor, which had been surveyed October 14, 1751, upon a warrant dated November 25, 1748, "for the use of the Proprietaries of Pennsylvania."[1] This was a tract of twelve thousand five-hundred acres situated almost entirely in what is now Palmyra township, Pike County, though a portion of it is on the north side of the stream, in what is Paupack township, Wayne County. The original settlement was wholly upon the south side of the stream. The location had been favorably regarded as early as 1762, when the first settlers were on their way to Wyoming. They followed the old Indian path from Cushutunk to the Wallenpaupack and found near the lower part of the manor an Indian clearing and farther up the creek the ruins of a cabin, in which the Carter family had lived for several years prior to the close of the French and Indian War, when they were murdered and the cabin burned. The main body of the Wyoming immigrants stopped here and encamped overnight. Pioneers were sent ahead to ascertain and indicate the way from here to their proposed destination. They followed the Indian path westward and lit a great fire on the Summit of Cobb's Mountain to serve as a guiding mark for their comrades, and towards it they journeyed, cutting a road as they went, and being literally led on their way by "a column of fire by night and a pillar of smoke by day."[2]

It is not improbable that the knowledge obtained at this time led to the settlement of Wallenpaupack. The little colony was within the limits of the Delaware Company's purchase and was founded under the authority of that company, though its communications and associations were always more with Wyoming than with its sister Delaware settlement at Cushutunk.

Almost immediately after their arrival farms were assigned to each settler and the work of planting and sowing was commenced. The lots were regularly surveyed and extended from the creek back on to the hill a mile in length, the width being graduated in accordance with the quantity and quality of the bottom-land. The settlement extended four miles and a half along the creek.

A fort was erected east of the line of the present Sterling road, about opposite where the old Wyoming road branches from it, six miles southwest from Wilsonville. This was a stockade of hewed timber palings, inclosing about an acre of ground, in the centre of which was a block-house built of squared logs and adjoining it upon the east side a guard-house. The block-house was surmounted by a sentry-

[1] This manor was, on February 21, 1793, conveyed by John Penn the elder and John Penn the younger to Hon. James Wilson, who gave a mortgage for it to the vendors. This mortgage was foreclosed in 1804, and the land was purchased at sheriff's sale by Samuel Sitgreaves, of Easton, in trust for the Penn heirs. The settlers at that time residing on the manor bought the lands of Sitgreaves, who gave to them the first title that they possessed.

[2] This road, which diverges from the Sterling road, running parallel with the Wallenpaupack, was subsequently the main thoroughfare from the Paupack region and Milford to Wilkesbarre, and is still used. It is said to have been very judiciously located.

box, made bullet-proof, which commanded a view of a wide scope of cleared land in all directions. The fort was so constructed that a rifle-ball fired from the high ground on the east into the fort could not strike the opposite side of the palings below the level of a man's head, and therefore the palings upon the east side must have been much higher than upon the other sides of the inclosure. When the Indians became hostile during the Revolution this primitive fort served a very useful purpose, for without its protection the inhabitants must have all inevitably been massacred.[1]

No sooner had a defense been provided and a few other necessary works accomplished than the emigrants, true to New England principles, took steps for establishing local government. Silas Parks, who was the first justice of the peace, is believed to have brought his commission with him from Connecticut, which would naturally have been the case, for the colony had, prior to this time, as we have shown, extended her jurisdiction over the settlements in her charter limits. Parks, however, being found guilty of card-playing, which, according to Connecticut morals of a century ago, was a serious offense, was superseded in office by Uriah Chapman. John Killam was made constable and Capt. Zebulon Parrish "tithing man." The military command devolved upon Capt. Eliab Varnum, whose lieutenant was Jonathan Haskell, and ensign, Elijah Winters.

That the Paupack settlers were men of ability and character appears clearly from the records of Westmoreland County, which, as we have seen, was erected by the General Court of Connecticut, and included all of the Pennsylvania settlements. In proportion to population, as many men were elected to county offices and representative places in the colonial government from Wallenpaupack, or "Lackawa," as from Wyoming, and they appear to have kept up a full and active town (or township) government from 1774 until brought under the dominion of Pennsylvania law (except, of course, during the Revolution, when the settlement was for a time abandoned). The most perfect equality existed throughout the settlement as to rights, privileges and property. The lands were disposed of, it is believed, by lot. The title of each man to his land was the consent, and the proof of his title was the memory, of his neighbors.

Religion had a place in the community from the start, and on Sundays it was the custom for the whole population to assemble and listen to the reading of a sermon. The observance of the Lord's Day was enforced with characteristic New England severity, and the morality and decorum of the settlers carefully insisted upon. The population was chiefly composed of Presbyterians.

The settlement enjoyed peace and prosperity from the time it was founded until a little before the Wyoming massacre of 1778, and after that suffered in common with all of the exposed frontier posts until the end of the Revolution.

During those few years of freedom from annoyance, either by white or savage foes, the various works of pioneer communities were carried on effectively, and the welfare of the people correspondingly enhanced. The Susquehanna and Delaware Companies had both caused the greater portions of their purchases to be surveyed into towns or townships, and were engaged in furthering various schemes for their thorough colonization, which, however, the breaking out of the war effectually stopped.

In the Delaware Company's purchase about fifty townships, and perhaps more, were laid out, chiefly in what are now the counties of Wayne, Susquehanna, Lackawanna and Pike, but extending also southward into the present Monroe. These, as a rule, were about six miles square, and contained, therefore, approximately twenty-three thousand acres. Newry, Young, Scotland, New Haven, Faxon, Lycurgus,—including the site of Honesdale—Canonicus were wholly within the present limits of Wayne County, extending from north to south in the order named. South of Canonicus was Bozrah, which included lands now divided by the Wayne and Pike County line. It was within this Connecticut town that the compact part of the Wallenpaupack settlement was located. The other townships within what is now Wayne County, east of those named, were Columbia, Sassacus, Uncas, Huntington and Winslow. The townships of Monmouth, St. Patrick, Sims, Sedgwick, Griffin and Squanto were about equally divided by the line between Wayne County on one side and Susquehanna and Lackawanna upon the other. Pichegru lay southeast of Bozrah, in what is now Pike County, and Ulysses was east of Pichegru. Other townships in the present limits of Pike were Dollecurla and Scandebeg. The extreme southern ones in the Delaware purchase, of which any knowledge remains, were Wedderburn and Thales, and these must have included lands now in Monroe County. The plan of these townships appears in an old "map of Westmoreland, shewing the Connecticut surveys." Strangely enough, it indicates no townships at all, along or in the immediate vicinity of the Delaware, though townships were undoubtedly laid out there, one of them including Cushutunk. These townships were probably surveyed at several periods, as the Indian temper permitted, and it is very doubtful whether the map preserved is accurate as far as it goes, while it is certain that it is not complete. Several parties of surveyors were undoubtedly engaged at different times in the work. There remains little data concerning them, but from what we have, it can be authoritatively stated that John Curtius and one Peebody were the first.

That a township existed, variously known as "Lackawa," or "Lackaway" or "Lackawack," adjoining Bozrah, is certain, yet it does not appear on the map just alluded to. It was probably east of the latter, and a part of the township originally called Huntington.

The "Town of Westmoreland," which was practically co-extensive with Westmoreland County, was, on March 2, 1774, divided into election districts. At "a town-meeting," it was voted "that ye town of Westmoreland be divided . . . into districts," which was accordingly done. The minutes, after exhibiting the fact that Wilkes-Barre was to constitute one entire district, and describing five others—Hanover, Plymouth, Kingston, Pittston and North (Exeter and Providence) Districts,—show the provision "that Lackaway settlement and Blooming Grove and Sheolah be one district, and be called by ye name of ye Lackaway district; and that Coshutunk and all ye settlements on Delaware be one district and joined to ye other districts, and known by ye name of ye East district."

As we have said, the few years preceding the Revolution were years of peace and comparative prosperity in the Connecticut settlements of Wyoming, Lackawa and Cushutunk, for the efforts of the Pennsylvanians had been relaxed, as other interests claimed their attention. The power of the proprietaries, too, began to wane, as it became more and more clearly evident that a rupture must occur between the mother-country and the colonies; and, finally, the "Pennamite War," which had been waged vigorously for years, faded into insignificance in the darkening, portentous shadows which coming events cast before. During the Revolution these unhappy settlements were again the scenes of blood and carnage, of death and devastation, and their people (as we shall see in the next chapter) were placed at the mercy of a savage instead of a civilized enemy—the Indians who were allied to the British. It was only after the great struggle was over that the lesser was resumed, again involving heated controversy, bloodshed, State and inter-State legislation and the intervention of Federal authority, and was finally legally settled after thirty years of more or less active strife.

CHAPTER VI.

Period of the Revolution and Second Indian War—Soldiers from Upper Northampton—Fort Penn, at Stroudsburg—Massacre at Wyoming—"Shades of Death"—Sullivan's March—Battles of the Lackawaxen and Raymondskill—Indian Incursions and Murders from Cushutunk to Smithfield.

THE opening of the Revolutionary War found the people of the territory which is our province in this work enjoying an era of peace and prosperity broken only—and that in a slight measure—by the remote and occasional hostilities of the Pennamite contest. Most of the inhabitants of the integral portion of Northampton, which is now Wayne, Pike and Monroe, lived in the two latter counties, and were quietly engaged in farming. But when the inexorable tide of events operating on public opinion showed that the crisis of war with the mother-country was inevitable, the martial and the patriotic spirit of these quiet and usually undemonstrative people was awakened, and their thoughts were given to the one absorbing topic of the times.

In 1774 the oppressions and exactions of the mother-country were becoming more and more odious to the people, and were acting as educators to prepare the colonists for the impending contest, which, under Providence, was to result in their emancipation from foreign rule. Among the first of the measures taken in Pennsylvania to organize an opposition to the encroachments of the ministry on the people's liberties was the formation of a central Committee of Correspondence and Safety in Philadelphia, and of branch committees in most, if not all, of the several counties. The central committee assumed a general oversight of affairs through the province, and placed themselves in correspondence with the leading patriots of the different counties for that purpose.

The central committee advised the holding of local or county meetings and the appointment of deputies to attend a meeting to be held in Philadelphia for the purpose of expressing the thought of the province on the odious exactions of the mother government. This meeting was duly held at Carpenter's Hall, on Friday, July 15, 1774. Thomas Willing was made chairman, and Charles Thompson secretary, and among the resolutions passed were the following:

"U. 1. That we acknowledge ourselves and the inhabitants of this Province liege subjects of His Majesty King George III., to whom they and we owe and will bear true and faithful allegiance.

"U. 2. That as the idea of an unconstitutional independence of the parent state is utterly abhorrent to our principles, we view the unhappy differences between Great Britain and the Colonies with the deepest distress and anxiety of mind, as fruitless to her, grievous to us and destructive to the best interests of both.

"U. 3. That it is, therefore, our ardent desire that our ancient harmony with the mother-country should be restored, and a perpetual love and union subsist between us, on the principles of the constitution and an interchange of good offices, without the least infraction of our mutual rights.

"U. 4. That the inhabitants of these Colonies are entitled to the same rights and liberties within these Colonies that the subjects born in England are entitled to within that realm.

"U. 5. That the power assumed by the Parliament of Great Britain, to bind the people of these Colonies, 'by statutes in all cases whatsoever,' is unconstitutional, and, therefore, the source of these unhappy differences.

"U. 6. That the act of Parliament for shutting up the port of Boston is unconstitutional; oppressive to the inhabitants of that town; dangerous to the liberties of the British Colonies; and, therefore, that we consider our brethren at Boston as suffering in the common cause of these Colonies.

"U. 9. That there is an absolute necessity that a Congress of deputies from the several colonies be immediately assembled to consult together and form a general plan of conduct to be observed by all the Colonies, for the purpose of procuring relief for our suffering brethren, obtaining redress of our grievances, preventing future dissensions, firmly establishing our rights, and restoring harmony between Great Britain and her Colonies on a constitutional foundation.

* * * * * * *

"U. 16. That this committee give instructions on the present situation of public affairs to their Representatives who are to meet next week in Assembly, and request them to appoint a proper number of persons to attend a congress of Deputies from the several Colonies, at such time and place as may be agreed upon, to effect one general plan of conduct for attaining the great and important ends mentioned in the ninth resolve."

In the Provincial Assembly, June 30th, it was "Resolved, that this House approves the Association entered into by the good people of this colony for the defense of their lives, liberties and property." And by the same body, on the 22d of July, on receipt of a report of the proceedings of the deputies, it was "Resolved, that there is an absolute necessity that a Congress of Deputies from the several

[1] The letter U thus placed before a resolution indicates that it was passed unanimously.

Colonies be held as soon as conveniently may be, to consult upon the unhappy state of the Colonies, and to form a plan for the purpose of obtaining redress of American grievances, &c., and for establishing that union and harmony between Great Britain and the Colonies which is indispensably necessary to the welfare and happiness of both." The first-mentioned of these resolutions had reference to the fact that a Committee of Safety, consisting of twenty-five citizens, was appointed and authorized to call into actual service such number of the Associators as they might judge proper. Organizations of "Associators"[1] were found in most, if not all, the counties. The committee organized July 3d by the choice of Benjamin Franklin, president. Congress, July 18th, recommended that all able-bodied, effective men between sixteen and fifty years of age should immediately form themselves into companies of militia, to consist of one captain, two lieutenants, one ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, one clerk, one drummer, one fifer and about sixty-eight privates; the companies to be formed into regiments or battalions, officered with a colonel, lieutenant-colonel, two majors and an adjutant or quartermaster; all officers above the rank of captain to be appointed by the provincial authorities.

The feeling that existed in the province is shown by the expressions of the convention which was held in Philadelphia January 23–28, 1775. Following is an extract from the resolutions adopted: "But if the humble and loyal petition of said Congress to his most gracious Majesty should be disregarded, and the British administration, instead of redressing our grievances, should determine by force to effect a submission to the late arbitrary acts of the British Parliament, in such a situation we hold it our indispensable duty to resist such force, and at every hazard to defend the rights and liberties of America."

Northampton was represented in the convention, which thus enunciated the independent principles of the people, by George Taylor, John Oakley, Peter Kichline and Jacob Arndt.

On the 14th of June, 1775, Congress authorized the raising of six companies of expert riflemen in Pennsylvania, two in Maryland and two in Virginia, to join the army near Boston. On the 22d the "colony of Pennsylvania" was directed to raise two more companies, making eight in all, which were to be formed into a battalion. Lancaster County furnished two companies instead of one, and thus the battalion, which was commanded by Colonel William Thompson, of Carlisle, was swollen to nine companies, viz.: Captain James Chambers' company, enlisted in that part of Cumberland which is now Franklin County; Captain Robert Cluggage's company, enlisted chiefly in what is now Bedford County; Captain William Hendricks' company, of Cumberland County; Captain John Lowdon's company, enlisted at Northumberland; Captain Abraham Miller's company, enlisted in Northampton County; Captain George Nagel's company, enlisted at Reading, Berks County; Captain James Ross' company, enlisted in Lancaster County; and Captain Matthew Smith's company, enlisted in that part of Lancaster which is now Dauphin County. As we shall presently show, there were in Captain Miller's company some men from north of the mountains.

The war that was to last seven years opened with the battle of Lexington upon the 19th of April, 1775, and the battle of Bunker Hill was fought on the 17th of the following June. Washington was placed at the head of the army. Pennsylvania took prompt action toward raising the four thousand three hundred men apportioned to the province, and made appropriations for their support. Northampton County was as fully aroused as any portion of the province, and quickly organized a company of soldiers, each man enlisting receiving a bounty of three pounds (eight dollars). This company, of which Thomas Craig was captain, was composed almost entirely of Northampton County men, and there were a few from north of the mountains whose names (so far as they can be distinguished) will be found in these pages.

[1] The term "Associators" was adopted to designate those who subscribed to the test-oath of allegiance to the provincial government, as prescribed by resolution of Congress. Those who did not take this oath were called "Non-Associators."

After the evacuation of Boston by the British under Howe, in March, 1776, Washington, apprehending that New York was the objective point of the enemy, moved there with the whole of his army except a small force sufficient to garrison Boston. But his entire army was lamentably insufficient, and Congress resolved to reinforce the commander-in-chief with thirteen thousand eight hundred militia, ten thousand of whom were to form the "Flying Camp." Of this militia, the quota of Pennsylvania was six thousand.

The matter of the quotas of Pennsylvania and of the different counties was also considered at the conference of the committees of the province, held at Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, from June 18th to the 25th, 1776, to which the delegates from Northampton County were Robert Levers, Colonel Neigel Gray, John Weitzel, David Deshler, Nicholas Depui and Benjamin Depui. At this session of the conference the following resolutions were passed concerning the organization of the troops:

"Resolved, unanimously, That this conference do recommend to the committees and associators of this province to embody 4500 of the militia, which, with the 1500 men now in the pay of this province, will be the quota of this province, as required by Congress.

"Resolved, unanimously, That the 4500 militia recommended to be raised be formed into six battalions, each battalion to be commanded by one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, one major; the staff to consist of a chaplain, a surgeon, an adjutant, a quartermaster, and a surgeon's mate, and to have one surgeon-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, a drum-major, and a fife-major, and to be composed of nine companies, viz.: eight battalion companies, to consist of a captain, two lieutenants, one ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, a drummer, a fifer, and sixty-six privates each, and one rifle company, to consist of a captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, one drummer, one fifer, and eighty privates."

The establishment of a permanent provincial government, and the holding of a convention for the purpose of forming the same, were also considered. A resolution was passed providing that all who were entitled to vote for representatives in Assembly should be permitted to vote for delegates to the convention after taking the test-oath of allegiance (should it be required). The judges of election were vested with power to administer the oath. Monday, the 8th of July, was appointed as the time for holding the election.

Northampton County was divided into four election districts, as follows:

The First District.—Easton, William, Lower Saucon, Bethlehem, Forks, Mount Bethel, Plainfield; to be held at Easton.

The Second District.—Northampton, Salisbury, Upper Saucon, Upper Milford, Macungie, Weisenberg, Lynn, Whitehall, Heidelberg; to be held at Allen's Town.

The Third District.—Allen, Moore, Chestnut Hill, Towamensing, Penn, Lehigh; to be held at Peter Anthony's.

The Fourth District.—Hamilton, Lower Smithfield, Delaware, Upper Smithfield; to be held at Nicholas Depui's.

It will be observed that the greater part of the territory now included in Monroe and Pike Counties was within the Fourth District, and a small fraction in the Third.

When the news of the Declaration of Independence reached Easton it was determined to make a public demonstration, which was accordingly done upon the 8th of July. Captain Abraham Labar's company paraded the streets, with fife and drum loudly resounding and colors flying, and the citizens assembled in the court-house to hear their townsman, Robert Levers, read the Declaration.

Easton and Bethlehem, it may be remarked, became active centres of war operations. Particularly was this true of the latter. The place was for some time a rendezvous for prominent military and civil leaders. Washington, Lafayette, Pulaski, "Mad Anthony" Wayne, Sullivan and De Kalb were all there, and the latter once thought of fortifying the town. So also were John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Richard Henry Lee, Henry Laurens, John Adams and a host of other statesmen of the Revolutionary period. Many prisoners were taken there and the town too became a huge hospital for the patriot soldiers.

But we must return to those matters which belong more especially to our province.

Of the soldiers who entered the field from the thinly-settled region of Northampton north of the Blue Mountains, it is impossible to give the names of all; but such as we have been enabled, by careful search and the assistance of others, to single out from the companies of the county, we shall present.

Among the most distinguished patriots and soldiers of Northampton County were the Brodheads, Daniel and Luke, sons of the Daniel who won distinction in the Indian war, and brothers of Charles Brodhead, who was also prominent in that struggle—and Daniel, Jr., (or 3d).

Daniel Brodhead had indeed become a resident of Berks County before the outbreak of the Revolution, but that fact does not form a reason why his name should be omitted in this connection. He was commissioned a lieutenant-colonel in the summer of 1776, and on the 4th of July was ordered by the Committee of Safety of Philadelphia to proceed with one battalion of five hundred men to Bordentown, N. J., to be employed agreeable to a requisition of the "Honorable the Continental Congress." He was in most of the battles fought by Washington's army until 1778, when, then being colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, he was transferred by General Washington to the command of the Western Department. He had headquarters at Fort Pitt and his command was in almost constant struggle with the Indian allies of the British until the close of the war.

His patriotism at the opening of the war is attested by the following letter to Nicholas Depui.

"SPRING MILL, 28th January, 1776.

"Dear Nicky:

"I suppose you have before now heard that at the late appointment of the Field officers, I had nearly been appointed Col[1] of one of the Battalions in this Province, from which you will judge that I have an inclination to go in Defence of our country, and I am assured that whenever other Battalions are to be raised I shall be appointed to that important command, and tho' not so well Qualified for the undertaking as I could wish, yet my attachment to the Glorious cause we are engaged in is such that I am Determined to neglect nothing that may tend to improve my knowledge in the military way. If it had not been owing to my own diffidence and the good opinion I entertained of the Gent. who have been appointed, I am confident I might have been appointed then. When we are blessed with connexions and the means of being Happy at Home, it at first thought seems Hard to break up that Repose, but when the Dye is cast and no choice left us but the Horrid alternative of arms or chains, I think we can't hesitate a moment which to choose. . . . My Daniel, eldest, is appointed first Lieut. in Col[l] Sheas' Battallion, in Capt. Boyler's company. The Capt. and him will pay you a visit very soon and should be obliged to you for all the assistance in your Power to get a number of Good Soldiers.

"I am, Dear Nicky, your Affect. Brother,

"DANIEL BRODHEAD."

Luke Brodhead entered the First American Rifle Regiment (Abraham Miller's company), under command of Colonel William Thompson, which marched direct to Boston, and he distinguished himself as a brave and intrepid soldier. He was commissioned as a lieutenant in Colonel Samuel Miles' rifle regiment and was severely wounded at the battle of Long Island, and made a prisoner. After his return from captivity he became a captain in the Sixth Pennsylvania (February 15, 1777) and retired June 21, 1778, having participated in the actions at Short Hills, the Brandywine and Germantown.

Daniel Brodhead, Jr., son of Colonel Daniel, was commissioned a first lieutenant in Colonel John Shea's battalion January 6, 1776; was captured November 16th, of the same year; exchanged August 26th, 1778, and died shortly after. (He is the one alluded to in Daniel Brodhead's letter to Nicholas Depui, heretofore given.)

In Captain Abraham Miller's company of Colonel William Thompson's regiment were,— Sergeant.—Luke Brodhead (afterwards captain of Sixth Pennsylvania).

Privates.—Benjamin Decker, Bernhard Kline, John McFerren, Robert Marshall, Jacob Miller, John Moeser, Jacob Moyer.

In Captain Thomas Craig's company of Colonel Arthur St. Clair's Second Pennsylvania Battalion, January 5 to November 25, 1776, were,—

First Lieutenant.—Andrew Kechlein.

Sergeant.—John McMichael.

Privates.—John McMichael, Felty Yiesly.

In Captain Walter Stewart's company of the Third Battalion were,— Privates.—James Rosenkrantz, William Schoonover, Abraham Van Gorden, Cornelius Westbrook.

In Captain Henry Shade's company of Colonel Samuel Miles' rifle regiment were,— Privates.—Jacob Edinger, Jacob Frederick, Michael Kelchner, Adam Kerchner, Henry Miller, Michael Mosteller, Nicholas Mosteller.

In Captain John Arndt's company of Baxter's battalion, which joined Washington's army on Long Island, there were,—

Privates.—Benjamin Depui, Isaac Shoemaker.

Nearly the whole of Captain Johannes Van Etten's company must have been from the region now in Monroe and Pike Counties. That the company was in the battle of the Brandywine, September 11, 1777, is evident from the number of casualties indicated on that date. The survivors were on duty as rangers in Upper Northampton in 1781–82. Following is the roll as it appeared in 1781, when on the duty specified, together with the killed of September 11, 1777 :

Captain.—Johannes Van Etten.
First Lieutenant.—John Fish.
Second Lieutenant.—John Myer.
First Ensign.—Henry Bush.
Second Ensign.—James Scoby (taken prisoner the 11th of September).
Sergeants.—Thomas Johnson, Samuel Hillet, James Scoby (advanced to ensign September 1st), Frederick Everhart, Joseph Gable, George Price.
Corporals.—Lewis Holmes, Thomas Gay, Samuel Bond (killed September 11th), Adam Hicker.
Privates.—Samuel Van Dermark, Daniel McDole, John Morhart, John Routs (killed September 11th), Rudolph Smith, Abram Clider (killed September 11th), Daniel Smith, George Gangware, John Myer, Peter Apler, John Weaver (killed September 11th), Daniel France, Lawrence Miller, George Pigg, John Robenholt, Leonard Pack, John Sack, Job Strout, George Ripsher, Peter Snyder, Peter Losher, Jacob Cryder, C. Kowler, John Nap Snyder, Adam Teel, Valentine Nichols, George Hickman, John Smith, John Wetherstone, Christian Haller, Jacob Horner, Peter Siner, Peter Corms (taken prisoner September 11th), Philip G. Shilhamer, B. Snyder (killed September 11th), Philip Betten, George P. Rinehart (killed September 11th), Andrew Myer, Joseph Gable (advanced to sergeant August 30th), Peter Croom (killed September 11th), Johannes Snyder, Andrew Maurer, Adam Lung, George Shelhamer (killed September 11th), Paul Neely (killed September 11th), Abraham Smith (killed September 11th), John Lyn (sick, absent), Jacob Arndt (killed September 11th), Samuel Summeny, Jacob Collins, Henry Davis, Philip George (killed September 11th), Peter McCoy, John Hann, Abraham Weisner, Uria Tippy, Paul Reeser, B. Weaver, George Heaton, John Smith, Jr., Christian Wood, John Morgan, Henry France, Bond Hewe, John Hain, Michael Yerty, Adam Brunthaven, Anthony Bishop, John Snyder, Peter Daniel, Peter Simonton, John Dahly, Henry Van Gorden, Abraham Westfall, Cornelius Devoor, Casper Clutter, Peter Quick, Thomas Van Sickle, Samuel Van Gorden, Solomon Huff, Thomas Howe, James McGraw (killed September 11th), Jacob Rowe (killed September 11th).

"I do solemnly Swear that the within Muster Roll is a true State of the Company, without fraud to the United States or any Individual, to the best of my knowledge.

"JOHANNES VAN ETTEN, Captain.

"JACOB STROUD, Lieutenant-Colonel."

"Mustered at Fort Penn, January the 15th, 1781, in the absence of the muster-master.

"JACOB STROUD, Lieutenant-Colonel."

In 1777 a return of persons in Northampton County, north of the mountains, who had taken the oath of allegiance to the commonwealth, was made by Nicholas Depui. It contained the following names :

Delaware.—Thomas Swartwout.
Smithfield.—William Jayne, Elias Hementon, Philip Sailer, John Vaney, Rodolphus Schoonoven, William Burley, David Johnston.

Fort Penn was built on the site of Stroudsburg early in the Revolution, probably in 1776 or 1777. It was not a formidable fort and of course was intended merely as a protection against the Indians in case they made incursions in such strength as to drive the scattered inhabitants from their homes. It was, in fact, a simple stockade around the house of Col. Jacob Stroud, and was probably built by him and entirely at his own expense, for no mention of it is found in the official records of the time. Its location was on or back of the site of the "Fort Penn Hotel," which was a flourishing hostelry until a few years since, and it can be best described at present by saying that the site was back of the Wintermute property, on ground bounded by Main or Elizabeth Street, Chestnut Street and Quaker Alley. The doughty commander of Fort Penn (if indeed it is entitled to be called a fort) was Col. Jacob Stroud, who figured quite prominently during the period of war in local affairs.

While Lower Northampton was engaged in raising troops to meet the British in the field, the people of the great northern frontier region, above the Blue Mountains, in the territory now included in Monroe, Pike and Wayne Counties, experienced the most terrible effects of war in their own homes, for the whole region from Cushutunk down to the Blue Mountains was repeatedly ravaged by the Indians in the employ of the British, and was the scene of frequent battles, murders, burnings, pillagings and general consternation and distress, as it was in the memorable years from 1755 to 1764. The little settlement of Cushutunk (in Damascus township, Wayne County), its sister colony on the Wallenpaupack, known as "Lackawa" or "Lackawack," the few people located along the Delaware in what is now Pike County, together with the inhabitants of contiguous regions in New York and New Jersey, and the scattered farmers of Old Smithfield (surrounding Fort Penn and the site of Stroudsburg) alike felt the fury of a savage enemy, incited by British craft and British gold.

Cushutunk was a peculiarly exposed locality during the war, for it lay farthest north of all the settlements, upon the path down which the Indians came to strike the Minisink region, and in addition to this it suffered from internal dissensions between patriots and Tories and between the holders of lands under opposing titles. A brief sketch of occurrences there and in the neighborhood must suffice.

In the spring of 1777 the wife of Robert Land, an Englishman who held a commission as justice of the peace under the colonial government, learning of the approach of a party of Indians, took her infant, and, in company with her eldest son, nineteen years of age, drove their cattle back into the woods. The Indians did make their appearance early the next morning and some of them entered the house of Land, where four children were sleeping wholly unsuspicious of danger, and one of them going to the bed where Rebecca and Phoebe slept, awakened them by tickling their feet with a spear. It seems that a certain chief of the Tuscaroras, Captain John, had frequently been at the house and was very friendly. Rebecca awaking, supposed the Indian to be the captain and extending her hand said, "How do you do, Captain John." The Indian told her that he was not Captain John, but he appears to have spared them because she was acquainted with that savage dignitary. He told her that they were Mohawks and had come to drive the whites from the valley, but that she and her sister might dress and leave unharmed. They lost no time in doing so, and crossing the Delaware in a canoe, went first to Brant Kane's, where they found that all of the family had been murdered except a little girl, who, however, had been scalped and was nearly dead from loss of blood and fright. Rebecca then ran up the river to Nathan Mitchell's and gave the alarm and then returned home, where she found that the Indians had bound her brother Abel, aged about seventeen, and taken him with them, without doing any other harm. The retreating party went up Calkin's Creek and met a small band of Cushutunk Indians, who were friendly to the whites, and the latter, after vainly endeavoring to induce them to release Abel Land hurried to the river to alarm the settlers. About the time that they got there Mrs. Land and her son John returned from the woods, where they had been all night, and the latter, with these Indians and the few whites who could be assembled, then set out after the marauders. They overtook the Mohawks a few miles away and persuaded them to release Abel after they had made him run the gauntlet.

The murder of Brant Kane and his family struck terror into the settlement, and the people fled to the more thickly-settled parts of Orange County. Among them were Nathan Skinner and his son, Garret Smith and wife, the wife and child of Nathaniel Evans and others. Some, however, remained and went on with their farming.

In the fall of the same year another marauding party, composed of about as many murderous and thieving whites as Indians, made a second descent on ill-fated Cushutunk, shot a man named Handa, took Nathan Mitchell prisoner, burnt down Daniel Skinner's house and destroyed the crops. There appears something strange and unaccountable in this affair, as there does something improbable in the Land narrative. The latter, however, is well attested, and of the second foray, Nathan Skinner, in his manuscript, asserts that the leading and chiefly active persons in it were of those in the neighborhood who professed to be actuated by pure patriotism. If this was so, then Skinner, Mitchell, Handa and the others who were made the victims of their attacks must have been regarded as Tories. Skinner, however, says in another place in his manuscript that the marauders were in reality moved by a desire to drive the owners of the best farms and crops and cattle out of the country, that they might in this high-handed way confiscate their property. Of the second raid Skinner says,—

"This party came up the Delaware on the east side, and from Ten-Mile River upward plundered all that came in their way without opposition until they came in sight of Big Island, where they discovered a party retreating before them, who continued their retreat to the upper end of Ross's, where the settlers made a stand and sent word to their pursuers that they, the whites and friendly Indians, should retreat no further. The marauders came to a stand at Nathan Skinner's new house, which they plundered and burnt, and then retreated down the river, on their way treacherously capturing John Land and a man named Davis. Land was shamefully maltreated by his captors, and he and Davis were shackled and handcuffed and thrown into prison to answer to the charge of disloyalty, of which charge they were afterwards acquitted." Nathan Mitchell escaped, but how, is not known.

In his "History of Sullivan County N. Y.," Quinlan, apropos of these affairs, says: "Some of the Whigs left without harvesting their crops and after leaving their families in places where they would be safe, returned to gather what they had cultivated with anxious forebodings. They were driven from the neighborhood or found that their property had been appropriated or destroyed by their enemies. . . . The Tories appropriated the abandoned property of their former Whig neighbors." Such seems to have been the case. An almost constant local war prevailed between the two parties and intermixed with its asperities were occasional Indian murders.

At the Wallenpaupack settlement, too, there was trouble made both by Indians and Tories in 1777. The former were not of the Six Nations, but some renegade savages, outcasts from all tribes, and the latter were not of the better class of Tories, but a parcel of vagabonds who took advantage of the general state of hostility to plunder whoever they could. Some time during the year mentioned a party of men were discovered lurking in the "great swamp," as the bottom land along the Wallenpaupack was called, and Lieutenant Jonathan Haskell, the military commander of the colony, collecting as many men as he could, succeeded in capturing the whole party, eighteen in number. They proved to be Tories who had deserted from the American army. Lieutenant Haskell conducted them to Hartford, where they were imprisoned.[1]

The Tories who usually harassed the settlement came from the Delaware at and below Cushutunk.

The settlements along the Delaware in what is now Pike County were occasionally disturbed during this year, but no serious incursions were made until a year or so later. These people, however, had built "forts," as they were called, but in reality their preparations for defense consisted in simple stockades around several of the stronger dwelling-houses. One of these was at Dingman's; one at Captain Johannes Van Etten's, three or four miles above Dingman's; another, "Fort Decker," about three miles below Dingman's, on Hornbeck Creek; and still another was "Fort Brink," where John and Garret

[1] It must have been, says Miner, about this time that Connecticut began to exercise control over the Wallenpaupack settlement.

Brink lived, two or three miles above the Bushkill. Emmanuel Gunsalus (Gonzales) lived at the Bushkill, and his house, too, was placed in as good a condition for defense as was possible. There were forts also upon the Jersey side of the river, one of the principal ones being at Wallpack, while others, mere block-houses and stockades, were to be found along the shore from Port Jervis down nearly to the Water Gap.

Although a condition of comparative peace had thus far prevailed, there were portentous signs of dire events to come.

On the 3d of July, 1778, occurred the world-famous massacre of Wyoming. The confederated Six Nations, who had been induced by the British in 1777 to take the war-path against the Americans, committed great ravages in New York during that year, and in the following they determined to make a murderous foray into Pennsylvania, with the especial object of striking the settlements on the two branches of the Susquehanna, which were left in an almost defenceless condition through the departure of their patriotic men for the army.

The Wyoming settlement was very naturally the object of the Englishmen's especial hatred, because of the devotion its people had shown to the cause of liberty; and it was easily accessible by the North Branch of the Susquehanna. Late in June there descended that stream, under command of Colonel John Butler, a force of eleven hundred men, four hundred of whom were Tory rangers and regular soldiers of Sir John Johnson's Royal Greens, with seven hundred Indians, chiefly Senecas. Jenkins' Fort capitulated, and Wintermoot's (which, as was afterwards learned, was built to aid the incursions of the Tories) at once opened its gates to the invading host. At Wyoming were several so-called forts, mere stockades, in no one of which was there a cannon or an adequate garrison, the arms-bearing men nearly all being absent, as has heretofore been stated. Colonel Zebulon Butler, who happened to be at Wyoming, took command by invitation of the people, and the little band, consisting chiefly of old men and boys, with a handful of undisciplined militia, against whom eleven hundred warriors had marched, made as heroic a stand as the world ever saw.

And so upon that fatal 3d of July they marched out to meet and fight the enemy, for a safe retreat with their families was impossible, and surrender seems never to have been thought of. It is beyond our province in this work to describe the uneven battle and the slaughter which ensued. Suffice it to say that the brave defenders, about four hundred in number, were defeated by the assailing force, outnumbering them by nearly three to one. Then followed the horrible massacre—a carnival of murder and torture performed by fiends. But who is there who knows not Wyoming? Who that does not shudder at the recall of that name? Of four hundred men who went into battle, but sixty escaped the fury of the Indians. That bloody day made one hundred and fifty widows and six hundred orphans in the valley.

And now the Wyoming Valley is a scene of pastoral quiet and loveliness, as if, in recompense for the dark deeds done, the Creator had breathed upon the bosom of nature there the benison of eternal peace.

The massacre of Wyoming thrilled the world with horror. What, then, must have been the feelings of those people who had reason to think they might at any hour meet with the same fate which had extinguished the lives of the four hundred settlers in the beautiful valley? The whole border was filled with the wildest alarm, and a fever of fear took possession of the people even as far down the country as Bethlehem and Easton.

Flight was the only recourse for the few terror-stricken survivors. Vain efforts were made to concentrate the settlement at Forty Fort, but the tide of panic had already set in, and by night of the day of battle fugitives were flying in every direction to the wilderness. It was a wild, chaotic, precipitate hegira. All was confusion, consternation, horror. The poor, terrified people, men, women and children, scarcely thinking or caring whither their trembling footsteps led, if they could only escape the savage enemy and cruel death, fled onward into the wilderness and night. The general direction pursued was towards the Delaware and the Stroudsburg settlement. Every passage into the forest was thronged. On the old Warrior's Path there were, says Miner, in one company, nearly a hundred women and children, with but one man, Jonathan Fitch, to advise or aid them. The forlorn flight led into and through the "Dismal Swamp" or "Shades of Death," as it was then, and is sometimes even to this day, called. This was the wet, marshy plateau of the Pocono and Broad Mountains, an area included now in Monroe, Carbon and Pike Counties, surrounding the headwaters of the Lehigh. Over the greater part of this singularly wet table-land there was a dense growth of pines and a tangled, almost impenetrable undergrowth, the whole interspersed here and there with expanses of dark, murky water, swarming with creeping things, even as the matted forest abounded with wild beasts.

It was through this desolate, seemingly interminable swamp that the fugitives from Wyoming, by day and night, made their toilsome way to Stroudsburg, and some by way of the Wind Gap to the lower settlements.

Children were born and children died in that terrible forced march through the "Shades of Death." One infant that came into the world in this scene of terror and travail was carried alive to the settlements. At least one which died was left upon the ground to be devoured by wolves, while the agonized mother went on. There was not time, nor were there means, for making even a shallow grave. One woman bore her dead babe in her arms for twenty miles, rather than abandon its body to the beasts, and it finally found sepulchre in a German settlement which she reached. The flight had been so precipitate that few had an opportunity to secure provisions from their homes, and for two or three days the greater number lived upon whortleberries, which fortunately grew in abundance that season—the manna of that wilderness. Some wandered from the path and were lost, some died from their wounds, some from exhaustion, but the majority of that distressed, straggling band of refugees reached the Stroudsburg settlement after traveling sixty miles, and were tenderly cared for until they could go to their old homes or find new ones. Many made their way to their native Connecticut.

One band, consisting of a single man and twelve women and children, were cared for by Colonel Stroud, and given a passport by him, recommending them to all whom they might meet in journeying destitute toward their homes. The document, of which a copy has been preserved, read as follows:

> "Permit the bearer, Sergeant William Searle, with twelve women and children in company with him, to pass unmolested to some part of the State of Connecticut, where they may be able, by their industry, to obtain an honest living, they being part of the unhappy people drove off from Wyoming by the Tories and Indians, and are truly stript and distressed, and their circumstances call for the charity of all Christian people; and are especially recommended by me to all persons in authority, civil and military, and to all Continental officers and commissaries, to issue provisions and other necessaries for their relief on the road.

Upon the evening of the very day that the butchery occurred at Wyoming—July 3, 1778—Wallenpaupack had a narrow escape. The officer in command, to try the temper of his troops, caused a false alarm of danger to be made. Movables were hurriedly carried into the fort, the whole force of the settlement was collected and the arms prepared for use. Just as the noise and clamor caused by the alarm was at its height, a body of sixty Indians and Tories from the neighborhood of Cochecton approached from the direction of Wilsonville to within half a mile of the fort. They told some prisoners afterwards captured that their object was to drive away the cattle belonging to the settlers. The noise and confusion at the fort, however, induced them to believe that the New York Indians under Brant had attacked the settlement, and as Brant had given them distinct orders not to interfere with Wallenpaupack, they withdrew, burning, however, as they retreated, a grist-mill, at what is now Wilsonville, owned by Joseph Washburn.

The reception, on July 4th, of the news of the Wyoming massacre caused a stampede from this settlement. When the tidings were received Captain Zebulon Parrish, his son Jasper and Stephen Kimble went down to the Lackawaxen, a short distance above the mouth of the Wallenpaupack, for the purpose of giving the alarm to Benjamin Haynes, David Ford and James Hough, who lived there with their families; but these three men on this errand of mercy fell into the hands of the same body of Indians and Tories who had been hovering about the fort. They were carried to the State of New York and retained as prisoners until the close of the war. Stephen Parrish and Reuben Jones were also taken prisoners about this time. Both were subsequently returned and Jones lived many years in Wayne County.

In the mean time all had been activity at the settlements. The people prepared as rapidly as possible for flight, and before sunset on the night of that 4th of July the poor people were on their way to the Delaware. A number of the women and children who were sick were transported in carts. They were put on beds on the bottoms of the carts and thus moved comfortably. The men walked or rode horseback, driving their cattle before them, and carrying as many of their portable goods as possible, and thus the strange and mournful cavalcade moved away from their homes, scarcely knowing whither they were going, but directing their steps towards safety. They traveled the whole night and the greater part of the next day, and found themselves at a point about three miles from the site of Milford, upon the old Wyoming road. They intended to pass the night here, but becoming fearful that they were followed by the Indians, resumed their weary march, and did not again halt until they had reached the eastern side of the Delaware. From here some went to Connecticut, and some located on the Delaware, the majority, however, going to Orange County, New York, where they remained until after the war.

In August following four young men, John Pellet, Jr., Walter Kimble, Charles Forsythe and Uriah Chapman, Jr., returned to the Wallenpaupack to cut hay upon the rich bottomlands, and while engaged at their work were attacked by Indians, who had probably come there anticipating their return. Chapman was wounded (and carried the ball until his death, fifty-one years later), but all succeeded in getting to the fort, which was still standing. The next day they left the scene of their dangerous labors.

Most of the settlers also fled from Cushutunk after the Wyoming massacre, but the Tylers, Thomases, John Land and Nathan Mitchell remained. Nearly all of those who fled returned in the spring of 1779.

During the fall of this year (1778) Brant, the celebrated Mohawk chief, who held the commission of a British captain, appeared in the Minisink at the head of about one hundred Indians and Tories, confining his atrocities, however, to the settlements north of the Neversink.

Some neighbors returning from a funeral were surprised by a party in ambush and several of their number killed. Jeremiah Van Auken, a school-master, was dragged from his school and murdered in the presence of the children assembled. An incident is related in connection with the killing of Van Auken, which shows that Brant was not devoid of the feelings of humanity, and which would seem to furnish negative evidence to the question long in dispute as to whether he was in command of the Indians at the Wyoming massacre; especially if we concede (what is quite possible) that he was not personally present with such of his detached forces as committed atrocities in the valley.

"After the murder of Van Auken, the schoolmaster, some of the boys at the school were cleft with the tomahawk; others fled to the woods for concealment; while the little girls stood by the slain body of their teacher bewildered and horror-stricken, not knowing their fate, whether death or captivity. While they were standing in this pitiable condition, a strong, muscular Indian came along, and with a brush dashed some black paint across their aprons, bidding them hold up the mark when they saw an Indian coming, and it would save them, at which he plunged into the woods and disappeared. This was Captain Brant, and the little girls of the school were safe. The Indians, as they passed along and ran from place to place, saw the black mark, and left them undisturbed.

The happy thought, like a flash, entered the minds of these little sisters, and suggested that they should use the mark to save their brothers. The scattered boys were quickly sought, and the girls threw their aprons over the clothes of the boys, and stamped the black impression upon their outer garments. They, in turn, held up the palladium of safety as the Indians passed and re-passed, and were thus saved from injury and death, to the unexpected joy of their parents. Brant had received a Christian education, and it is not improbable that when he saw this array of youthful pupils, old memories of boyhood crowded his mind, and constrained him to stay the hand of slaughter." James Van Auken, an uncle of the school-teacher, was killed at the same time.

The raid in the Upper Minisink had the effect of striking terror through the whole valley down to Smithfield and Easton. Robert Levers wrote from the latter place to the Executive Council, under date of October 17 (1778) that :—

"An express is just this moment come from Col. Stroud's, bringing the melancholy accou.t that the Tories and Indians in the upper part of the Minesinks, in York government, are burning and destroying all before them. It is said the enemy are six hundred strong and that the Tories join them every hour. It is not to be doubted that they will be in this State very soon, and the inhabitants above are all moving and in the greatest distress and confusion. By a letter I have seen this morning from Capt. Alexander Patterson at Col. Stroud's, stationed as Quartermaster, it is mentioned that they have neither military stores or provisions, so that if they should suddenly attack that part of this county, destitute of help as they are, the country must fly before the enemy."[1]

A little later, October 24th, Major Samuel Westbrook wrote that he had seen two persons, who had conversed with some of the party with Brant, "in Doing the mischief att Peainpack and to my sorrow I acquaint you it has struck the People in general with such fear that they are moving away from the upper end of the Minesink very fast. If there is not some Means Taken To Stop the Enemy, the whole of the Inhabitance will move from this Place, and, if so, pray what will be Consiquence? Ruin and destruction will Emediately follow."[2]

Colonel Stroud, about this time, wrote to the Council from Fort Penn the following account of the condition of the frontier and suggestions for guarding it from Indian ravages :—

It became evident very early in the spring of 1779 that Indian hostility was to undergo no abatement, and as the season progressed the people of Upper Northampton, in common with those along the Jersey shore and in the Neversink region of New York, were more direfully harassed than ever before, or, in fact, than at any time during the war.

Early in the spring of this year five young men who had returned to the Wallenpaupack settlement to make maple sugar—Ephraim, Jeptha, and Silas Killam, Walter and Ephraim Kimble—were attacked by Indians and narrowly escaped with their lives.

Not long after this occurrence a straggling band of Indians came suddenly upon the fort at Dingman's.[1] One of Andrew Dingman's sons, Isaac by name, chanced to be outside the fort, and seeing his danger, endeavored to reach a place of safety. But the unfortunate youth was too late. One of the savages, springing from a place of concealment, fired upon him, mortally wounding him. The marauders then withdrew. The remains of the young man were secured and buried on the Jersey side of the river. The burial took place under the cover of a cannon, mounted in a fort[2] erected opposite the barricade at Dingman's. Consternation spread throughout the locality. Many of the settlers fled from their homes, seeking places of safety. Below Dingman's was a stone house, built by Col. John Rosencrans, of New Jersey. This house was vacated, but escaped destruction. Between this house and the fort at Deckertown stood a log structure, occupied by Hendrick Decker, brother-in-law to Dingman's wife. On the morning succeeding the death of Isaac Dingman a body of Indians attacked this building. The family, consisting of eight persons, fled at the approach of the savages, and made a frantic effort to reach the fort at Deckertown, about one-fourth of a mile distant. The war-whoop rang out on the still air, and lent strength to the terrified fugitives. The savages pursued them hotly, firing upon them as they ran. Two of the family fell ere the fort was reached—Henry and David Decker—and their reeking scalps swung from the girdles of two of the yelling pack as they came in sight of the fort. Foiled in their work at this point, they continued their march below the fort, where they fired upon a settler named Jacobus Van Gorden, breaking his thigh with a musket-ball. They did not succeed in capturing him, however, and he was spared further injury.

Brandt,[3] the most distinguished Indian personage of his time, now came upon the scene. He had appeared casually and with small bands, it is true, in 1778, but he came in 1779 at the head of a large organized force. After the incursions of 1778 in the Mamakating and Upper Minisink regions, Count Pulaski with a battalion of cavalry was stationed there for the protection of the frontier, but in February,

[1] The attack on Dingman's has usually been supposed to have occurred in 1776, but that is a manifest error. It was in 1779.

[3] The character and career of this great chief are worth more than a passing notice.

Joseph Brandt, the Mohawk chief, was born in Ohio in about 1742, and died November 24, 1807. He was frequently spoken of as a Shawnee by birth and only a Mohawk by adoption, and it has also been said that he was a son of Sir William Johnson. Having taken a part in the campaign of Lake George in 1755, and in various subsequent conflicts, he officiated after Sir Wm. Johnson's death as secretary of Col. Guy Johnson, Superintendent-General of the Indians, and when the American Revolution began, he was instrumental in exciting the Indians against the colonies. His presence at the battle of Wyoming is doubtful, though he took part in that of Cherry Valley and other sanguinary engagements. He was received with great distinction on his tour to England in 1786 and was attached to the military service of Sir Guy Carleton in Canada. He opposed the confederation of the Indians, which led to the expedition of General Wayne, and did all he could to prevent peace between the Indians and the United States. He was, however, zealously devoted to the welfare of his own people, and conspicuous for his efforts to prevent the introduction of ardent spirits among them. He was a brave warrior and noted for his ability, as testified by his correspondence. During his stay in England he collected funds for a church, which he built in Upper Canada. He there also published the "Book of Common Prayer" and the "Gospel of Mark" in Mohawk and English. He spent the latter part of his life at Burlington Bay, near the head of Lake Ontario, where he built a house for himself on a tract of land conferred upon him by the British government. Brandt's personal appearance and manners, added to his acknowledged abilities, gave him great power over his followers. His bearing was haughty and his language often insulting. He was tall and rather spare; generally wore moccasins elegantly trimmed with beads; leggings and breech-cloth of superfine blue; a short, green coat with two silver epaulets, and a small round laced hat.

1779, he had been ordered to South Carolina and this region was again left unprotected. It is probable that Brandt was soon informed of this condition of things, for he made his appearance in July.

The battle of the Lackawaxen, or, as it is often called, the battle of the Minisink, ensued from this invasion and was the largest and most important engagment that took place in or near the region that forms the field of this history. As a matter of fact, it did not occur on Pennsylvania soil, but at a spot immediately contiguous, in New York, a little plateau opposite the mouth of the Lackawaxen (which flows into the Delaware in Pike County).

Brandt's forces made their way southward very stealthily, considering their number, and appeared in the vicinity of what is now called Cuddeback, near the line of Orange County, on the 19th of July (1779).

Some of the people succeeded in reaching the block-houses, others took refuge in the woods, while many were murdered and their houses burned. The murders were committed quickly and Brandt's followers hastily retreated to Grassy Brook, a small tributary of the Mongaup, a few miles up the Delaware, where a portion of the command had been left. Some of the Indians must have passed farther down the valley and committed depredations in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The tidings of an Indian incursion, always alarming and fast flying, seem on this occasion to have been carried on the wings of the wind down to Smithfield and Easton and even over to Allentown, on the Lehigh, and the people everywhere were filled with consternation. Some idea of the general alarm is conveyed by the correspondence of the time.

Col. John Wetzel wrote President Reed, of the Executive Council, from Northampton (Allentown), under date of July 22d, that he was just in receipt of an express from Col. Stroud informing him that he hourly expected an attack from the Indians, "there being a large body of them (the numbers not yet known) at the Minisinks, and that they had got down as far as Aaron Frandenbur's, in ye Jerseys, and they have burnt his house and barn and taken some prisoners there." Col. Stroud bitterly complained that he lacked ammunition, but Col. Wetzel could send him none from Allentown, as his supply was exhausted.[1]

Upon the same date as the foregoing John Van Campen wrote President Reed, from Lower Smithfield, that he had on that morning returned home from the Minisink, "at which place," . . . he says, "I was the spectator of great Distress's, of many families left bare and destitute of all necessaries of life, who lived formerly in the midst of Plenty. . . . The people, in general, are all fled in Forts Both sides of the River. The Distress is very great in our parts and adjacent Neighbours. . . . Col. Jacob Stroud acts the part of a Brave officer, with a few of his Neighbors, who Scouts in the woods with him. . . . We have applied to our Lieutenants sundry times for relief, but none yet came."[2]

Van Campen, writing again to the President (probably upon July 23d), says: "By express this morning we are informed the Enemy are Legally (formally) Encamped at Willes Mill (probably Wells' Mill at the site of Milford), and Grinding all the Grain that was in the mill and what they can collect in Defiance of all the Forces that can be collected at present." He also says that on the day before they had taken three prisoners in Jersey, and killed twenty head of horned cattle and all the horses of Morgan Desheay in Pennsylvania. He concluded his letter by saying that he has no doubt, unless speedy relief be sent to supplement the small forces they can gather, they will not be able to save "the poor people that are Fled into Forts For the Preservation of their Lives."[3]

Reverting to the battle and the events that led to it, it may be stated that the greater number of the fugitives from Minisink fled to Goshen, and as soon as the first of them arrived and gave intelligence of the presence of the enemy, Dr. Tusten, the colonel of the local militia, issued orders to the officers of his command to meet him at Minisink on the following day with as many volunteers as they could possibly raise. The order was promptly obeyed, and a body of one hundred and forty-nine men met their colonel at the appointed rendezvous at the time designated. Early in the morning they pushed forward toward the Neversink. We quote from one who has been a careful student of the subject:[1]

At the place now called Finchville, on the east side of Shawangunk Mountain, they had breakfast, and were supplied with some provisions for the campaign. After the long and weary march of that day, following the trail of the retreating foe, they encamped for the night at Skinner's Mill, about three miles from the mouth of Half-way Brook.

On the morning of the 22d they were joined by Col. Hathorn, of the Warwick regiment, with a few men, and he, being the senior officer, took command.

Advancing to Half-way Brook (now Barryville), they came upon the Indian encampment of the previous night, and it was evident that Brandt was near. In order to ascertain his exact position and his contemplated place of crossing the Delaware, Captains Tyler and Cuddeback were sent forward. Tyler was soon shot, and, after a short delay, caused by his death, Col. Hathorn advanced, and as soon as he saw the main body of the enemy leisurely approaching the ford, near the mouth of the Lackawaxen (some had crossed and others were crossing with the plunder), he left the Indian trail and turned to the right, intending by a rapid march over the hills to intercept Brandt at the ford.

The wily Indian had discovered his pursuers, and anticipating their object, marched his forces quickly up a ravine, thereby placing himself in the rear of Col. Hathorn, and preventing about fifty of his men, who had fallen behind in the march, from joining him.

And now we have the contending forces in close proximity to each other.[2] The Americans, numbering about ninety, occupied the small plateau nearly opposite the mouth of the Lackawaxen, a ledge of rocks which formed the southerly boundary of the battle-field.

[1] From this point our narrative is condensed from an address delivered by Hon. William J. Groo, of Middletown, N. Y., on the one hundredth anniversary of the battle.

[2] The field of the battle of the Lackawaxen must here be described. It is situate in what is now the town of Highland, county of Sullivan and State of New York, and in lots number sixteen and seventeen in the seventh division of the Minisink Patent. By an air line the distance of the field from the village of Barryville, in the town of Highland, is two hundred and eighty-eight chains, or three and three-fifths miles, and about four and one-half miles by the usual route of travel. From Lackawaxen it is distant about one and one-fourth miles by road, and is elevated above the level of the Delaware River at that place not less than five hundred feet.

The field itself is a plateau formed by a ledge of rock, most of which is covered by earth to a depth sufficient to support the growth of shrubbery. The edges of the ledge present a projection towards the southeast, southwest and northwest, and when viewed together form, most nearly, a semi-circle. Toward the southeast the face of the ledge is somewhat broken, fifteen to eighteen feet high, and may be ascended or descended without much difficulty. Towards the southwest it is in part composed of broken rock, while another part exhibits a steep hill some twenty-five feet in height. Towards the northwest the face of the rock is very nearly perpendicular, quite solid, about fifteen feet high, and it was at its base that, it is fully believed, Colonel Tusten and the wounded under his care were tomahawked after the Indians gained the advantage.

A little northwesterly from the central point of the plateau, a hill rises to an extent of thirty or forty feet, extending towards the northwest and northeast, but towards the southeast terminating in a manner so that from one hundred to one hundred and fifty feet of level surface remains between the foot of the hill and the southeast brink of the ledge.

The ground occupied by the white people in the battle is from a quarter to half an acre in extent, and is the westerly proportion of the plateau, while the Indians and Tories occupied the part east, the hill above mentioned and the level ground extending around and behind the southeasterly point of the hill.

The imperfect breast-work of the whites, so hastily erected, may still be traced, and as late as 1839 was so distinct as to leave no doubt of its direction and extent, or the ground occupied by those it was intended to shield.—J. W. Johnston.

Hon. George H. Rowland, of Rowland's, Pike County, Pa., in an address delivered upon the field of battle speaking of the doubt that existed in some minds as to whether the battle was fought on this ground, says,— "That this is the exact spot on which the battle was fought there is no doubt, from the fact that there are men upon the ground to-day who were here when the bones of the slain were gathered and taken to Goshen and interred with imposing ceremonies. Again, there are those still living who have visited the ground with men who participated in the battle.

"Having lived all my life in this vicinity, I have sought after particulars with some pains. Some thirty-seven years

The Indians and Tories came up from the ravine to the northward, and extended their line around to the west.

The battle really began about eleven o'clock, by the Indians advancing from the north, but they were promptly repulsed and held in check while some of the men hastily threw up a sort of breast-work of sticks and upturned stones, about one hundred and fifty feet from the southerly extremity of the plateau. The location of this defensive line was, but a few years ago, distinctly marked.

At this juncture Brandt's voice was distinctly heard within the American lines, calling upon those of his forces who had crossed the Delaware to return; and soon thereafter Hathorn's men, who had been formed into a sort of hollow square, were nearly surrounded. Indians appeared in all directions, but in greatest numbers towards the north and west, and concealing themselves behind rocks and trees, advanced from time to time, as opportunity offered, and thus a running fire was kept up. At every weak point Brandt directed his efforts, but without avail. Colonel Hathorn, while guarding every point in the line, as far as possible, gave strict orders to his men to reserve their fire until it could be made effective. Thus the ammunition, which was lamentably short, was carefully husbanded. As the day wore on, Brandt became disheartened, and was about to abandon the conflict and withdraw from the field, when the death of one of the most effective militiamen, who had for hours successfully guarded a point towards the northwesterly point of the line, and near where Colonel Tusten was with the wounded, gave the Indians and Tories an opportunity to break through. Amid deafening yells, they came pouring through this opening in such numbers that further resistance was impossible, and the brave men who, for six long hours, without water, under a burning July sun, with insufficient ammunition, had successfully defied an enemy many times outnumbering them, fled from the field soaked with the blood of their comrades. Colonel Tusten being, as we have seen, a physician and surgeon, was at this time, as he probably had been during the greater part of the engagement, attending to the necessities of the wounded behind a cliff of rocks. He and the seventeen disabled men under his care were at once set upon and killed. Others who were wounded, and some who were not, were pursued and dispatched. Some died of their wounds, so that we may safely conclude that not more than thirty of the ninety who were in the engagement survived. What became of the fifty men who were isolated from the main force history does not record. The loss of the enemy has never been ascertained, but was undoubtedly much greater than that of the patriots.[1] ago I closed the eyes of Absalom Conklin in death at the age of eighty. He was over fifteen years old at the time of the battle. . . . The old man lived with my father at the time of his death, and never tired of telling me how they were compelled to leave their rude homes and descend the Delaware River in a canoe on account of the Indians becoming threatening, only a short time before the battle. How they stopped on the Pennsylvania side of the river, opposite Minisink; how his father joined the militia in pursuit of Brandt; how they fought until late in the afternoon of a very hot day without water; when their ammunition became exhausted they were compelled to retreat—his father running to the Delaware at Otter Eddy, swimming the same and making his way back to his family. How they soon moved back; how he had gone to the battle-ground with his father and saw the bones of those who died."

Again Brandt, who at and after that time held a commission in the British army, on a certain occasion in New York City, after peace was declared, gave his version of the battle, in brief, like this:

He said the whites took a position on an elevated plateau with a small round hill on their left; that before bringing on a general engagement he sent out a white flag, which was met by one from our side; that he . . . told our men they had better surrender and he would treat them as prisoners of war; that his force was far superior to ours, and if a general battle was brought on, he would not be able to restrain his savage warriors; that while thus in parley a bullet came whistling by his side and cut his sword-belt; that he then threw himself from his horse, retreated to his men and drew them up for battle. Be that as it may, there is no doubt our men occupied this half-acre of ground, with rude breastworks of stone, logs and brush hastily thrown up.

[1] The one hundredth anniversary of the battle was celebrated at Lackawaxen, or rather upon the field opposite that village, and also at Goshen, N. Y., July 22, 1879.

At the battle-field a monument was dedicated and an interesting programme of exercises rendered before a large audience. The introductory address was delivered by J. W. Johnston and then followed Prayer, by Rev. J. B. Wil-

The names of the slain upon the American side, so far as they have been preserved, were as follows:

Colonel Benjamin Tusten, Captain Bazaliel Tyler, Ensign Ephraim Masten, Adjutant Nathaniel Fitch, Captains John Duncan, Samuel Jones, John Little, Ensign Ephraim Middagh, Captain, Benjamin Vail, Lieutenant John Wood, Gabriel Wisner, Stephen Mead, Nathaniel Terwilliger, Ephraim Ferguson, Robert Townsend, Samuel Knapp, James Knapp, Benjamin Bennett, William Barker, Jacob Dunning, Jonathan Pierce, James Little, Joseph Norris, Gilbert S. Vail, Joel Decker, Abram Sheppard, —— Sheppard, Nathan Wade, Simon Wait, —— Talmage, John Carpenter, David Barney, Gamaliel Bailey, Moses Thomas, Jonathan Haskell, Abram Williams, James Masher, Isaac Ward, Baltus Niepas, Eleazer Owens, Adam Embler, Samuel Little, Benjamin Dunning, Daniel Reed.

A word should be said about the leaders of the little American army, brave, but unfortunate.

Col. Benjamin Tusten was born on Long Island in 1743, and, consequently, was thirty-six years old at the time of the battle. His father moved into Orange County when the son was but three years old, and settled about three miles from the village of Goshen. Young Tusten, after a thorough academic education, studied medicine, and became a prominent and successful physician and surgeon. He continued the practice of his profession, having the confidence and esteem of the entire community in which he lived to the time of his death. He did not live to witness the independence of the colonies.

Colonel (afterward General) John Hathorn, was, at the time of the battle, about the same age as Col. Tusten and Brandt. He lived at least forty-three years after the engagement, and was present at the laying of the foundation of the monument at Goshen, Orange County, N. Y., on the 22d of July, 1822, which perpetuated the fame of the fallen in the battle, and he made an address on that occasion. He served several terms in the State Legislature and the National Congress.

It has been averred by some writers that the Pennsylvania militia took part in the battle of the Lackawaxen, but this is an error. Captain Bazaliel Tyler and Moses Thomas, to be sure, were Pennsylvanians—from the neighborhood of Cushutunk—but there were few, if any, others in the battle from the Pennsylvania side of the river, and, certainly, no organized force. Several forces of men appear to have set out in pursuit of the Indians, but not to have come up with them; for John Van Campen, of Lower Smithfield, wrote, on July 22d, to President Reed, of the Supreme Executive Council, informing him that Captain Shymer, with one hundred and seventy men had, that morning, at ten o'clock, marched across the Delaware with intent to "head the enemy off at the Lackawaxen," and also that one hundred and five men, under the command of Major Meeker, of the State of New York, were in pursuit of the savages.

Sullivan's expedition against the Indian strongholds on the North Branch of the Susquehanna had in the mean time been undertaken and accomplished, and thus Wyoming was in some measure avenged, and the Indians were so cowed that they made no more large incursions into the settlements.

It was on June 18, 1779, that General Sullivan left Easton with two thousand five hundred men en route to chastise the Indians in the Wyoming Valley. His route lay through Monroe County.[1] The first day he went as far as liams; Oration, by Hon. Wm. J. Groo; Addresses, by Hon. A. C. Butts, J. W. Johnston, Hon. George H. Rowland, Hon. Thomas J. Lyon; and a Poem, by Ezra F. Calkin, Esq. An account of these exercises, together with copies of the addresses and a history of the battle by J. W. Johnston, were afterwards published in a pamphlet.

At Goshen a salute of thirteen guns was fired at sunrise, and at half-past nine o'clock forty-four guns were fired in honor of the forty-four who fell under the tomahawk of Brandt and his men. At the same time the village bells were tolled, all flags were displayed at half-mast and a procession a mile and a half long marched through the streets. Not less than ten thousand persons were in the place.

Harrison W. Manny, president of the village of Goshen, delivered an address of welcome. Ex-Judge James W. Taylor, of Newburgh, presided and made an address. An oration was delivered by the Rev. Dr. J. Halstead Carroll, of Newburgh. Speeches were made by State Assessor James A. Briggs, of Brooklyn, and Chas. H. Winfield, of New York. The monument was wreathed with flowers, and many public and private buildings were decorated.

[1] The sketch of Sullivan's route from Easton to Wyoming is furnished by William S. Rees.

Heller's[1] tavern, about two miles below the Wind Gap (afterwards known as Lever's). On the second day he marched through the Wind Gap, and passed about half a mile east of what is now "Ross Common," coming into the valley (below Saylorsburg) near the Indian Springs, passing what is now Saylorsburg and Brinker's (now Sciota), and thence marching in a nearly direct line to Learn's (called then Larne's and Larner's, now the village of Tannersville), where he camped the second night. From Learn's he went up the westerly branch of the Pocono Creek, by Scott's Run, to "Camp Chowder,"[2] at or near the mouth of White Oak Run (at which place there was afterwards a tavern kept by a man by the name of Zabrieski, and known at that time as Zabrieski's, but for the last fifty years known as "White Oak Run"). From White Oak Run the army passed over "Birch Hill,"[3] crossing Birch Run and Mud Run. Soon after crossing Mud Run they came to a knoll, or small round hill, and encamped, and sent back to Fort Penn (Stroudsburg) for provisions, and lay there several days making a road through a swamp at the northwestern base of the hill while waiting for provisions from Fort Penn. Sullivan named the two places respectively "Hungry Hill" and "Hell's Kitchen." On the hill a tree was marked by letters cut in it, "HUNGRY HILL," and one in the swamp, "HELL'S KITCHEN," in letters about two inches in size, by peeling the bark off the tree about half-way around and cutting the letters in the solid peeled wood. As the bark grew over the letters it was cut away by different ones, so as not to cover the letters from view by new-formed wood and bark. The tree on the hill has been broken by the wind. About thirty or thirty-five years ago the tree in the swamp was broken down in a storm, and Frederick P. Miller, who kept a hotel a few miles west of "Hell's Kitchen" (now Tompkinsville), sawed a block out of the tree with the letters on, and had it on the mantel in his bar-room for some time, when the late John Newton Stokes, of Stroudsburg, purchased it from him and sent it to the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, where it is at present.[4]

While at Hungry Hill one of Sullivan's soldiers died, and was buried by the side of the road, on the crest of the hill, and the grave is plainly to be seen by all passers, being indicated by the mound and a large stone at the head of the grave.

The army crossed the Tunkhanna Creek at or near the present site of Tompkinsville, and a few miles farther west crossed the Tobyhanna at an island, where afterwards there was a tavern or hotel kept by a man named Levers. One or two of the old apple-trees at the place are to be seen at this day. About two and one-half miles west of the Tobyhanna Creek (after crossing Tobyhanna Branch and Deep Run) the army passed around the south side of "Locust Ridge," a large round hill or mountain, which can be seen from a distance in almost any direction (in fact, can be seen from a point on the "Godfrey Hill," about two miles from Stroudsburg).

At Locust Ridge, close to the Sullivan road, there is a grave, with a stone mound, said by some in early days to be the grave of one of Sullivan's men, and by others to be the grave of a man named Everitt (a Pennamite), killed in the fight at Locust Ridge between the Yankees and Pennamites, in 1784.

About four miles west of Locust Ridge General Sullivan crossed the Lehigh River, a short distance below the mouth of Trout Creek, from what is now Tobyhanna township, Monroe County, into the township of Buck, Luzerne County, and between three and four miles from the Lehigh in a northwesterly course, struck the road leading from the Wyoming Valley to the Wind Gap (in what was called the "Shades of Death," which extended from the Lehigh

[2] It was said that trout were so plenty that the army made a chowder of them, and, consequently, called the place Camp Chowder.

[3] White Oak Run passes along the foot of Birch Hill on the southeast, and Birch Run on the north and northwest at the base of the hill.

River to and west of Bear Creek, in Luzerne County), which on the surveys and drafts was generally designated as "The road from Shupp's to Wyoming, or Old Shupp road."

The place where Gen. Sullivan came on the Shupp road was at the location of Buck's tavern,—now Baumont, Luzerne County,—three miles from "Lehigh Falls" (at what is now Stoddartsville.)

On the 1st of July, preparations having all been made, the army left Wilkesbarre to ascend the North Branch. As we have before said, the force consisted of twenty-five hundred men, many of them sharpshooters, and was followed by a train of two thousand pack-horses. It was the bravest sight which the Susquehanna Valley had ever seen. One hundred and twenty boats had been collected to assist the army in its passage up the North Branch. As they passed the fort which Captain Spaulding had rebuilt mutual salutes were passed, and the column pushed on through the wild woods to Tioga Point. At that place he was joined by an auxiliary body under General Clinton (father of De Witt Clinton), and together the united forces —consisting of fifteen hundred riflemen, thirty-five hundred of the other arms, four six-pounder and three three-pounder guns—proceeded on the campaign, with one month's provisions laden on their pack-horses. The Indians believed it impossible that a regularly-appointed army should reach them in their fastnesses and destroy their towns, but soon they saw their mistake. Then, in the presence of actual danger, they collected their warriors, and, accepting battle near where Elmira, New York, now stands, they fought with the utmost bravery and desperation, but it was of no avail; they were utterly defeated and fled in a panic, leaving their fields and villages unprotected before the victors. The women and children fled in crowds to the protection of Fort Niagara, and the warriors made no further stand, except to harass the avenging columns from places of concealment along the march, and even in this manner they could inflict but slight damage on the whites. The day of reckoning and of retribution had come. Their corn-fields were totally destroyed, their villages burned, and themselves, cowed in spirit and stripped of all, forced to seek food and protection with their British allies. Having thus struck the blow which forever destroyed the Iroquois confederacy, and accomplished the object of the campaign, General Sullivan once more turned his face towards the southeast, and moved his column, by easy marches, back to their starting-point in Northampton County.

The following eulogistic review of General Sullivan's operations is taken from Chastilleux's "Voyages dans l'Amerique Septentrionale," vol. ii. p. 316. "In whatever manner this expedition was set on foot, which took place in 1779, after the evacuation of Philadelphia and the diversion made by d'Estaing's squadron, the greatest difficulty to surmount was the long march to be made through woods, deserts and morasses, conveying all their provisions on beasts of burden and continually exposed to the attacks of the savages.

"The instructions given by General Sullivan to his officers, the order of march he prescribed to his troops, and the discipline he had the ability to maintain, would have done honor to the most experienced amongst ancient or modern generals. It may fairly be asserted that the journal of this expedition would lose nothing in a comparison with the famous retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, which it would resemble very much, if we could compare the manœuvres, the object of which is attack, with those which have no other than the preservation of a forlorn army.

"General Sullivan, after a month's march, arrived without any check at the entrenched camp, the last refuge of the savages; here he attacked them, and was received with great courage, insomuch that the victory would have been undecided had not the Indians lost many of their chiefs in battle, which never fails to intimidate them, and they retreated during the night. The general destroyed their houses and plantations, since when they have never shown themselves in a body. However slight and insufficient the idea may be that I have given of this campaign, it may nevertheless astonish our European military men to learn that General Sullivan was only a lawyer in 1775, and that in the year 1780 he quitted the army to resume his profession, and is now civil Governor of New Hampshire."

General Sullivan returned by the same route upon which he went to Wyoming, and halted at Brinker's (in Hamilton township, formerly Fennersville, now Sciota) several days, waiting for his wagon-train, which took the Shupp road and came down through what is now Chestnut Hill township, by way of Shupp's. Both of those roads (Shupp's and Sullivan's) are plainly indicated in many places, where they had been dug out against side hills, and also by belts of yellow (or pitch) pine trees across the barrens on the Pocono Mountain. The old Shupp road is plainly seen on the spur of the mountain, east of the Gap and turnpike, and forty-five years ago the Indian path, at the Sullivan road, could be clearly seen in places. Both roads were made near old Indian trails.

The capture and escape of John Hilborn [1] formed one of the most notable occurrences of the Indian War of the Revolutionary period. Of this we have quite a minute and circumstantial account,[2] which we give at length, partly because of its intrinsic, and partly because of its illustrative interest.

"Mr. Hilborn and his few scattered neighbors had, in their isolated condition, become apprehensive of the danger of a sudden attack by the Indians, and had agreed to keep each other informed on what was taking place, by communicating as frequently as possible. Among these neighbors was John Price, a relative of Hilborn's, who lived seven miles above, on the north branch of the creek.

"One morning in the early part of June, 1779, an old woman came running down the stream in great distress, saying that her son's family were all killed or taken prisoners by the Indians, herself only escaping. This family resided on the west branch of the creek, though I am unable to give the name.

"Mr. Hilborn set out immediately to give the warning to John Price. On his way, after ascending a hill, he saw the house in flames from which the family had been captured. Proceeding in the direction of Mr. Price's, and when about one mile from the burning dwelling, on ascending another hill, he found himself suddenly surrounded by five Indians, all armed with guns, who demanded his surrender; seeing no possibility of escape, he felt that he must submit to whatever conditions they might be disposed to exact, and resolved to do it with as good grace as possible. They then informed him (as they all spoke tolerably good English) that if he would give a solemn promise not to attempt to escape, they would spare his life; if not, they would kill him on the spot. He made the promise, and, as will appear, kept it faithfully during the entire period of his cap-

[1] John Hilborn was one of the trustees who fixed the site for the seat of justice for Wayne County at Bethany, and erected the first county buildings there. He and his two brothers, Joseph and William, had the charge of and performed much of the work in first opening the State road, called the "North and South road," in 1788, from Pocono Point, through the western part of the county, to the north line of the State, with a branch road to Harmony, and in opening, in 1792, the State road from Stroudsburg, via "Bloomingrove Farm" and "Union Sugar Co.," property to Equinunk and Stockport. This last-mentioned road was known as the "Hilborn road," and in the erection, in 1798, of the "Six Northern Townships" (then so called), it was made the boundary line between Palmyra and Lackawaxen townships. In 1791 John Hilborn settled with his family on the Susquehanna flats, at the mouth of Cascade Creek, in Harmony township—now Susquehanna County. In making their journey to this new home, his wife traveled all the way from Stroudsburg, a distance of one hundred and ten miles, on horseback, and carried an infant child in her arms. Mr. Hilborn died at Harmony in April, 1826, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

[2] The sketch is contributed by Luke W. Brodhead, who derived it from Paul S. Preston, who, in turn, had the facts from the journal of his father, Samuel Preston, of Stockport, Wayne County, written in 1787. It appears that in June of that year the father, Samuel Preston, was a guest at the house of Colonel Jacob Stroud, of Stroudsburg, and on the morning of the 16th he, in company with John Fish, went to see John Hilborn, who lived seven miles up Brodhead's Creek. Mr. Preston, as also Mr. Hilborn, were members of the Society of Friends. They reached the house about noon, and were kindly received by Mr. Hilborn and his brother, whom Mr. Preston represents as worthy men, and the owners of a large property and mill, where they manufactured pine lumber, which was then in great abundance, and hauled it some seven or eight miles to the Delaware River to be rafted. During his stay Mr. Preston received from Mr. Hilborn a detailed narrative of his capture and his subsequent adventures with the Indians, which is here related in as condensed form as possible, without omitting incidents of interest.

tivity. They then bound a heavy burthen on his back and ordered him to march. Soon after they passed in sight of John Price's house, where a halt was made. The Indians questioned Hilborn closely as to who lived there, what sort of a man he was, whether he was rich, etc., and also whether he kept a gun. He answered truthfully all their questions; that Price was a peaceable, quiet man, that he was not rich, that he kept a gun, as every one did, to supply himself with game, that he took no part in the war, etc. After an excited talk of considerable length they concluded to pass by the house of Mr. Price and spare him for the present, to the great relief of Mr. Hilborn. He discovered that all the family whose house they had burned were in company except one little boy, who, on account of his loud cries—as he some time after learned—was killed at the house. They made rapid marches all the way to the North Branch of the Susquehanna, crossing many streams of considerable depth, which they were obliged to wade, and proved a cause of much suffering to the women and children, who became greatly fatigued and at times nearly exhausted. They crossed the Susquehanna above the mouth of the Tioga, and found the former deep and difficult of passage, so much so that two of the young girls were only saved from drowning by the extraordinary efforts of Mr. Hilborn. He seems to have had great sympathy for this captive family, consisting of the mother and four or five children, affording them all the relief possible in their tiresome journey, and encouraging them, whenever opportunity afforded, with comforting words; and they were greatly endeared to him, confirming our observations of all similar experience in life, that community of suffering makes the sufferers kin. After crossing the Susquehanna the Indians seemed to feel themselves out of danger of pursuit, and their marches were thereafter much easier. A little girl of the captive family became a great favorite with all the Indians, and was treated with much kindness, they doing everything possible for her comfort on the journey, promising her many things on their arrival at their home in Shenango, telling her many times that she should have plenty of milk, etc. But what seemed very remarkable in view of the care and consideration bestowed on this child, was the fact, that they frequently showed her the scalp of her little brother, killed at the house, the sight of which caused her to weep bitterly.

"After crossing the river, a few short marches brought them to the place where their canoes were tied up; why they were not left on the opposite side of the river on setting out with their expedition, Mr. Hilborn could not understand. They placed him in one of the canoes with the larger portion of the party, and under guard, ordered him to pole it up the stream, which he did the whole distance to Shenango. They frequently went ashore, and on one occasion the old Delaware Indian, who seemed to act the part of a chief, went out hunting and killed a large buck. On his return he ordered two Indians, young men, with Mr. Hilborn, to go and dress the deer and bring it in. One of these Indians was a Delaware, a large, coarse man, the other a genteel young Mohawk, who had on several occasions before shown kindness to Mr. Hilborn. The Delaware was surly and overbearing and ordered the young Mohawk to dress the deer, which he undertook, but not succeeding very well, they soon engaged in a quarrel in their own language and finally in a desperate fight. The Mohawk, though the younger, was the more active and proved the conqueror, compelling the Delaware to finish dressing the deer.

"On the arrival of the party at the Indian settlements at Shenango, Mr. Hilborn found himself quite ill from exposure, and nearly exhausted. He was compelled to perform a great amount of severe labor for the Indians, and imposed an additional amount on himself in his efforts to relieve his fellow-captives. In this condition he learned to his horror that he was required to undergo the severe ordeal of running the gauntlet.

"The arrival of the party seemed soon to be generally known at the different Indian towns near, as a large and jubilant crowd was soon collected, composed mainly of women and children, who were to be Mr. Hilborn's tormentors, and who seemed eager to engage in the sport of lashing the poor captive. Two long lines were formed, composed of women and children armed with whips and clubs, through which Mr. Hilborn was to pass. The young Mohawk, of whom mention has been made, stood by silently watching with evident displeasure the preparations for this humiliating method of torture, so universally prevalent among his people, feeling that the prisoner in his present condition was unable to endure the punishment. Mr. Hilborn was ordered to start at a given signal; he attempted to run as well as he could, but had proceeded but a few paces when the brave and generous young Mohawk broke in the ranks and arrested his further progress; the confusion that ensued lasted but a moment, as he boldly announced his determination, and right from custom, to offer himself to run in place of the sick captive. He was accepted, and ran the whole course; notwithstanding his remarkable agility, he was severely punished, but he endured it without a word of complaint and apparently with stoical indifference. The young Mohawk continued the friend of Mr. Hilborn throughout his captivity and was always kind and considerate towards him.

"During his stay at Shenango the Indians received intelligence of General Sullivan's intention of coming up the Susquehanna to destroy their towns and growing crops; this information produced the wildest excitement, and on the part of some of the warriors, exhibitions of violent rage.

"They had a large body of the best of land under cultivation, with the prospect of an abundant harvest of Indian corn, beans, etc., and the thought of having it destroyed was a natural cause of anxiety.

"About the time of receiving intelligence of the movements of General Sullivan they were holding a council in reference to an expedition to the settlements on the West Branch of the Susquehanna, to be commanded by the celebrated Capt. Brandt and Capt. Montour. Hilborn was informed of this contemplated expedition by his friend, the young Mohawk, who seemed to be privy to all that was taking place. He expressed his fears for the fate of Hilborn should this expedition be attended with unfavorable results, and also in case General Sullivan's army should make its appearance. The prisoners in either case would be treated badly. Hilborn now for the first time made efforts to obtain for himself and his companions release from captivity, and for this purpose had an interview with the old Delaware chief who took him prisoner. He made no attempts at misstatement, for he found the old man exceedingly shrewd and any efforts to deceive him would be fruitless. He told him that he was a Quaker, that he had taken no part in the war, that it was against his religious principles to fight, etc., and that the women and children could do them no harm; but all his arguments were in vain; the only reply was that, "all the Yankees have the same story." Yet they treated him with more consideration after this interview. His employment was now, and had been for some time, to attend to the cultivation of the growing corn. (As is well known, General Sullivan in a few weeks from this time rendered desolate this whole region of country, destroying forty villages, some of them containing as many as a hundred houses, together with 160,000 bushels of corn, leaving scarce a trace of vegetation on the surface.)

"Mr. Hilborn, now finding that he could not purchase his freedom by entreaties, laid a plan for his escape. He concluded to take a canoe at night and quietly push down the Susquehanna until morning, and then hide the craft in the mouth of some creek, while he watched from an elevated position to ascertain if he was pursued; if so, to take his chances by land, and if not, to again take the canoe and at night make his way down the stream. In planning his escape his mind became greatly exercised, for notwithstanding the promise made on the day of his capture was not voluntary, having been extorted from him at the peril of his life, and therefore not strictly binding, yet when he came to make the trial, he could not with a clear conscience disregard the pledges he had given and falsify his word; yet the plan of escape was deemed practical, and he had many opportunities for putting it in execution. On one occasion he was sent some distance for water; a strong impulse to regain his freedom suddenly took possession of him, and he dropped his camp-kettle and began to run. After going about half a mile he again thought of the promise on which his life had been spared, and as speedily returned to the camp with the water.

"Capt. Brandt was arranging now for his intended expedition against the settlements on the West Branch of the Susquehanna.

"Hilborn heard from his Indian friend his opinion of the high character of the Mohawk chief, whom he described as the greatest man among the Indian nations; that he had been educated in New England, had since been in London in company with Guy Johnston, and now held a commission under the crown, and that he was noted as much for his humanity as for his bravery. Mr. Hilborn now resolved to call on Brandt and state his case as well as he could. He found him in his tent, seated at a table, writing, and dressed in a calico wrapper. He was received with great politeness, and Capt. Brandt acted towards him more like an English gentleman than an Indian chief. He listened attentively to what Mr. Hilborn had to say, and seemed to have much sympathy for him, but finally told him that as he was a prisoner of the Delawares, he could not interfere for him, as he was a Mohawk. Yet Hilborn believed that the interview was of service to him, for it was ordered soon after that he should be sent to Niagara and delivered to the English there.

"After bidding farewell to his generous Indian friend, he was conducted through the Genesee country, where he saw large bodies of beautiful land under cultivation by the Indians.

"From Niagara he was ordered on board a vessel to be sent to Quebec. In passing down the St. Lawrence the water was exceedingly rapid and the navigation appeared dangerous. The vessel was conducted by a Frenchman with much skill, and he arrived safely in Quebec in just two months from the time he was taken prisoner. Here he was under no restraint and seemed to be left to take care of himself. He was now hungry, moneyless and almost naked. In this extremity he applied to an Irish colonel in the British service for relief. The colonel listened to the relation he gave of himself, and, to Hilborn's surprise, loaned him money enough to purchase a tolerably decent suit of clothes and something to eat.

"He now made effort to obtain employment, by which he might support himself for the present and discharge his obligation to the generous colonel. Happening to mention to him that he was a miller by trade, he at once sent him to a mill of his own on the opposite side of the river, to work for a time on trial. In this new situation he did everything in his power to show his gratitude by furthering the interests of his employer. He made several alterations, re-dressed the stones, etc., and after a little time had the mill doing better than it had ever done before. The colonel was greatly pleased and soon after made him superintendent of the whole business of purchasing grain, selling the flour, as well as attending to its manufacture, the sale of flour amounting to about £100 per week. He remained in this situation over a year, but with constant longing to return home; yet no opportunity was afforded. He at length made known his desire to the colonel, who seemed very reluctant to part with him, and offered to give him whatever wages he might in reason ask, if he would remain.

"But seeing he had his heart set on getting to his home, the colonel generously procured a passage for him in a transport about to sail for New York. They sailed by the Newfoundland fisheries, when the captain receiving information of a French fleet lying off the coast, they put into Halifax. He remained in Nova Scotia a considerable time, when he again took passage and was finally landed in New Jersey, somewhere near Amboy, from which place he walked to his father's house, in Makefield, and from thence to his home on Brodhead's Creek, having been away just two years from the time of his capture."

The family captured with Mr. Hilborn were all released and returned safely home, excepting one of the children, who died at Niagara.

The battle of the Raymondskill, or, as it is sometimes called, the battle of the Conashaugh, occurred the year following the battle of the Lackawaxen or Minisink. Of this engagement we have a carefully preserved traditional report and a cotemporary account which agrees substantially with it, and give place to both, as no narrative of the fight has ever appeared in the public prints.

Old James Philip McCarty, who was "redeemed" by Daniel Westfall (that is, he sold his time to pay his passage), was brought by the latter up to New Jersey. He started a clearing on the Pennsylvania side, up the Raymondskill (Pike County), and had stock over there. One rainy day in April, 1780, McCarty crossed the Delaware and went up to his clearing to look after his horses. He was riding his horse when it started and gave a snort. McCarty looked and discovered an Indian. He rode on, however, trying to appear as if he did not see him, but, when he got out of sight, he slipped from the horse and ran across the creek and down near its mouth, where he crossed it again on a foot-log, and followed down the Delaware under cover of the bank to the usual place of crossing, opposite the stone fort in New Jersey. Here he hid in the brush and waited for some one to come across for him, for he concluded that his people would become alarmed on account of his absence and look for him. His brother John became anxious about him towards nightfall, and, in company with Sam Helm, started across the river from the fort, to look for him. As McCarty saw them coming, he stood up, and Sam Helm, mistaking him for an Indian, immediately drew up his rifle and fired. The ball hit McCarty in the shoulder; then they saw what they had done and carried him across to the fort. He told them about seeing the Indian, and Captain Peter Westbrook immediately began to make preparations to reconnoitre the Pennsylvania side in force next day. He received reinforcements from the Pennsylvania side; Lieutenant Ennis was along and Captain Van Etten. They crossed from the fort the next morning and thought they would find the Indians on Powwow Hill, an elevated little plateau, at the mouth of the Raymondskill. Part of the men went up over the hill and the rest of them went up the Raymondskill. Those that crossed Powwow Hill found two Indians, and Sam Helm shot and wounded one of them badly. (Years afterward they found the skeleton of an Indian in a cleft in the rocks not far away, and they supposed it was that of this wounded Indian, who had hidden away and died there.) They worked their way up the mountain and came together, and followed the Indian trail, single file. When they had reached Bastian Spring, where there is a bluff at the right, they were fired upon by the Indians, who were in ambush. The captain and about one-third of the men in front stood their ground, while those in the rear broke and fled. The men who fought dropped behind trees and returned the fire of the Indians. Abram Westbrook, who was a young man, kept close to his uncle, the captain, and fired away with his gun, but he noticed that the Indian he had selected did not fall. The captain looked around and saw that they were alone and that the Indians were trying to surround them. He told his nephew to load his gun and then they started to retreat. They had not run far when they came to a thicket, and there they parted, Abram taking one side and the captain the other. Abram reached the Delaware and crossed with the other fugitives, who had rendezvoused there. Sam Helm was shot through the fleshy part of both thighs, but waded down the Conashaugh, supported by two men, who carried a stick that he leaned on. Lieutenant Ennis was killed and twelve others, and a number were wounded. The place to which they retreated is below Cave Bank, and is called Death Eddy to this day. They went up in force the next day and found Captain Westbrook killed and scalped near the thicket where he separated from young Abram Westbrook. The dead were taken up and buried in the old Minisink burying-ground, and cedar posts were placed at their heads. These posts remained for years and some persons now living remember seeing them. There was an Indian burying-ground not far from where the battle was fought, on the side-hill back from the Delaware, and that region was sacred ground to the Indians. If the forces under Westbrook had stood their ground they might have defeated the Indians, but they were under no discipline, and, being suddenly attacked, every man appears to have looked out for himself. Abram Westbrook was only about nineteen when the battle was fought, and he kept close to his uncle, fancying that he would be safer with him. The gun which he used was a borrowed one, and he afterward found that the barrel was crooked, which accounted for his poor shots during the fight.[1]

The cotemporary account which we cull from the musty and little-known pages of the Colonial Records, appears in a letter from John Van Campen to President Reed and fixes the date of the battle of the Raymondskill on April 21, 1780. It will be noticed that it disagrees in details with the account already given, but in the main supports it.

"LOWER SMITHFIELD, April the 24th, 1780.

"Honored Sir:

"In hope my last by Mr. Mixer is come to hand, informing you of the Incursion of the Indians at the house of Manvel Gunsaleyes. I herewith inform your honor of their later attempts. James McCarte, with his family, was removed to the Jersey. On the 20th Instant his sons went to their home to feed the Cattle, Discovered Signs of Indians, returned to the Jersey immediately, and acquainted Major Westbrook and Captain Westbrook (with) the signs they had Discovered. They sent immediately for some of their best men and Crossed the River that night, and about sunrise the morning following Discovered the Indians Nigh the Barun and began the attack; the number of the Enemy is supposed to be about fourteen; the Major received no Damage with his party; the Indians retreated to the woods; the Major was reinforced by Captain Vannatten with three of his sons & Son in Law. Pursued the Indians by the Blood, and about two miles came up with them. As it is, without Doubt three of them was wounded. Renewed the attack, Drove the Indians in a few minutes; they Ran to the edge of a thick woods. Captain Vannatten maintained his ground with his few men, the Major with his men also. Captain Westbrook's men left him at the first fire from the enemy in the Woods, which was the ruin of the whole; but the ground maintained for some time and the retreat secured by the Major & Vannatten; kill'd and missing on the part of the Major and Vannatten; Captain Westbrook missing; not yet found; Benjamin Ennis kill'd, son in law to Captain Vannatten; Richard Rosekrans kill'd and two more wounded. Of the enemy kill'd, two found, one an officer, appearing by his Dress, found in his pocket a regular Journal from the first of March until the 16th Inst.; as appears by his journal there is three hundred and Ninety marched from Niagari (Niagara), divided into Different parties; the Officer was a White man.

"Respective Sir:

"I'me now under Difficulties of mind; what the Event will be God only knows; the People are Determined to Evacuate the Country, as there appears no Prospect of Relief by the Militia.

"I am, Sir, with Due Respect,

"Your Most Huble Servt,

"JOHN VANCAMPEN.

"P. S.—The said McCarte where the attack began is about two miles Below Well's Ferry,[2] on the Banks of Delaware.

"Capt. Vannatten lives in Delaware township, one mile below McCarte's."[3]

About the time of the Hilborn capture by the Indians, there were several other persons either made prisoners or murdered by the Indians in what is now Monroe County. Emmanuel Salleday, who lived on the Ransbury place, three miles from Stroudsburg, with his family, were made captives and taken to New York State, but subsequently released and returned to the Minisink. Emmanuel Gunsolus (or Gonzales) and his daughter were taken from their home near Bushkill and conveyed to Niagara, where the father was compelled to run the gauntlet. The Learn (or Larner) family were surprised and several of them killed,[4] and Colonel Stroud, of Fort Penn, was bitterly complained of by Robert Levers, of Easton, in letters to the Council, it being alleged that he would not send men to protect them, because he judged Learn to be a Tory.

It was also about this time that a small band of Indians came down upon the Middle Smithfield settlement, near the "Kechout," on the Bushkill, and lying stealthily in ambush, succeeded in accomplishing a murderous design. William Courtright and Charles McGinnis went at evening to a pasture owned by the former to turn out some horses, and as they let down the bars, three Indians sprang out of the bushes and captured them and the animals they led. They speedily fled with their prisoners northward (following a route coinciding with the present Coolbaugh road northward to the saw-mill). When they had gone about five miles McGinnis became fatigued, and his captors, not being able to make him travel as fast as they desired, halted, deliberately painted themselves, as was their custom when about to commit a deed of blood, and killed him with their tomahawks. This occurred in the wilderness, at a place in the northern part of Middle Smithfield, ever since called "McGinnis' Barren." After taking his scalp they marched on and reached a point about twelve miles farther north at sundown, and encamped in a large swamp. Courtright, unperceived by the Indians, had been breaking twigs along the route, and, unknown to the Indians, a party of rescuers were following as fast as possible the trail thus indicated.

The pursuing party, Robert and Benjamin Hanna and William Sanders, came up with them about the time they halted. They crept cautiously close to them and just as one of the savages was kneeling and about to strike fire with a flint and steel, they fired. Two of the Indians fell and the third sprang away like a startled deer into the fastnesses of the swamp. Courtright jumped to his feet and ran towards his deliverers exclaiming "Thank God, I am a free man!" The Indian who was running for his own freedom turned quickly, however, and fired at Courtright, the ball breaking his thigh. Rescuers and rescued remained near by during the night and on the following day the wounded man was carried home on a blanket suspended between the two horses which had been recovered. The place of this occurrence, about three miles south of the High Knob, in Pike County, is known as the "Big Indian Swamp." Courtright finally died from his wound.

A family named Shoemaker, residing near Jacob Nyce's place, above Bushkill, was attacked, the father and son were killed, and the daughter, "Yonachy," then seven years of age, taken prisoner. In the exchange of prisoners she was returned and afterwards married a Mr. Cortright.

Such incidents as the foregoing were of frequent occurrence, and the whole country was kept in a state of continual terror.

The provincial authorities were in constant communication with the local officers, Colonel Stroud, of Fort Penn, and others, and always manifested sympathy, while they furnished all of the aid in their power.

President Reed, of the Executive Council, writing to Colonel Stroud, under date of August 3, 1779, says,—

"The distress of your County by the late Incursions of the Indians has given us very great Concern, and the more so as we understand the militia, having got into some Confusion, do not render the services that might be expected. We are sorry to find that some mistaken opinions you have formed on the mode of their being called out & of the Appointments of the Lieutenants have had a great share in this Evil. As you are now most probably experiencing the sad Effects of such Mistakes, we shall not add to your Pain by dwelling upon them, but desire you to consider the Effects & Consequences, which cannot be other than the Ruin of your outer settlements & impoverishment of the County itself. As you . . . possess a good share of the Esteem & Confidence of the People, I shall hope and do recommend it to you as the best Service you can perform to your Bleeding country to do away as far as possible the Effects of former Opinions & strive, by a general Concurrence with the other Gentlemen in the militia, to give them vigour & Efficacy, encouraging and promoting a spirit of Fidelity & Obedience to the Laws as calculated to afford the best Relief and Security against the dreadful calamity."[1]

On April 7, 1780, the Council received letters from Colonel Stroud, Depui, Van Campen and others, representing the condition of distress north of the mountains, in Northampton County, the need of ammunition, etc.

President Reed wrote to Col. Jacob Stroud, April 11, 1780, telling him that he had received his favor by Mr. Kortright and expressing sympathy with him in his distress. "We have," he says, "as the first step of relief, delivered Mr. Kortright two hundred pounds of powder, eight hundred lead and five hundred flints, which will be delivered by him to Mr. Kacklin, lieutenant of the county, to be forwarded to the places most wanted. . . . We have also directed Colonel Kacklin to order out a class of the militia on tour of duty, to march up to your township with as little delay as possible." He expressed but little faith in the efficacy of such measures, however, and urged the encouragement of the young men to form parties "to strike the enemy near home and give them the alarm for their own safety," saying, "we would gladly support and promote such a measure and have therefore authorized the lieutenant of the county to offer fifteen hundred dollars for every Indian or Tory prisoner taken in arms against us and one thousand dollars for every Indian scalp."[1] Colonel Stroud thanked the President for the aid and encouragement extended in a letter dated "April ye 17."

It was not from actual Indian hostilities alone that the people suffered. The asperities of life in small ways were very great. The inhabitants of the regions remote from trade centres suffered from absence of many of the commonest necessaries of life. Heavy demands were made upon the country for supplies for the army. The cattle were all driven away to Bethlehem, Philadelphia and other points, and so the people had little or no meat but such as the frontiersman's rifle could procure.

Tallow was, as a matter of course, equally scarce, and the people in many instances had recourse to a bush called the candleberry-bush to obtain the material for candles. The stems and twigs of this bush, cut in small fragments, were boiled in a kettle, when a peculiar wax or grease arose to the surface, which was carefully skimmed off, and, when a sufficient amount was procured, formed into candles by dipping or molding. The candles were of a delicate green color and gave a pale, but clear light. This serves as a fair illustration of the expedients to which the people were driven to provide the commonest necessities.

An extreme scarcity of salt was a more serious deprivation during Revolutionary times than would at first be imagined. It brought from eight to twenty dollars per bushel and oftentimes was not to be had for any price. A plant, of the fern species, was used by many families as a substitute, but poorly answered the purpose, though it made meat and vegetables more savory and palatable than they would be without its application.

Concerning this matter of the scarcity of salt, there has been preserved an old letter of Colonel Stroud's, which shows how difficult it was to procure it and also how scarce were some other commodities,—

"Lower Smithfield, October the 16th, 1779.

"Col. Matlack:

"I must Beg of you if it is in your power to assist me in geting again 27 and ½ bushels of salt that I had engaged and paid for last April to Abbe James, but being alarmed with the Indeons so that I could not Send for it, and looking on it safer than it would be at home, as I did not know but every day wee should be drove off, I had ingaged all the salt to my nabours that allways this several years have had their supplyes from me. If anything should be wanting to Inform any Gentleman, Mr. Abbe James will be able to give a full information. I spoke to His Excellency the President and he told me I should have Some if not all, I now have sent my Team for the Salt and as the President has so much business on hand to take his attention, I must Beg of you to Take the Troble to forrowd the matter. The salt was taken by the Committee, and what Line that now Lies in now is unknowing to me, as I live so far off, and as we Live so far of we Dont stand any Chance of getting Salt to what others Doe that Lives near Town, and as for Sending flouer down, we cant do it now as the army has been abought hear, and has Taken all our grane,[2] &c., that unless it is a few that have a little yet. Any Troble you are at I shall be Ready and willing to pay you for and be very much obliged to you, besides I dont know of any other man at this time I can apply to but you. I am Sir

"Your very umble Servant

During 1781–82 two companies of soldiers—Captain Philip Shrawder's rangers and Captain Johannes Van Etten's veterans, who had been in the field in 1777 and fought at the Brandywine—were kept on duty in the region north of the mountains, and, in conjunction with Colonel Stroud's men at Fort Penn and small informally banded bodies, kept the Lower Minisink free from depredations.

Farther up the valley, however, the depredations of the Indians were still continued in 1782, and the Pennsylvania side was almost deserted, as the following petition from some of the inhabitants in New Jersey shows:

"MINISINK, 10 December, 1782.

"His excellency Governor Livingston and the Honorable Legislative Council and General Assembly of New Jersey.

"Gentlemen we the inhabitants of the frontier of the county of Sussex beg leave to present our petition to the Honorable Legislature of the state. The Inhabitants who formerly lived on the Pennsylvania Side of the river opposite to us have Principally left their farms and moved into Jersey and other places to escape savage cruelty. These Inhabitants was formerly a considerable guard to us, but now there is nothing to stop the Enemy but the river which is Fordible in a grate Number of places a considerable part of the year Particularly in Harvest and other times when the Enemy can do us the Greatest Damage. The Situation of this country and the manner in which the Savages Carry on the War like a Thief in the Night renders it impracticable to depend on the Militia for Security, for before they can be collected the mischief is done and the Enemy secure in the Wilderness. Numbers of us have friends and near relatives who have been torn from their familys and connections and are groaning under cruel Savage Captivity. These labour under the sad remembrance of having experienced the Truly Shocking Spectacle of Seeing there Dearest Connections Murdered and Scalped before there Eyes and we have grate reason to fear we shall share the same fate unless some move be adopted for our security We therefore most earnestly pray that a law may be passed by the Honourable Legislature before they adjourn for raising a company of about Eighty men Properly officered and to be Stationed here for our Protection the Ensuing Campaign."

The signatures to this petition have not been preserved, but it was forwarded the day of its date to the Governor of New Jersey. The petition is valuable chiefly as showing the deplorable condition of the Pennsylvanians along the Delaware River from the mouth of the Lackawaxen to Fort Hyndshaw. The Delaware had been the frontier line, and the Pennsylvanians, being on the west side of the river, were to New York and New Jersey what a picket line is to an army. This sturdy band of Pennsylvania pioneers maintained the unequal contest during all those dark and bloody years when Brandt and his Indian and Tory followers were ravaging the country. After the disastrous defeat at the battle of Lackawaxen or Minisink and the murder of Jeremiah Van Auken, the school-teacher at Carpenter's Point, together with the destruction of everything in that vicinity by fire, followed by the defeat at the Raymondskill, with the constant incursions, murders and annoyances from skulking Indians, it was no wonder that the picket line of Pennsylvanians had withdrawn.

But finally the dawn began to break, the long war drew to a close. Upon the 19th of October, 1781, Cornwallis' forces—seven thousand two hundred and forty-seven British and Hessian soldiers—surrendered at Yorktown, and by a swift courier the news was borne to Congress at Philadelphia, the messenger arriving there on the evening of the 23d; and the sentinels, when they called the hour of the night—"ten o' the clock and all is well"—added, "and Cornwallis is taken." This news, which spread rapidly through Pennsylvania and the other colonies, brought the long-suffering inhabitants to a realization that they were at last, even if an impoverished, an independent people. Though the armies remained for some time in the field, the war had really ended. Preliminary articles of peace were agreed to between Great Britain and the Confederation of Colonies November 30, 1782, and the definitive treaty was concluded at Paris upon the 3d of September, 1783.

Thus closed the Revolution, but upon the frontier its animosities and asperities died sullenly and slowly away, like the last, lingering reverberations of thunder in the passing of a mighty storm. Peace came at last—like the warm sunshine after long and dreary winter—and with it began a new life throughout the land.

CHAPTER VII.

End of the Pennamite War—Northampton County at the Close of the Century—Land System—First Effort for Erection of a New County.

THE Revolution being at an end, and the danger of Indian invasion over, the settlers began to return to Wyoming and the lesser colonies of Wallenpaupack and Cushutunk, still claiming their lands under Connecticut title. Pennsylvania, as ever before, viewed with great displeasure the growth of a colony within her limits which refused to recognize her authority, and applied to the Continental Congress, requesting the appointment of a tribunal to determine the matter in dispute.

Congress accordingly appointed a board of commissioners to adjudicate the question, and provided that it should meet at Trenton, where the parties were notified to attend. The State of Connecticut appointed as its representatives Messrs. Dyer, Johnston and Root, and on the part of Pennsylvania there appeared Messrs. Bradford, Reed, Wilson and Sergeant. After a deliberation of five weeks the board, on the 30th of December, 1782, pronounced the opinion that the State of Connecticut had no right to the lands in controversy, and that all of the lands lying within the charter bounds of Pennsylvania, "now claimed by Connecticut, do of right belong to the State of Pennsylvania." This was what was known as the "Trenton decree."

The people of Wyoming, says Chapman,[1] considered the question before the board merely one of jurisdiction, and that it did not affect in any degree the right of soil. They acquiesced in the verdict, therefore, and regarded themselves as holding title under Connecticut, but as amenable to the laws of Pennsylvania. "We care not," they said, "under what State we live, if we live protected and happy."

It was now recommended by the General Assembly that commissioners should be appointed to go to Wyoming, examine into the state of the country, act as magistrates and recommend what measures the government should adopt in regard to the settlers, and such commissioners were duly appointed and directed to attend there on April 15, 1783. The guard of Continental troops having been withdrawn, it was ordered, on March 4th, that Captain Philip Shrawder's company, of Northampton County, and Captain Thomas Robinson's be ordered there to "take proper measures for sustaining the post and protecting the settlement." Shrawder arrived first, on March 21st, took possession of the fort and renamed it "Fort Dickinson," in honor of the president of the Supreme Executive Council.

The inhabitants now discovered, by the conduct of the troops and the report of the commissioners, that the government of Pennsylvania regarded the Trenton decree as having decided not only the question of jurisdiction, but the right of private property also, and they discovered that the troops were present, not simply for the purpose of guarding against the common enemy, but also to protect the Pennsylvania claimants in possession of their lands.

What has been called the 'Third Pennamite War" now commenced. It was in reality the beginning of the end of the general conflict between the Pennsylvanians and the Connecticut people. There was constant contention, but no violence or overt acts were committed until May, 1784, when the troops were ordered to disarm the Connecticut settlers who had resisted the mandates of the alleged "mock tribunals" of the Pennsylvania magistrates. Under this pretense one hundred and fifty families were turned out of their dwellings (many of which were burned), and, reduced to destitution, they were compelled to leave the valley.

Thus came about another hasty evacuation of Wyoming. The people thus driven from their homes proceeded on foot through the wilderness, by way of the Lackawaxen, to the Delaware, a distance of about eighty miles. "During this journey," say Chapman and Miner, "the unhappy fugitives suffered all of the miseries which human nature seems capable of enduring."

"It is probable," says Miner,[2] "that the ostensible reason for compelling the exiles to this route (the Lackawaxen), the fear lest their old friends at Stroudsburg should afford them aid, was not without weight." One of the fugitives, describing the flight, says, "It was a solemn scene; parents, their children crying for hunger, aged men on crutches, all urged forward by an armed force at our heels." The first night they encamped at Capouse, the second at Cobb's, the third at Little Meadow, the fourth at Lackawack, the fifth at Blooming Grove, the sixth at Shohola, and on the seventh they arrived at the Delaware, where the people dispersed, some going up and some down the river, some continuing on their way east and some going back to make another effort to secure their homes and lands. They fought again to retain their possessions, and considerable bloodshed ensued in July, 1784, in engagements between the soldiers and the Pennsylvanians on one side and the Connecticut people upon the other. As of old in the Pennamite conflicts, victory perched first upon one banner and then upon the other. It is beyond our scope in these pages to follow the varying vicissitudes of this war. One item in it, however, is of local interest.

A considerable force, ordered out to quell the riots at Wyoming, was quartered for a time in that part of Northampton which is now Monroe County.

The Council, in session at Philadelphia, July 29, 1784, resolved, "that the peace and good order of government are interrupted by sudden and dangerous tumults and riots near Wyoming, in the county of Northumberland, for the suppression of which the immediate aid of the militia is expedient and necessary." It was also resolved, "That the Lieutenant of the county of Northampton be directed to draw forth a detachment of three hundred Infantry and twelve or fifteen Light Dragoons properly officered and equipped from the militia of said county." A portion of the command was under Colonel Nicholas Kern. The names of the officers of his command were as follows:

Lieutenant-colonel commanding, Nicholas Kern; Majors, Henry Alshouse and John Nelson; Adjutant, Lawrence Erb; Quartermaster, Peter Overshimer; Sergeant Major, Jno. Barnet; Quartermaster Sergeant, Henry Spering. Captains of companies, Adam Clendeneris, John Ritter, Jacob Clader, John Santee, Jacob Balliet, Lewis Stacher, John Van Etten, Timothy Jeyne, Christopher Keller and Benjamin Schoonhoven.

Captain Philip Shrawder,[1] in May, 1784, was in command of a company attached to the First Regiment, Pennsylvania Infantry, then commanded by Major James Moore, and the men in his company, there is every reason to believe, were, with perhaps a few exceptions, the same whom he led to Wyoming in August, 1784, under Col. Nicholas Kern. Following is the roster:

Captain, Philip Shrawder; First Lieutenant, John Armstrong; Second Lieutenant, Andrew Henderson; First Sergeant, Michael Knight; Second Sergeant, James Melvin; Third Sergeant, John Kilby; First Corporal, John Griffey; Second Corporal, Jacob Stoner; Drummer, John Brown; Fifer, George Burnett.

A considerable portion of Col. Kern's force was provided for at the inn and on the premises of James Logan, in what is now Stroud township.[2]

[1] Captain Shrawder was an exceedingly methodical and painstaking man, and kept a record of his militia company in a huge folio volume (now owned by Luke W. Brodhead), which he evidently procured for that purpose, but which he subsequently made a common-place book, recording many interesting documents, such as early assessment lists, resolutions relating to the Pennamite War, etc. (the more valuable of which are preserved in this work), as well as literary extracts, recipes, etc. He makes a summary of the officers engaged in the Wyoming expedition, but gives no roster of his own men for August, 1784, which would indicate that the list was identical with those given for the months preceding, the latest of which, prior to August, 1784, (May) is here copied.

[2] See chapter on Stroud township, Monroe County, for an account of James Logan and his tavern, the second one north of the mountains.

John Van Campen, Esq., was appointed commissary to furnish provisions, which he did at the rate of ten pence half-penny per ration.

Logan rendered an account to John Van Campen, commissary, which has been preserved, and affords interesting reading.[1]

The entire force raised by the Supreme Executive Council for the suppression of disturbances in Wyoming was under command of Col. John Armstrong. An advance guard under Major Moore was assembled at Learner's or Learn's. The Yankees had previously dispatched Capt. John Swift, with thirty picked men, to meet, dislodge and defeat them before they could reach the valley of Wyoming. An engagement ensued at Locust Ridge[2] on the second day of August, in which Jacob Everett, one of Moore's men, was killed, and several others wounded on each side. In Miner's "History of Wyoming" it is stated "that the Yankeys affirmed that Logan (the tavern-keeper), a mulatto, was under Patterson (Alexander) with a company of thirty men raised on the Delaware. A rude old song spoke of Logan:"

"The 20th of September
We marched the rebel route;
From Easton to Wyoming,
To drive the Yankeys out.
The wary dogs and savage beasts
Would rather steal than show their face.

"We halted all at Romig's,
Our forces to review;
Our chief commander Logan
Encouraged thus his crew—
'Brave lads,' he cried, 'who steals the most,
He shall obtain the highest post.'"

James Logan had, of course, nothing what-

In the foregoing there is a first and second account aggregating £159 8*s*.

Following this is the wagoner's account, in which Conrad Grubb, George and Henry Stacker, Christopher Keller, Melchoir Bossard, James Logan and Clarke Winans were employed in hauling flour and provisions to Jacob Brinker's, Nicholas Ernfield's, John Learn's and to Wyoming.

In the forage account of the militia light horse, hay, oats, etc., are supplied to the following-named persons: "To Jacob Heller, Capt. John Brisbin, Capt. Shrawder and company, John Hollenback, hay for 86 nights and 621 qts. oats, John Hollenback for Col. Kern, 2 nights hay and oats, John Hollenback for Robert Levers, Esq., John P. Shott for Col. Wilson, Lawrence Erb to hay & oats furnished Colonel Kern, the adjutant & 2 light horse, John Learn for L. ever to do with the expedition, but his presence before or after the engagement, as an excited and perhaps officious follower of the train, gave rise to the above ridiculous doggerel.

On the arrival of Armstrong's force (including Col. Kern's) at Wyoming hostilities ensued in that much-troubled valley, and they were continued during the year and later.

The years 1785 and 1786 did not exhibit any abatement of the controversy between the rivals. Col. John Franklin became the leading spirit among the Connecticut claimants, and Col. Timothy Pickering appeared as the chief champion of the Pennsylvania cause. A plan was formed for carving a new State from Pennsylvania, to include the old county of Westmoreland and all of the territory claimed by Connecticut, and thus wrest Wyoming from the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. Col. Ethan Allen, of Vermont, appeared upon the scene as one pledged to furnish means and men for the dismemberment of Pennsylvania.

This bold and dangerous scheme was frustrated simply by the erection of Luzerne County on Sept. 25, 1786, thus affording an opportunity for the people to have a direct representation in the Assembly and to state their grievances, and, in a large measure, shape their own affairs. This county included all of the Connecticut settlers, except those at Lackawack or Wallenpaupack and the few on the Delaware, principally at Cushutunk.

In March, 1787, the inhabitants proposed a compromise, in effect that if the commonwealth would grant them the seventeen townships which had been laid out, and in which settlements had been made prior to the "Trenton decree," they would relinquish their claim to all other lands within the limits of the Susquehanna purchase; what were known as the "certified townships" were thus secured to the settlers; but while most of the inhabitants were within these townships, there were others scattered here and there who had bought rights of the Susquehanna and Delaware Companies and made improvements upon their locations. There were quite a number of this class within the present limits of Wayne and Pike Counties. Another class of people dissatisfied with the compromise were the Pennsylvanians to whom the State had previously sold a portion of the lands, and who did not wish, very naturally, to be dispossessed of them. Such was the effect of the opposition that the next year the compromise act was suspended and afterwards repealed. The conflict was continued.

In 1795 "the Intrusion Law" was passed, warning off all settlers not applying for land under a Pennsylvania title. On April 4, 1799, an act for offering compensation to the Pennsylvania claimants of certain lands within the "certified townships" was passed and was known as the compromising law. On February 16, 1801, an act supplementary to the "Intrusion Law" of 1795 was passed, authorizing the Governor to issue a proclamation, forbidding all future intrusions and requiring all who had intruded to peaceably withdraw.

The State had, in 1799, appointed commissioners to adjust the conflicting claims of the Pennamites and "Yankees," to examine all of the claims, fix the amount each Connecticut settler should justly pay the State to perfect his title, and, on the other hand, the sum that the State should pay to those who were compelled to relinquish the lands they had bought from the State. The commission performed its duties fairly, but many persons were dissatisfied. On April 6, 1802, an act of Assembly provided "that no conveyance of land within the counties of Luzerne, Lycoming and Wayne shall pass any estate, where the title is not derived from this State or the proprietaries, before the 4th of July, 1776." The law was promulgated by proclamation of the Governor May 1, 1802, and from that time whatever "right" Connecticut claimants may have had, it was the veriest folly to defend it. But many persons still scorned all overtures from the State and firmly believed in the validity of the Connecticut title. They proposed to hold their claims in spite of all. Public feeling ran high. The newspaper controversy was heated and it seemed as if armed conflict must again occur. In fact, the Governor again contemplated calling out the militia of the State to enforce obedience; but milder methods finally prevailed, and the long-vexed question was eventually settled by amicable means.

Much of the credit for the peaceable solution of the problem and the adjustment of differences by bloodless means was due to the Quakers, or Friends, who were among the largest land-owners under the Pennsylvania title in the disputed territory.

Major Jason Torrey, of Wayne County, who was agent for many of these owners, seems to have exerted quietly a beneficent influence at a critical juncture. In his memoir, written by his son, Rev. David Torrey, D.D., occurs the following apropos to this subject:

"It was on March 1, 1803, just about three years after the commission of adjustment was appointed by the Governor, and when about two years of resistance on the part of the Connecticut settlers to the awards of that commission had wrought up the controversy between them and the authorities of the State almost to the point of a violent and bloody conflict, that Mr. Torrey writes to his parents from Philadelphia as follows:

"When I left home last Monday I expected to be absent four weeks. I now expect to be at home a week from this day.

"The urgency of my return is occasioned by an interference between the landholders and the Executive of the State, relative to the Connecticut settlers in Luzerne. The Governor has proposed sending a military force, and we (i. e., the landholders and Mr. Torrey) are for bringing them to an amicable settlement.

"In this I flatter myself with some success; at least sufficient to avert a civil war with them.

"For the last twelvemonth I have taken the position of a mediator between the landholders and the intruders. Both parties have embraced my proposals and it now remains to put the plan in operation.

"The law knows no such thing as compromise between the injured and the offender. To punish the one and restore to the other are its only means. But when the offender acknowledges his crime, comes forward with an honorable restitution and allies himself by strong ties of interest to the party he has injured, the Executive may forgive the injury, and even promote and encourage the measure.

"The mission upon which I am now engaged will decide the fate of the Connecticut settlers, who are under a Connecticut claim. If they treat for a purchase, they may, from intruders —violators of the laws of the State, and of the United States — become valuable citizens and good members of society. If these terms are rejected, force will speedily compel them, and they may be exterminated from the country."

It was not until three years later than this period, in 1806, that a final settlement was made through agents of the two classes of land-owners. Then the "Pennamite War" was a thing of the past, but personal prejudices and animosities prevailed for at least a generation afterwards.

In old Northampton County, after the close of the Revolution, there was a rapid advancement in population and prosperity. Settlers began to throng into the great region north of the mountains, lands were cleared and every year witnessed an improvement in values.

Some facts as to the condition of the country in Northampton, north of the mountains, are afforded by the general return of taxable property for the year 1796. According to this report, the number of acres of improved land in the townships which then embraced practically the same territory as that now included in Wayne, Pike and Monroe Counties was as follows:

Delaware	7,887
Lower Smithfield	15,443
Middle Smithfield	11,225
Upper Smithfield	8,756

The value of the taxable property in these five townships, as rated by the commissioners, was as follows:

Chestnut Hill	$13,709.00
Delaware	15,305.33
Lower Smithfield	22,436.35
Middle Smithfield	16,241.00
Upper Smithfield	15,610.93

Slavery existed in Northampton (in common with the rest of the State) until after 1800, though its gradual abolishment was commenced by the passage of an act by the Assembly on March 1, 1780.

Following is a record of the slaves held in 1780 in that part of Northampton County lying north of the mountains, as copied from the register then made:

John Van Campen, farmer, Lower Smithfield, four, —Dick, aged 36; Peter, 32; Joseph, 8 years and 9 months; Suckey (female), 4 years and 10 months.

Benjamin Van Campen, farmer, Lower Smithfield, five,—Dyon (female), 29 years and 8 months; Pompey, 33; Roger, 9 years and 4 months; Judah, 2 years and 11 months; Leah, 10 months.

William Smith, farmer, Delaware, three,—Joseph, 13 years; Bythinia (female), 10 years.

Walter Berry, farmer, Hamilton,—Ellich (Alleck), 30 years.

Robert McDowell, farmer, Hamilton, one,—Dick, 10 years.

Jane Shoemaker, Hamilton, one,—James.

Nicholas Depui, farmer, Smithfield, two,—Abraham, 28 years, and Thomas, 30 years.

Jacob Stroud, tavern-keeper, Smithfield, four,—Jack, 35 years; Briss, 32 years; Robin, 26 years; Isaac, 6 years.

Morgan Duche, farmer, Delaware, four,—Abby (female), 25 years; Ben, 7 years; Dinah, 5 years; Quannine, 2 years.

Garret Brodhead, farmer, Smithfield, one,—John, 75 years.

Thus it will be seen that in Northampton County, north of the Blue Mountains, the region now included in Monroe and Pike Counties, there were in the year 1780 twenty six slaves.

The lands in the wilderness region of Northampton, as we have heretofore intimated, were eagerly sought for by capitalists and small purchasers who intended to cultivate the estates they procured.

Long before this the proprietaries had manifested a peculiar fondness for the lands in the northeast corner of the State, in what is now Wayne County, and there were more "Manors" located there than in any other region so remote from Philadelphia. There are no less than sixteen within the present limits of the three counties which form our subject, and of these all but two or three are in Wayne.

The query arises: Did not the proprietaries locate these many manors (in a comparatively poor region, so far as natural resources go) with a view to securing, as it were, a kind of double title to the soil, and, in some sense, of fortifying this corner of the province against Connecticut intruders? However this may have been, the fact remains that no less than fifteen manors were surveyed for the Penns in what is now Wayne and Pike Counties. There were in the former county the "Amsterdam and Rotterdam" Manor, of two thousand seven hundred and seventy acres, in Lebanon township; "Safe Harbor" (Equinunk), two thousand two hundred and twenty-two acres; "Damascus," four thousand three hundred and ninety acres, at the confluence of Cashé's Creek and the Delaware; "William Penn, Jr.," five thousand two hundred and fourteen, between the waters of the Lackawaxen and Equinunk Creeks; "The Meadows," three thousand and thirty-two acres, on the east side of the Moosic, on the waters of the Lackawaxen; the "Mill Seat," nine hundred and ninety-nine acres, on the south branch of the Equinunk; "Duck Harbor," five hundred and ten acres, on the Little Equinunk; "Fox Harbor," on the east branch of the Lackawaxen; "Pleasant Garden," twenty thousand nine hundred and forty-eight acres, on Big Middle Creek; "Sandy Run," one thousand two hundred and eighty acres, on the east branch of the Lackawaxen; "Brewer's Den," three hundred and twelve acres, on a branch of Equinunk Creek; "Shohocking," in Buckingham township; "Elk Forest," eleven thousand five hundred and twenty-six acres, on the waters of the Lackawaxen and Big Middle Creek; and another unnamed. The "Wallenpaupack" Manor was partly in Wayne, but principally in Pike, and consisted of twelve thousand one hundred and fifty acres. It was laid off in 1748. A small manor (the only one in Monroe County) included Lake Poponoming and bore that name.

These manors were surveyed from 1748 to 1769, the greater number of them in 1763.

Of far more benefit to the country was the purchase of lands by individuals. Some quite distinguished persons became proprietors and some very extensive tracts were bought.

In 1774 Samuel Meredith and George Clymer began purchasing wild lands in Delaware County, N. Y., in what is now West Virginia and in the territory now included in Schuylkill, Pike, Monroe, Lackawanna, Luzerne, Wyoming, Bradford, Sullivan and Susquehanna Counties, and between 1790 and 1796, in what is now Wayne, they bought about fifty thousand acres.

What was known as Belmont Manor began on the Moosic Mountains, near the site of Waymart, and extended north along the range to what is now Hine's Corners, in Preston township. It was twenty odd miles in length and about two in width and contained about twenty-six thousand acres. The other portion of the great estate was purchased as follows: From Robert Morris, Philadelphia (financier of the Revolution), seven thousand one hundred and twenty-seven acres, one hundred and nineteen perches, for nine thousand five hundred and sixteen dollars; from William Lane, Philadelphia, eight hundred and seventy-nine acres and seventy-three perches, for two thousand five hundred dollars; from John Messer, of Lancaster, two thousand seven hundred and seventy acres and thirty perches, for eleven thousand one hundred and eighty dollars (Pennsylvania money); from Samuel Stanton, three hundred acres, for one thousand five hundred dollars; from Tench Coxe, Philadelphia, nine hundred and fifty-eight acres, twenty-eight perches, for four thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, and other tracts in various parts of the county, completing the aggregate of fifty thousand acres from various persons.

Meredith owned the Amsterdam and Rotterdam Manor, in Lebanon, and many tracts in Mount Pleasant and Preston. Upon his death these descended to his heirs or devisees, and Thomas Meredith, his son, took charge of the lands. Calvely Freeman, Esq., was his surveyor. In 1830, Mr. Meredith moved to Luzerne County, and Mr. Meylert, a Frenchman, took charge of the Meredith lands, and was succeeded by Michael Meylert.

The Elk Forest tract, in Old Canaan, became the property of Joseph Fellows, of Geneva, N. Y., who made Hon. N. B. Eldred his agent, who was succeeded by Hon. Wm. H. Dimmick, Sr. Moses Killam, Esq., divided the tract into one hundred or two hundred acre lots.

Upon this subject of lands in Wayne and Pike Counties and the Pennsylvania land system we quote and condense from Phineas G. Goodrich, an excellent authority, because for half a century a surveyor.[1] Mr. Goodrich says,—

"The General Assembly of Pennsylvania, on the 27th day of November, 1779, passed 'an act for vesting the Estate of the late Proprietaries of Pennsylvania, in this Commonwealth;' in the preamble whereto it is set forth, 'that the claims heretofore made by the late Proprietaries to the whole of the soil contained within the charter from Charles II. to William Penn cannot longer consist with the safety, liberty and happiness of the good people of this Commonwealth, who, at the expense of much blood and treasure, have bravely rescued themselves and their possessions from the tyranny of Great Britain and are now defending themselves from the inroads of the savages.' The act did not confiscate the lands of the Proprietaries within the lines of manors, nor embrace the purchase-money due for lands sold lying within surveyed manors. The manors, in legal acceptation, were lands surveyed and set apart as the private property of the Proprietaries.

"The titles to all lands sold and conveyed by William Penn or his descendants were confirmed and made valid. But the title to all lands in the Commonwealth, which had not been surveyed and returned into the land-office, on or before the 4th of July, 1776, was by said act vested in the State. This act provided that the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds, sterling money, should be paid out of the treasury of this State to the devisees and legatees of Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, late Proprietaries, and to the widow and relict of Thomas Penn, in such proportions as should thereafter, by the Legislature, be deemed equitable and just, upon a full investigation of their respective claims. No part of the sum was to be paid within less than one year after the termination of the war with Great Britain; and no more than twenty thousand pounds, nor less than fifteen thousand pounds should be payable in any one year. The land-office was begun by William Penn, and many features of the office, as it was in his day, remain to the present time.

"A land-office by and under the act of 9th of April, 1781, was created under the Commonwealth, its officers consisting of a secretary of the land-office, receiver-general and surveyor-general. By an act of the 29th of March, 1809, the office of receiver-general was abolished, and his duties were discharged by the secretary of the land-office; and by the act of the 17th of April, 1843, this latter-named office was discontinued, and the duties pertaining thereto were performed by the surveyor-general. By the Constitution of 1874 this office is now under the charge of the Secretary of Internal Affairs.

"An act for opening the land-office and for granting and disposing of the unappropriated lands within this State passed April 1, 1784, provided 'that the land-office shall be opened for the lands already purchased of the Indians on the 1st day of July next, at the rate of ten pounds for every hundred acres, with the usual fees of granting, surveying and patenting, excepting such tracts as shall be surveyed westward of the Allegheny mountains, etc. Every applicant for lands shall produce to the secretary of the land-office a particular description of the lands applied for, with a certificate from two justices of the peace of a proper county, specifying whether the said lands be improved or not, and if improved, how long since the improvement was made, that interest may be charged accordingly. The quantity of land granted to any one person shall not exceed four hundred acres, etc. The prices of unimproved land were different at various periods under the several purchases made of the Indians. From the 1st of July, 1784, to April 3, 1792, the price of unimproved wild lands was $26.66\frac{2}{3}$ per hundred acres in Wayne, Pike, Susquehanna and other counties. By act of April 3, 1792, the price of unimproved lands was fixed at $6.66\frac{2}{3}$ per hundred acres. The latter-named act was repealed by act of 29th of March, 1809, since which time the price of lands in the above-named counties has been $26.66\frac{2}{3}$ per hundred acres. The laws passed relative to State lands were numerous. Under said laws the surveyor-general, or the officer acting in that capacity, was authorized to appoint a deputy-surveyor in each and every county. George Palmer, of Easton, was the deputy-surveyor appointed for Wayne and Pike Counties, and most of the State lands were surveyed and located by him in those counties, and were made before there were any permanent settlements. As the greater part of the names of the eleven or twelve hundred persons named as warrantees on the county maps are strange and unknown, it has been supposed that many of those names were fictitious, which supposition is erroneous. The persons named were those that made the original applications. Some of the lands were taken up by the early settlers. Witness the names of Evans, Skinner, Thomas, Little, Smith, Allen, Hays, Land, and others in Damascus, and of Seely, Torrey, Woodward, Brown, Bingham, Day, Brink, Ball, Scudder, Moore, Taylor and many other well-known names in other parts of the county. The law allowed the applicant to take up four hundred acres, with an allowance of six per cent. for roads, but in consequence of inaccuracies in surveys, the law or practice of the land department allowed ten per cent. surplusage. After the establishment of the land-office under the auspices of the Commonwealth, many persons were deluded by the belief that it would be profitable for them to take up a tract of land for their own use, or for their children, or for the purpose of speculation. But lands taken up from 1780 to 1800 were not in demand, and could not be sold at a profit; and many, who, at the time when they took up tracts, designed to settle upon them, on a view of the hardships to be endured in a region destitute of roads, schools and churches, were deterred from carrying their original designs into execution, and at last sold out their wild possessions to the large land-holders, or suffered their lands to be sold for taxes. The land department allowed applicants to take up lands without paying the purchase-money, or fees, or granted warrants on which only a part was paid. Such lands, being located, surveyed and returned by the deputy-surveyor, were subject to taxation, and liable to be sold every other year for taxes. Hundreds of tracts were thus sold biennially. In the beginning and during the progressive settlement of the county the greater part of the wild lands were held and sold by large land-owners. Jason Torrey was the agent of the following-named persons and their executors, viz: Henry Drinker, Thomas Shields, Edward Tilghman, Mark Wilcox, Samuel Baird, L. Hollingsworth, Wm. Bell, heirs of James Hamilton, Thomas Stewardson, George Vaux, Thomas Cadwalader, Thomas Astley and several other persons not large owners. From well-authenticated evidence it appears that Jason Torrey, who was a native of Williamstown, Mass., came into Mount Pleasant in 1793, when scarcely twenty years of age; while working there for Jirah Mumford, Samuel Baird, of Pottstown, Pa., came to Kellogg's, and at once apprehending the natural ability of the young man, engaged him in assisting to survey some land on the Lackawaxen and some other parts of Northern Pennsylvania. Samuel Baird was the deputy-surveyor of Luzerne County.

"From the experience thus afforded he became an expert and ready surveyor. The landholders named committed the care and sale of their lands in Wayne and Pike Counties to Mr. Torrey, they, however, in all cases, fixing the prices and the conditions under which their respective lands should be sold. Jason Torrey knew more about the titles and the location of lands in Wayne and Pike Counties than any man then living, and he made more sales than all other agents combined. He compiled and published a map showing by numbers the location and quantity of every warrantee in Wayne and Pike Counties. In 1827, Torrey gave up the agency of the greater part of the lands which had been committed to his care, and it was given to Henry R. Stilley, who was a relative of some of the large owners, and came from Philadelphia to obtain a knowledge of matters relative to the surveys and sales, and spent six years in the office of Jason Torrey before he became familiar with the manner in which the business had formerly been done. He was dismissed from all his agencies after a few years, and in 1831, John D. Taylor, who had been a clerk in the office of General Thomas Cadwalader, of Philadelphia, was sent to Wayne County to take the agency for Cadwalader and several others. Mr. Taylor remained in the county some five or six years, attending to the duties connected with his agencies; but, not finding the business satisfactory, he gave it up and removed from the county. As early as 1835 some of the owners placed their lands under the agency of John Torrey, of Honesdale, and after the removal of Mr. Taylor, nearly all the unsold lands, which had been under Jason Torrey's care, were added to John Torrey's agency.

"The Shields lands, in Lebanon, Oregon, Berlin and Damascus, and the Manor of Amsterdam and Rotterdam were run north 10 degrees west or north 12½ degrees west, while the lands in Salem, North Sterling, in most of South Canaan, and in part of Cherry Ridge were run north 50 degrees west, and in other parts of the county, in divers other directions. Samuel Baird may have laid a few warrants, but George Palmer, as before said, originally surveyed and located most of the lands in Wayne County, and his work was well done. Anthony Crothers was his successor. It is contended that he never came into the county, and that all his pretended surveys were made by sub-deputies, or made by his own fireside, and were called 'chamber surveys.' At any rate there were many of them found to be very inaccurate. The north assumed by the original surveyors was not the true polar north, but had a western declination therefrom of about two and a half degrees.

"It was once, if it is not now, a common belief that the large land-owners realized great fortunes from the sale of their wild lands, which was not the case. If to the price paid for the lands were added the yearly taxes for forty or fifty years, and the compensation made to agents for watching them, and finally surveying and selling them, the lands cost their owners more than they realized from them, and sometimes double. Hon. James Wilson, judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, owned more lands in Wayne County than any other man. He died in 1798, and his lands were sold under a mortgage, and his heirs found his estate diminished, rather than enlarged, by his land investments.

"Judge Wilson's lands upon the Paupack were purchased by Samuel Sitgreaves, of Easton, who sold them to the settlers at a very low price. Other lands taken up by Wilson, in Sterling, Salem, Canaan and other parts of the county, fell into the hands of Thomas Cadwalader and Edward Tilghman, of Philadelphia. Henry Drinker, of the same city, owned the most of the lands in Dyberry and many tracts in Manchester and Buckingham.

"The person who obtained a warrant was called the warrantee. Upon paying the State treasurer the legal price of the land, and the office fees, $4.50, the warrant was sent to the county surveyor, whose business it was to survey the land within six months, make a draft and description, and, upon being paid for his services, make a return to the land department. Then the warrantee, upon paying $10 to the land department, would receive a patent for his land. Then, if he had the first warrant, the first survey and the first patent, the title was secure. The land department, for many years past, has required the applicant for a warrant to make oath before a justice of the peace, of the proper county, touching the condition of the lands as to its improved or unimproved state, and proving the same by a disinterested witness, on his oath made before two justices of the peace. The act of April, 1850, provided for the election in that year, and every third year thereafter, of one competent person, being a practical surveyor, to act as county surveyor."

By 1794 the population of Northampton above the Blue Mountains had so increased that the people began ambitiously to seek the erection of a new county. The first effort in this direction of which any knowledge is attainable was made chiefly through the efforts of the people living immediately north of the mountains, in 1794. A petition then circulated (the date only being preserved by Francis J. Smith's peculiar custom of weaving day, month and year into the flourishes of his signature) is here given.

"To the Honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"The petition of the Inhabitants of Towamensing, Chestnut Hill, Hamilton, Lower Smithfield, Middle Smithfield, Delaware, Matlack and Upper Smithfield townships, in Northampton County, Most Respectfully Sheweth

"That your Petitioners experience a grievious & almost unsupportable inconvenience from crossing the mountain called the 'Kittatiny or Blue Mountain' & traveling at every Season of the year to attend on courts of Justice as Jurors, Witnesses, &c.,—some of your petitioners residing nearly one hundred miles distant from Easton, the present Seat of Justice of Northampton County.

"That, on account of the multiplicity of business in the courts of Justice, causes are greatly retarded & Witnesses & Suitors obliged to attend every Court for two, three and sometimes four or more years before a trial can be had, which is extremely ruinous to those citizens who are thus unfortunately necessitated to attend at the very great Distance which most of your Petitioners live from the county town, or place of transacting county business.

"That there are living in the remote parts of said county upward of three hundred persons who ought to be Taxable, but who have never yet paid any taxes nor performed any military service, all of whom may be made good & obedient citizens & many more may be induced to become improvers of the unimproved lands, amongst us, your Petitioners, if the disadvantages of our remote situation from the seat of Justice and place of transacting public business were done away with.

"Your petitioners therefore earnestly pray and humbly expect that the advantages of an influx of settlers on the unimproved land in the aforesaid remote part of said county, the civilization of upward of three hundred families already within the remote part of said county & added to this the serious and peculiar hardships which your petitioners are continually exposed to on account of the great length of bad roads they have to travel to the present metropolis of said county & on account of the unreasonable delays and enormous expenses they are frequently exposed to, occasioned by the multiplicity of Business and their remote situation from the Seat of Justice will be irrefragable reasons to induce the Legislature to erect the said townships into a separate county & your Petitioners pray the Honorable Legislature to erect the said Townships into a new & separate county and to appoint commissioners to ascertain the proper place for public Buildings, &c. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

It is worthy of note that the majority of the people who signed this petition—the first for a new county north of the mountains of which we have any knowledge—were the last of all, between the present line of Northampton and the boundary of New York State, to secure the coveted boon. They lived in that region immediately north of the Blue Mountains which remained attached to the mother-county for forty years later, or until the erection of Monroe County, in 1836.

The people farther north were more fortunate, for the very fact that they were so far removed from the seat of justice gave them the earlier benefit of a separate county organization, and thus Wayne was brought into existence on March 21, 1798, as the third county set off from old Northampton.[2]

[2] Northumberland was erected in 1772, Luzerne in 1786. The other counties of which Northampton (erected from Bucks March 11, 1752) was the original mother were Susquehanna, erected in 1810; Schuylkill, in 1811; Lehigh, in 1812; Pike (from Wayne), in 1814; Monroe (from Pike and Northampton), 1836; Wyoming, 1842; Carbon, 1843.

HISTORY OF WAYNE COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

Civil History—Erection from Northampton—County Seat Removals—The Celebrated Court-House War—County Officials, 1798–1885.

THE county was named in honor of the celebrated General Anthony Wayne—commonly known as "Mad Anthony"—one of the chief heroes of the Revolution, and no less distinguished as the vanquisher of the Western Indians in 1794. Wayne was born at East Town, Chester County, Penn., January 1, 1745, and died at Presque Isle (now Erie), December 15, 1796. He was buried there; but in 1809 his remains were removed to Radnor Church, near Waynesborough, Penn. (vicinity of Philadelphia), where a monument was erected by the Pennsylvania Society of the Cincinnati.

COUNTY ERECTION—CONTESTS FOR SEAT OF JUSTICE.—Wayne County, originally embracing all of the territory now comprised in Wayne and Pike and the northern part of Monroe, was erected by an act of Assembly passed March 21, 1798, in which its boundaries were described as "Being all that part of Northampton County lying to the northward of a straight line from the West end of George Michael's farm at the River Delaware, in Middle Smithfield township, to the mouth of Trout Creek on the Lehigh, adjoining Luzerne County."[1]

Of the trustees named in the act, whose duty it was to fix the site of the seat of justice for the new county, Samuel Stanton resided in what is now Mount Pleasant township, near Belmont; Samuel C. Seely, in what is now Milford; Daniel Stroud, at Stroudsburg, and Abram Ham and John Mulhallen below the mountains. They eventually designated Milford as the county seat, but not until strong efforts had been made in behalf of other locations. Stanton was represented as favoring the selection of Milford because he wanted to bring about the organization of a new county, to include the northern part of Wayne and northeastern part of Luzerne (now Susquehanna), in such proportions as to make Mount Pleasant the approximate centre, and thus presumptively the seat of justice. As an inducement to the selection of Milford, a proposition was made by John Biddis to convey to the trustees gratuitously fifteen acres of land, a part of which it was proposed should serve as a site for the public buildings, and the residue be laid out in lots, the sale of which should aid in covering the cost of such buildings. In pursuance of this proposition Biddis executed a deed bearing date of November 1, 1798, by which, for the nominal consideration of one dollar, he conveyed to the trustees fifteen acres of land in Milford; but the deed was not acknowledged until January 16, 1799, nor entered for record until February 27, 1799, one month before the law was passed removing the seat of justice from Milford.

The selection of Milford had greatly dissatisfied the mass of the residents in the northern part of the county, and at the next session of the Legislature application was made for the passage of a law authorizing a change of the location. Notwithstanding the strong opposition by the friends of Milford, an act was passed April 1, 1799, declaring that from and after that date the seat of justice should cease to be at Milford, and that the courts should be held at Wilsonville[1] "until public buildings should be erected within four miles of Dyberry Forks" (the confluence of the Dyberry and west branch of the Lackawaxen, in the present bounds of Honesdale borough). The trustees were John Hilborn, of Willingborough, Luzerne County (now Harmony, Susquehanna County), John S. Rogers, of Mount Pleasant, John Bunting, of Canaan, John Brink, of Milford, and Ebenezer Jayne, of Middle Smithfield. They obtained a connected map, showing the location of all lands within four miles of Dyberry Forks, with the names of the several owners with whom they communicated, asking for statements of the best terms on which they would grant a site for a county seat on their respective tracts. The titles to some of the tracts within the prescribed limits were in dispute between adverse claimants, so that a clear title could not at once be given. Replies, with propositions, were received from many of the owners; but the terms of two were so much more favorable than any of the others, that they only were deemed worthy of especial consideration. One of these was from Edward Tilghman, of Philadelphia, proposing to give

[1] The arguments made against the removal of the county seat from Milford were many and varied. They are well summarized in the protest addressed to Governor Mifflin by a number of Milford lot-owners who lived in Philadelphia, which document was found by Dr. William H. Egle among the State papers in Harrisburg, and is here copied from the original:

"His Excellency Thomas Mifflin, Esqr., Governor of the State of Pennsylvania. May it please your Excellency.

"A Bill has passed both Houses of the legislature of this State for the removal of the Seat of Justice from the Town of Milford, County of Wayne, to an interior spot in the County, which the Subscribers, proprietors of Lots in said Town are well assured is contrary to the wishes of a majority of the Inhabitants, and that the removal will be of essential injury to the local Interests of the county, and to the growing Commercial connection with Philadelphia. They beg leave to state their reasons:

"1st. The removal of the Seat of Justice from Milford, where the Commissioners first fixed it, has been attempted thro the influence of a very few proprietors of Land in the upper district, and who reside in this City. It has not even been wished for by the Inhabitants of that District; but, on the contrary, a remonstrance has been presented from a considerable number of them against a removal.

"2nd. The number of Inhabitants in the lower Townships, agreeably to the statement of the Assessors, lately presented to the Senate, amounts to as much as two to one, or more, against the removal.

"3rd. The Town of Milford is at the point of intersection of a number of great roads, leading from the eastern States to the thickly-settled parts of this State, and is advantageously situated for Commerce with Philadelphia. It has been considerably improved from the full assurance of the Seat of Justice being fixed there, and from present appearances will be much more rapid in its advancement than any other spot in the County.

"4th. We take the liberty to suggest that it is not so much the central situation of the Town in the County that ought to influence in a decision upon this question, as the present population and prospect; And we suffer no wrong in asserting that the advantages, in these respects, are greatly in favor of Milford.

"5th. That in consequence of the nomination of Milford (by the Trustees) as the Seat of Justice, considerable purchases have been made of Lots, Contracts entered into for buildings, and large quantities of materials purchased.

"6th. That such have been the spirited and generous exertions of the Lot-holders that Subscriptions to the amount of upwards of 4000 Dlls. has been made, and the contract entered into for erecting the public buildings free of any Charge or Tax on the County in respect thereof.

"We respectfully submit the above to your Excellency, and earnestly request you will take the subject into your serious consideration, and reflect that the removal of the Seat of Justice, however profitable it may be to a few individuals, will be a very serious injury and inconceivable inconvenience to a great majority of the Inhabitants of the County.

"We therefore pray that we may be heard on the occasion.

one thousand acres of land for a site for public buildings and a county town, to be located on his tract between Dyberry Forks and the settlement on Cherry Ridge. This was considered a very liberal proposition; but it was no less so than that of Henry Drinker, a large landholder, also of Philadelphia. He offered one thousand acres to be selected by the trustees from his body of ten thousand acres of land lying between Dyberry Creek and the West Branch of the Lackawaxen. With his proposition, he informed the trustees that caveats had been entered in the Land Office against the issuance to him of patents for his land; but he was assured by the best legal counsel that his title was good, though it would require a little time to get a decision of the Board of Property, who were then hearing the case, and to have his patents issued. This proposition was regarded more favorably than Mr. Tilghman's, except for the delay required to have the title perfected.

Bethany as the County Seat—First Court-House.—After waiting until November, application was made to the trustees by Judge Preston and others to proceed at once and set the stakes for the site of the court-house on Mr. Tilghman's land, as it was urged a long period might pass before Mr. Drinker could obtain patents. The trustees, however, reported that they were "not yet ready to act." Early in May, 1800, Mr. Drinker wrote to Judge Preston and several others, giving information that the Board of Property had decided against all the objections made to his title, and had directed that patents should be issued to him for his twenty-four tracts. This afforded the trustees an opportunity to choose between the two most favorable offers made to them, and on the 15th of May they met and resolved to proceed to the selection of a site for a county-seat, and, accompanied by Jason Torrey, whom they had appointed their clerk, and several gentlemen who manifested a deep interest in their decision, and some of whom decidedly favored the Cherry Ridge, or Tilghman location, they proceeded to view the lands offered them, and subsequently to vote on a choice between the two sites; Mr. Jayne voted in favor of the site on Mr. Tilghman's land; Mr. Brink refused to vote, and Messrs. Hilborn, Rogers and Bunting (all Friends or Quakers) voted in favor of the site on Mr. Drinker's land, where Bethany now is. On the next day, May 16th, the trustees selected the precise locality for erecting a court-house, in the unbroken virgin forest, and marked it by a large stake driven into the ground at a point from which the surface sloped gently in all directions, except the northwest.

On the 2d of June they met at the site selected and adopted plans for a court-house and jail, and decided upon the location of a public square and the courses and widths of some of the principal streets, in accordance with a plan for a town, which they adopted, and in which provision was made for two hundred and fifty-four house-lots and one hundred and sixty-three out-lots.

Thus the beginning was made. On June 10th a number of the residents of the neighboring settlements assembled and put up a log house on the public square, to be used as a boarding-house by the workmen while erecting the public buildings. On June 13th, to relieve themselves as a body from attending to the erection of the county buildings, the trustees authorized John Bunting and John S. Rogers to act for them in superintending the building and making such other improvements as were deemed advisable. At the same time Jason Torrey was engaged to lay out the town and prepare maps of it. Mr. Bunting was directed to go to Philadelphia and obtain money and supplies of provisions, nails, etc., to enable them to proceed at once with the building without waiting for the proceeds of the sale of lots. The supplies thus procured were to be sent to Easton, by boats upon the Delaware, and from there transported in wagons to their destination. The trustees also made application to the non-resident owners of land located in the northern part of the county for aid in paying the trustees named in the original act erecting Wayne County, according to the provisions of that act.[1]

[1] The amount raised and paid to the former trustees under requirement of the act of April 1, 1799, was $871.58.

Advertisements of a sale of lots in the town of Bethany, for thus the county-seat was named, were sent to be published in Philadelphia and Easton on June 10th. The sale was to commence on September 8th, at Wilsonville, which, it will be borne in mind, was the temporary seat of justice.

The carpenters began hewing timber for the frame of the court-house August 12th. The difficulty of procuring sawed lumber was so great (by reason of there being no saw-mill nearer than Indian Orchard, and few and poor roads for transporting it), that not only the main timbers of the frame, but the studding and rafters were also hewn upon the spot. On September 5th the frame of the court-house was raised and it was inclosed before winter. It was one and a half stories in height, and thirty six feet in length by thirty-two in breadth. As lime could not be procured for plastering, the inner walls and ceilings were all ceiled with pine boards Work was all done by the day, subsistence being provided by the trustees for all employees, as there were no houses near at which board could be obtained. Common laborers received fifty cents per day and board, and mechanics seventy-five cents to one dollar per day, with board.

The trustees met at Wilsonville, September 8th, and duly opened the public sale of lots. They had a map of the town of Bethany, drawn on a large scale, on which certain lots were designated as reserved for various purposes. The jail lot fronted westwardly, fifty feet on the southeastern corner of the public square. Three lots of fifty feet front each, where the Presbyterian Church now is, and extending westward from the Main Street, were reserved for church lots. Next north of these, and, like them, three hundred feet in depth, were five lots reserved for school purposes. With these exceptions, the lots were offered to the highest bidder. The sales were continued from time to time, until the aggregate amount of money received reached two thousand seven hundred and thirty-six dollars, one hundred and thirty-three house-lots and one hundred and one out-lots being purchased by about seventy persons, at prices ranging from a few cents to twenty-seven dollars each. Among the first purchasers were John Brodhead, John Conklin, Reuben Skinner, George Parkinson, Thomas Shields, Thomas Potts, Thomas Moore Edwards, John Ross, Daniel Stroud, Theodore Woodbridge, L. Collins, Jason Torrey, Jesse Drake, Oliver Tyler, Moses Tyler, Thomas B. Dick, William Northrip, Jacob Schoonover, Edward London, Leonard Labar, John Connett, J. Conkwright, Christopher Snyder, William Barnes, John Hilborn, John Bunting, Samuel Stanton, Daniel Skinner, Moses Brink, Nathan Skinner, Mordecai Roberts, Isaac Brink, Abraham Bickley, Henry Drinker, William Williams, Philip Culp, Eliphalet Kellogg, Samuel Preston and Daniel Stevenson.

A deed from Henry Drinker, dated August 30, 1800, conveying to the trustees 999 acres, 156 perches, was received and entered. The conveyance was specified as made to the trustees, "in trust for the use of the county of Wayne, and upon the further trust that they shall lay out said tract in proper town and out-lots, and convey to the county commissioners such of said lots as they shall fix on, for the purpose of erecting a court-house, jail and offices for the safe keeping of the records, and sell at public auction so many of the lots as they may see proper, and appropriate the money received for the purpose of erecting the necessary buildings—and for no other purpose whatsoever."

A jail building and residence for the sheriff or jailor was erected upon the lot provided for that purpose in the summer and autumn of 1801. It was nearly square, thirty-two by thirty-six feet, and a story and a half in height. It was constructed of hewed timber, ten inches square and laid up like the logs in a cabin. There were two small prisons upon the ground-floor, and the remainder of that floor and the chambers were for the convenience of the jailor's family. The walls and floors of the prisons were constructed of ten-inch hewed timber and covered inside with seasoned hard wood plank, securely spiked to the timbers. In the rear of and adjoining the prison building was a prison-yard, about thirty-five feet square, one side of which was formed by the building, and the other three of hewed timbers, set upright in the ground, dowelled together and standing ten feet above the surface, with the tops of the timbers armed with barbed and pointed spikes.

In the second floor of the court-house two rooms were partitioned off for county offices, one of which was for the use of the county commissioners and treasurer and the other for the prothonotary and register and recorder. The lower floor was entirely occupied by the court-room, except a small vestibule and a stair-way to the offices.

The buildings were so far completed at the time of the September term of court in 1801 that the trustees gave notice to the county commissioners and the judges that they were ready for the accommodation of the court; but the judges declined to remove the courts and offices to Bethany "until lawfully assured that the buildings were completed."

This action of the judges indicated a disposition to prevent the removal and, if necessary, to raise technical objections; therefore, to carry out more completely the duties imposed upon them, the trustees, on the 2d of January, 1802, executed and delivered to the county commissioners a deed conveying to them and their successors the public square, including the court-house upon it, the jail lot and jail.

The motive for refusing to hold the courts at Bethany soon became apparent. At the next session of the Legislature an application was made to have them moved back to Milford and there to remain permanently; another to have them alternately held at Milford and Wilsonville, in connection with which was a proposition to have annexed to Wayne County a portion of Luzerne which is now included in Susquehanna. The latter bill, as before the Legislature contemplated to annex to Wayne that part of Luzerne east of a line extending from the twenty-eighth mile-stone on the New York State line, southward ten miles, and then southeast about thirty miles to the line of Wayne. This proposed annexation was in accordance with a plan devised and advocated by Samuel Stanton, and was to be followed, if it was successful, by an act erecting a new county with Mount Pleasant central within it, in order that it might be made the county-seat.[1]

The annexation scheme entirely failed. The people of the northern townships strongly remonstrated against the removal, urging the great injustice it would involve, as they had been required by act of Assembly to repay the moneys expended by former trustees, and also the moneys paid to those trustees for lots in Milford sold by them at auction—and they had actually paid the sum of $871.58. They protested, further, that the present trustees had, under authority of the Legislature, sold and conveyed a great number of lots in Bethany,

[1] Apropos of this scheme, the following petition for the erection of "Hebron" County is of interest. It is undated):

"To the honourable the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly now sitting.

"The Petition of the Subscribers, Inhabitants of the northeastern parts of Luzerne County, that adjoins the County of Wayne, moet humbly sheweth:

"That your Petitioners are greatly agrieved with the distance they have to travel to the Seat of Justice at Wilkesbarre, in which distance the Roads are very rough and mountainous, being also intersepted with the two large Streams of Tunckhannunk and Lackawana, over which there is no Bridges erected; that the said Streams, unless in times of very low Water, are not fordable, by which reason your Petitioners, if Summoned to Court as Suitors, Witnesses or Jurors, cannot attend at times of high Water, and are thereby debared the Priveledge of the Courts of Justice.

"And inasmuch as we understand that the Six upper Townships of Wayne County, as they are seperated from their Seat of Justice by an extensive Barren from thirty to forty Miles wide, are about praying your honourable Body to redress their Grievances by erecting the said six Townships north of the Barrens into a seperate County, that they may have their Seat of Justice in a central Situation.—

"We, therefore, most humbly pray your honourable Body that we may be annexed with the said six upper Townships of Wayne County into a seperate County, by a Line begining where the Road from Sheholy to Lackawana crosses the County Line, & runing thence North forty-five Degrees West, untill it strikes the State Line, may be the division Line between us and Luzerne County, and that the new County may be called Hebron, and that George Palmer & Daniel Stroud, Esqrs, of Northampton County, and Samuel Preston & Thomas Sheilds, Esqrs, of the County of Wayne, and John Tyler, of Luzerne County, may be the Commissioners appointed by Law to perform the customary duties of establishing the Seat of Justice. &c., &c.

"And your Petitioners, in duty bound, shall ever pray."

and had expended in improvements and the construction of public buildings over $4500. The Legislature was convinced it would not be right or constitutional to make the permanent removal which had been asked for; but, on the 5th of April, 1802, an act was passed providing for a temporary removal, viz., that the seat of justice should from that date be transferred from Bethany to Milford, and the courts held at Milford "for three years, and no longer."

While this act nominally removed the courts from Bethany, it really removed them from Wilsonville, for none had been held at the former place, owing to the refusal of the judges to go there, as has been heretofore stated.

Three of the judges resided near Milford, and the re-location of the seat of justice there was not displeasing to them. The May term of the courts in 1802 was held there. By the terms of the act of April 5, 1802, the act of April 1, 1799, by which the seat of justice was located at Bethany, was suspended for three years, and thus the trustees were prevented from making any more sales of lots during that time, to raise funds for reimbursing themselves for what they had advanced or had procured from others to put the buildings in readiness for occupancy. They and their friends suffered considerable embarrassment. To relieve them in some measure from their unfortunate, but not blamable, predicament, the Legislature passed an act February 11, 1803, authorizing the county commissioners to settle the accounts of the trustees and pay them whatever balance was found due to them, and also to receive a conveyance from them of all the unsold lots in Bethany and to sell the same for the benefit of the county. In accordance with this provision, the trustees, on the 9th of May, 1803, executed a deed conveying to the commissioners one hundred and twenty house-lots and sixty-two outlots in Bethany, being all not previously sold. From this time the powers of the trustees were vested in the commissioners, who sold at various times, for the benefit of the county, all of the lots conveyed to them except those reserved as church and school lots, eight in all, which, on September 10, 1810, were conveyed in trust to trustees to serve as sites for a house of worship and a school-house.

The residents of the northern part of the county and those who had purchased lots and built in Bethany indulged the hope that at the expiration of the "three years and no longer" for which the courts were removed to Milford, they would be transferred to the place prepared for them without further opposition. They were removed, but not till after the friends of Milford had made a strong struggle to retain them. In the winter of 1804–5 the opponents of Bethany's interests made another application to the Legislature, asking that the courts should be continued permanently at Milford. This was again strongly remonstrated against by the residents of the northern part of the county and the friends of Bethany, and so many members of the Assembly were convinced that it would not only be unjust, but unconstitutional, that the measure was defeated by a large majority.

The "three years and no longer" having expired, before the time for the May court in 1805, that term was held in Bethany on the 6th of the month, and was the first court ever held there. Judges Biddis and Brink occupied the bench. As the carpenters were engaged in finishing some details of their work in the court-room, the courts were held for the first day in the large east room, in the house of Jason Torrey, but after that the court-room was used. The progress of affairs was now smooth enough for about four years. Then the people of the lower part of the county made another effort to wrest away little Bethany's pride and prop. They applied to the Assembly to have the seat of justice removed to some locality near the territorial centre of the county. This was opposed not only by the citizens of the northern townships, but by many at and near Milford, but their opposition availed nothing, for on the 19th of March, 1810, an act was passed, entitled "An act for the removal of the seat of justice of Wayne county from Bethany to a place at or near the centre of said county."[1]

Under authority of this act, the Governor appointed as commissioners, to fix on the exact location, Jeptha Arrison, James Clyd and Abraham Levan. These commissioners made their report, dated August 21 and 22, 1810, in which they say they "have fixed on the cleared field west of the house commonly called 'Blooming Grove House,' and situated on a tract of land called 'Blooming Grove Farm,' owned by Nicholas Kern and Henry Spering, as a fit, proper, central and convenient place for the site of the seat of justice for the county of Wayne." They also reported that they had received from Kern and Spering a conveyance to the commissioners, in fee-simple, of thirty seven town-lots, including the site for the court-house, in the town of Blooming Grove, laid out on the cleared field alluded to; and also a bond for the payment, to the commissioners, of the sum of four hundred dollars—one-half to be paid when the court-house should be under roof and the other half when it should be finished. The place thus selected was where the old road from Milford to the Paupack settlement crossed the Blooming Grove Creek, and is within the present limits of Pike County.

The location was unsatisfactory to a large majority of the citizens of the county, and arrangements were made to give a distinct expression to their dissatisfaction at the general election the next October. The opponents to removal put in nomination for county commissioner Abisha Woodward, known to be opposed to the removal, and the advocates of such removal put in nomination a candidate known to be in its favor. The campaign was energetically conducted on both sides, and resulted in a victory for the opponents of the removal scheme, by a very large majority.[1]

The commissioners met on October 30, 1810, Moses Thomas and George W. Nyce, of the old board, being present, and Abisha Woodward, the new commissioner elected to succeed Dan Dimmick, Esq., whose term had expired, being sworn in, a full board was effected. Application was made urging the board to levy a tax for a building fund to erect public buildings at Blooming Grove, and claiming that by the provisions of the act providing for the removal of the seat of justice they were required to do so. After deliberation they adopted and placed on their record the following carefully prepared minute and resolution in answer to the application:

"At a full meeting of the board they proceeded to examine the act of Gen[l] Assembly passed at last session for the removal of the seat of Justice from Bethany to Blooming Grove, & after carefully and attentively perusing the whole Act, they cannot find any provision therein which, by positive expression or fine construction, enjoins on them a duty to levy a tax upon the County at the present time & under the present circumstances, for the purpose of erecting public buildings at B[g] Grove.

"The com[rs] believe that the Act was passed by the Leg. under a reliance upon the sufficiency of grants which would be made to the County to cover all, or at least a principal part, of the expenses which would occur to the Co. in consequence of a removal of the seat of Justice. They believe that the duties enjoined on them by the 4th Sec. of the Act have a special allusion to an appropriation of the monies to be divided under the provisions of the 2d and 3d Sections; and that the liberty granted by the fifth Sec. to levy a tax for the purposes therein mentioned was mainly intended as a provision against any casual deficiency of the other funds, and to secure a means of fulfilling engagements which might be made in excess of funds to discharge them. But they cannot believe that it was the intention of the Leg. that, in case of a general failure of the provisions of the 2d 3d & 4th Sections, that the liberty granted in the 5th Sec. should be construed as a mandate, and that the rate of taxation which has been so much complained of as grievous, and which has so frequently produced a severity of treatment to Treasurers, Collectors & Commissioners, should be increased by an addition of ½ of its amount, and be continued until the excess shall produce a fund adequate to the expense of the public buildings. This opinion the Com[rs] consider to be strongly supported by the whole tenor of the Act, as well as by a reference to other acts for fixing the seat of Justice in new counties. The Comm[rs] believe that if the finances of the County were in a condition to warrant the measure, they might with legal propriety proceed to the levying and collecting of monies as a fund for erecting public buildings, and as soon as a sufficient fund should be thus collected, that they might proceed to the application thereof to that purpose; but while the County is annually subjected to a heavy tax, without being able to discharge its just and necessary expenditures, which, after the most vigorous exertions in collecting taxes, there remain many orders on the treasury unpaid, while the poor juror and laborer is compelled from his necessities to sell his hard-earned wages to some speculator at a discount of from twelve to twenty-five per cent.; while the traveler is put in jeopardy by the failure of bridges the Co. wants funds to repair; and while, with the best efforts and the strictest economy, the Comm[r]s are able but gradually to retrieve the credit of the County, they cannot consider that there are any existing circumstances or advantages to the County which would result from forcing a fund for the erection of public buildings at B. Grove which would bear any comparative weight in counterbalancing the evils which would necessarily follow a pursuit of the measure.

[1] Jason Torrey, in a letter to his parents, dated October 14, 1810, says: "The strife in our election for a commissioner just held, was especially governed by the opinion of the people respecting the seat of justice. The county election has just been canvassed and the result declared, showing that we succeeded by a majority of more than two to one in electing a commissioner opposed to the removal—hence we feel safe that no public money will be spent for erecting public buildings at that place"—i.e., Blooming Grove, which he writes "has been the solitary residence of a single family, in a poor log house, for over thirty years."

"Therefore, RESOLVED that they do not levy a tax the ensuing year for the purpose of erecting public buildings at Blooming Grove."

AFFAIRS OF WAYNE AND PIKE. — No effort of any moment was made to remove the county-seat from Bethany to the southern part of the county, after the foregoing action of the commissioners; but those who had been in favor of Milford began to urge in a more friendly manner those who had stood by Bethany to consent to a division of the county as a measure which would accommodate each section with a county-seat, and put an end to further contest and rivalry between them. In 1813 many of the friends of Bethany, after considering the matter, assented to having application made at the next session of the Assembly for a division of Wayne County and the erection of a new county from its southern portion. It was agreed that if the people of Milford and the surrounding region should ask for such new county, to be bounded northerly by the Lackawaxen River, to the mouth of the Wallenpaupack Creek and up that creek to the forks of the west and south branches thereof, and up the west branch thereof (which now divides Salem and Sterling townships) to the line of Luzerne, the inhabitants of the region remaining in Wayne would not oppose the application for division. But before the time for the Legislature to act had arrived, the advocates of the new county and of Milford's interests desired a change in the proposed boundary, so that a new county should extend up the Delaware to the "Big Eddy," and then be bounded by a straight line to the mouth of the Wallenpaupack Creek and thence up that stream, as before proposed. They argued that such increase of river-front would leave Milford equidistant, in direct lines, from the northern and southern boundaries of the new county, while by going no further up the Delaware than to the Lackawaxen River, Dingman's would be very nearly equidistant from these boundaries, and that place might be advocated as the site of the county-seat. The men acting for the northern part of Wayne consented to having the new county extend up the Delaware to Big Eddy, provided the division line should follow the south branch of the Wallenpaupack to the North and South road, and thence extend west to the line of Luzerne County.

This differed from the boundary first proposed in that it gave to Wayne all of Sterling township, as that township was originally erected, in exchange for that part of Pike County lying north of the Lackawaxen, and, considering the quality of the lands, it was then considered an exchange advantageous to Wayne, though it made the form of Wayne rather too long for its breadth.

The Assembly, on March 26, 1814, passed an act, containing twenty-three sections, entitled "An act erecting a part of Wayne County into a separate county." Some of the provisions of that act which pertain directly to Wayne County are here given.—[1]

Section 1 provided "that all of that part of Wayne County lying south and east of a direct line from the lower end of Big Eddy, on the Delaware River, to the mouth of the Wallenpaupack Creek, and thence up the same to the main forks thereof, thence up the south branch to where the most southerly branch crosses the North and South road, and from thence due west to the line of Luzerne County, be, and the same is hereby declared to be erected, into a new county, henceforth to be called Pike."

Section 5 provided that taxes heretofore levied on property in Pike, and unpaid, may be collected by the commissioners of Wayne County.

[1] For the full text of the act, see History of Pike County, Chapter I.

Section 6 required the commissioners of Wayne to make out a statement by the second Monday of November (1814), showing the amount due on taxes theretofore levied, and the amount of money in the treasury, and from the sum of these to deduct the amount of debts owing from the county, and to pay one-half of the surplus thus found to the treasurer of Pike County, the payment, however, to be made no faster than the taxes should be collected.

Section 9 authorized John K. Woodward to run and mark the line between the two counties, commencing on the second Monday of September, at the Big Eddy, and running from thence according to the true intent and meaning of the act. His compensation was fixed at three dollars per day, with the necessary expenses, to be paid out of the treasury of Wayne County.

Section 10 enacted that where the division line divided a township, the part thereof which remained in Wayne should be a separate township, and the part in Pike a separate township, each to retain its original name until altered by the court.

Section 14 required the Governor, after the 1st of June following, to appoint three commissioners to fix on a site for a seat of justice for Pike County, as near the centre as circumstances would allow.

"Provided, however, that if the inhabitants of Milford, and others, shall, before said 1st of June, subscribe and pay in, or give security for payment thereof, to the commissioners of Wayne County, a sum not less than $1500 for the use of the county of Pike, for the purpose of erecting public buildings, then the 'Centre Square' in the town of Milford shall be the site for the seat of justice; and, in that case, the commissioners aforesaid shall not be appointed."

Section 15 provided that in order that the county of Wayne shall, as nearly as may be, bear one half the expense of erecting public buildings in Pike, equal to those in Bethany, the commissioners of Wayne should direct their treasurer to pay over to the treasurer of Pike, in four equal instalments, the sum of $1750.

Sections 19, 20 and 21 authorized and required the sheriff of Wayne to keep the Pike County prisoners for three years, or until a jail should have been erected in Pike County.

Section 22 required the commissioners of Wayne to deliver to the commissioners of Pike all maps, charts, records and papers which, of right, belonged to Pike.

The first section of the act, which defines the boundaries of Pike County, was in accord with the understood wishes of the citizens of both counties, but the provisions of the fifteenth section requiring Wayne to pay to Pike, to cover one-half the cost of erecting as good public buildings in Pike as those at Bethany, the sum of one thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars (estimating the value of the old court-house and jail at three thousand five hundred dollars), was considered by intelligent people of Wayne as very unjust. They agreed that, even if the buildings had been wholly erected with funds raised by taxation, of which the citizens and property of Pike had paid one-half, the sum of one thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, as an estimate of one-half their present value, was unreasonable, because the old shell of a court-house and log jail did not originally cost anything like the value (three thousand five hundred dollars) now put upon them, although erected when there was great difficulty in transporting materials, and that better buildings could then (1814) be erected either at Milford or Bethany for one thousand dollars. And they argued further, that the buildings were originally erected in Bethany without the use of any funds voluntarily contributed by residents of the new county of Pike, or of funds raised by taxation, of which Pike, as an integral part of Wayne, had paid her full share, but that the entire cost of those buildings had been derived directly from property donated as a consideration for having the seat of justice established at Bethany, and, therefore, the people of the new county had no equitable claim to any part of the present value of those old buildings. This reasoning did not prevent the passing in Assembly of the manifestly unjust clause of the act, and Wayne was required to pay the one thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

The statement of assets and liabilities of the original Wayne County, required by section six of the act, as made by the commissioners of Wayne, showed a balance of assets in excess of liabilities of $6960. One-half of this sum, deducting losses and expenses of collection, was to be paid to Pike, and that county received, as fast as collected, $2950.

The injustice of the financial provisions of the new county enactment are illustrated by the fact that, in addition to the foregoing $2950, Wayne was obliged to pay Pike $1750, thus providing her with a fund of $4700, and being left with $2950, less $1750, or only $1200, including taxes levied but not yet collected, to pay the expenses of the county until the taxes for 1815 could be collected.[1]

That portion of the division line between the counties, exclusive of that constituted by the Wallenpaupack, was run and marked by John K. Woodward in September, 1814, as provided for in section nine of the act. He first ran a line, without marking it, from the mouth of the Wallenpaupack to the Delaware, at Big Eddy, to enable him to calculate the true bearing between the two designated points, and then commenced at the lower end of Big Eddy and ran and marked a line on a course of S. 31° 45′ W., a distance of ten miles and twenty-three rods to the mouth of the Wallenpaupack. Then he ran a line from where the old North and South road [2] crossed the most southerly affluent of the south branch of the Wallenpaupack in what was then called "the twelve mile woods," and ran and marked a line on a course due west, a distance of seven miles and ninety-two rods, to the Lehigh Creek, which was there the boundary between Luzerne and Wayne Counties.

The erection of Pike took from Wayne all of the townships of Middle Smithfield and Upper Smithfield, and all of Delaware except what afterwards became the south half of Sterling, nearly all of Lackawaxen and the larger part of old Palmyra and Salem, the line so dividing these two townships, however, as to leave sufficient territory in each county for a separate township, and they retained their original names in accordance with section ten of the act. The part of Lackawaxen left in Wayne contained about six thousand acres, all unseated land. This was attached to and became a part of Dyberry township. There was also a small triangle of about two thousand acres of unseated land taken into Pike from the southeastern corner of Dyberry and attached to Lackawaxen in Pike. The portion of Delaware left in Wayne was attached to Salem.

The area of Wayne was thus reduced from about 1350 square miles (the estimated area as originally erected) to about 722 square miles, its estimated present area.[3]

The population of the original Wayne County in 1810 was 4125, and in 1820, with Pike off, it was 4127, while that of Pike was 2849.[4]

The valuation of Wayne after the erection of Pike, including land and other ratable property, as ascertained from the tax-list, was $529,788.50. The average value of land was, according to the assessment of 1814, $1.11 per acre.

The public buildings at Bethany had fairly well served the purposes for which they were intended, but in less than a year after the severance of Pike, Wayne County was left without a prison, the old log jail being burned on January 23, 1815—Monday of court week. The immediate provision of a temporary prison was necessary, and arrangements were therefore made with D. Wilder to have two small rooms strongly partitioned off, adjoining and in the rear of the bar-room in his public-house, to use as a prison until a better could be provided. Prisoners were kept in the "Wilder Jail," as it was commonly called, until some time in the following year. On January 25th (two days after the fire) the commissioners met the grand jurors and consulted them as to the propriety of building a new court-house, also of building a jail to supply the loss of the old one. It was decided that one juror from each township should meet the commissioners the next day, to consult further on that matter, but the minutes do not show that they did so. On the 31st of January, Commissioners Spang and King were appointed a committee to visit Montrose, and procure a sketch of the building erected there in 1813, comprising a court-house, county offices, jail and residence for the jailer's family (the cost of which, as stated in the "History of Susquehanna County," was $4500.

[1] In addition to the $4700 paid Pike by Wayne, the citizens of Milford, to secure the location of the county-seat, were required to pay at least $1500, and thus the new county secured a building fund of $6200. Voracious Pike!

[2] This old North and South road was nearly one hundred rods west of the present old turnpike road.

[3] The total area of Wayne County after division was originally computed at 359,846.22 acres, the proportion of first-rate land being to the entire area as 1 to 2520. A later report made by Jacob S. Davis estimated the area, including the allowance of six per cent. for roads, at 462,615 acres.

[4] United States Census.

The new county building project progressed favorably. On the 8th of February, 1815, the commissioners again met, and after careful deliberation decided to erect a new court-house and jail in one building, including also a jailer's residence and rooms for the county offices. A plan was adopted and notice given of the time and place for the public letting of the contract for the building. (The date fixed does not appear in the minutes.) When the proposals were received, Joseph Miller, of Bethany, was declared the "lowest and best bidder," and a contract was drawn and executed, by which he agreed to furnish the materials and erect and finish the building complete in all its parts. Miller commenced his work, but was so far behind with his contract in March, 1817, that an entry was made in the records, censuring him very severely for his delay. This action, however, appears to have had but very little effect, for in 1818 he was again the subject of criticism, and in 1820 the commissioners despairing of bringing him to terms, made an agreement by which the work should be completed by another contractor, and the building was eventually finished. There still remained an anxiety concerning the safety of the public records, and soon after the completion of the court-house a contract was entered into with Manning & Torrey for the erection of a fire-proof building on the public square, in Bethany, the upper story of which was to be fitted up as a residence at the discretion of the contractors, and occupied as they might see fit, free of rent, so long as $1450 out of the $1650, which they were to receive for the building, remained unpaid. The location of the building was staked out on the 28th of March, 1823, and its erection carried on according to contract. It is still standing.

Early Townships.—The act of Assembly erecting Wayne County mentions the townships of Middle Smithfield, Delaware, Upper Smithfield and Matlack as then existing within its bounds. No full record of the origin of the first three of these has been found.

W. H. H. Davis, of Doylestown, in his "History of Bucks County," says,—"The earliest settlement in Bucks County, north of the Lehigh, was in Smithfield township, now in Monroe County;" and that "the first attempt to organize Smithfield was in 1746."

"In June, 1746, the inhabitants petitioned for a township to begin at a gap in the mountain where the Delaware river runs through, & from thence five or six miles, on a North & by West course; from thence to the North corner of Christoffel Denmark's plantation; & thence with a straight line to the river Delaware; & thence the several courses thereof to place of beginning." On the back was endorsed, 'Plan next Court,' and no further record is found concerning it."

In June, 1748, another petition for a township was made by the inhabitants of Dansbury and Smithfield, describing its bounds as "To extend from the river Delaware, along the Mountain, to a Gap in the same; thence Northerly to a large Creek commonly called Bushkill, and down the same to the Delaware, & to the place of beginning."

The township was ordered to be laid out, but no further record is found concerning it.

In December, 1750, Daniel Brodhead and others petitioned for a township, "to be bounded by the Bushkill on the South, to which Creek there is the grant of a township, by Delaware on the East, and by lands belonging to the Hon.[1] the Proprietaries on the North and West." The petitioners set forth that they are the remotest livers from the honorable court. The application was held under advisement and no further record concerning it is found.

Thereafter the township of Upper Smithfield appears among the townships of Bucks County until the county of Northampton was erected, which included it.

After such erection of Upper Smithfield the township south of the Bushkill became known as Lower Smithfield. Delaware township appears in the list of Northampton County townships continuously after 1766, but the record of its erection cannot be found.

In 1794 Middle Smithfield was erected from the north part of Lower Smithfield. The following is extracted from the court records of Northampton County concerning its erection:

"On 12th Aug., 1794, Sam[l]. C. Seely, John Biddis, & Hugh Forsman, who were appointed by the Court at April Sessions last, upon the petition of the inhabitants of the upper district of Lower Smithfield Township commissioners, to view the said Township, & report whether it would be expedient to divide the same, and if so, in what manner, made report: 'That a division is highly necessary,—that the division line being at the mouth of John Van Camp's Mill Creek, and that the Creek be the line, until it runs up to the tail race of said Van Camp's Grist mill, and up said Race until it strikes the West end of the Mill; thence from the Westmost corner of the Mill, a direct line until it reaches the Saw-Mill late the property of Wm. Wills, Esq.; thence a due Northwest coarse until it intersects the Northern line.'

"Which report was read & confirmed by the Court Aug. 12, 1794,—November 11th, 1794, the Court named the Township so cut off Middle Smithfield."

By the act erecting Wayne County, Middle Smithfield township was divided, and the part thereof set off to Wayne was to retain the original name, Middle Smithfield.

The western boundaries of all the foregoing townships were left very indefinite when they were first erected, but before the erection of Wayne County, Middle Smithfield, Delaware and Upper Smithfield were all understood as extending westward to the line of Luzerne County.

Of the erection of Matlack township no record can be found, nor any knowledge obtained as to its exact location. Its territory, however, was covered by the six new townships erected at the first court in Wayne in 1798.

Middle Smithfield, as it existed when Wayne County was erected, extended from the Delaware River to the Luzerne County line, with an average width of about five and a half miles, being bounded southward by Northampton County and northward by Delaware township. Its boundaries remained unaltered while it was in Wayne County.

Delaware township also extended from the Delaware River to the Luzerne County line. It was bounded south by Middle Smithfield; east by the Delaware River, from the mouth of the Bushkill Creek to the lower end of Minisink Island, some three miles below Milford; north by a line from the Delaware River at the lower end of that island, on a course of about north eighty-five degrees west to the line of Luzerne County. In 1807 or 1808 the western half of Delaware township was set off and formed part of Salem, then erected. No other alteration in its boundaries was made while it continued to be part of Wayne.

Upper Smithfield, as originally erected, included all the settlements in and near the Delaware Valley north of Middle Smithfield, but its northern and western bounds were indefinite. As settlements were extended north and west, the bounds of the township were understood also to extend so as to include all such settlements east of Luzerne until it covered all of the present counties of Wayne and Pike.

With the movements for the erection of Matlack its limits seem to have been so diminished as to leave only that part of its former territory which lay southeastward of Shohola Creek, though no court record of such change can be found. Its territory conformed to such reduced boundaries so long as it remained part of Wayne County.

Erection of the Six Northern Townships.—At the first court in Wayne County, in September, 1798, a petition with twenty-five signers was presented, viz.:

"To the Hon[l]. Jacob Rush and the associate judges of Wayne County: We, the subscribers, inhabitants of the northern part of this county, desire your honors to take into consideration the very great inconvenience that must arise to the inhabitants in taking assessments for taxation, and transacting all town business, by reason of our part of the county not being made into townships of a moderate size. Therefore, we hope your honors will direct the part of the county north and west of Shohola Creek be made into six townships, according to the enclosed plan of this part of the county."

The prayer of the petitioners was granted, and an order made "that Samuel Stanton, Eliphalet Kellogg, Nathan Skinner, Mordecai Roberts, Jr., and Hezekiah Bingham, Jr., or any of them, be authorized to run the lines of a tract, beginning at the Delaware River, where the New York State line intersects said river, thence along said line to the line of Luzerne County, and thence along the same according to a plan of the same filed, marking all the trees with four notches on each side. The same to be laid off in townships and named respectively Buckingham, Mount Pleasant, Damascus, Palmyra, Canaan and Lackawaxen."

The plan, said to be filed, cannot now be found, but from other maps and documents of early date it is evident it was as follows:

First.—A line was drawn from the western bend of the Delaware, near the mouth of "Rock Run," west to the line of Luzerne. The territory north of this line was to form Buckingham township.

Second.—A second line parallel to the above was drawn from the Delaware near the lower end of Big Eddy to the line of Luzerne, being about eleven and a half miles south of the line of Buckingham. This was to form the southern boundary of Damascus and Mount Pleasant.

Third.—A third line was drawn from a point in the south line of Buckingham eight miles east of the line of Luzerne (parallel to the county line), southward to Delaware township line. This third line was to be the eastern line of Mount Pleasant and Canaan, and the western line of Damascus and Palmyra.

Fourth.—A fourth line (following the "Hilborn Road") was drawn from the south line of Damascus southward to the northern line of Delaware township. This was to form the eastern boundary of Palmyra and the western boundary of Lackawaxen township.

The persons appointed by the court to run the lines were none of them experienced, accurate surveyors, and their lines were not so run as to conform precisely to the plan given. Mount Pleasant was run out by Samuel Stanton, and was probably first located. Damascus was afterwards run by another surveyor, and the northern and southern lines of the two townships, instead of meeting at the same point, were so run that the western corners of Damascus were near half a mile south of the eastern corners of Mount Pleasant. The south line of Mount Pleasant passed a very little north of the late residence of Asa Stanton, and the four townships of Mount Pleasant, Canaan, Palmyra and Damascus all cornered within one and a quarter miles of the Bethany public square.

Following is an explanation of the boundaries of each of the six northern townships, with the changes made in them before 1815:

Lackawaxen was bounded north by Damascus, east by Delaware River and Upper Smithfield, south by Delaware township and west by Palmyra.

In the erection of Pike County in 1814, all of this township, except about six thousand acres in the northwest part, was set off to Pike County. The part which remained in Wayne was attached to Dyberry.

Buckingham was bounded north by the northern line of the State, east by the Delaware River, south by Damascus and Mount Pleasant and west by the western line of the county.

Its territory was diminished, in 1807 or 1808, by the addition made to Mount Pleasant; in 1821, by the erection of Scott; and in 1826, by the erection of Manchester. Thus depleted, it is left with an area of only about thirty-eight square miles.

Damascus was bounded north by Buckingham, east by Delaware River, south by Lackawaxen and Palmyra and west by Mount Pleasant. Its territory was diminished nearly one-half (from its western portion) by part being included in Dyberry, erected in 1803, and by Lebanon, erected in 1819.

Mount Pleasant was bounded north by Buckingham, east by Damascus, south by Canaan and west by the western line of the county. In 1803 its southeastern part was detached to form part of Dyberry then erected; and in 1807, or 1808 its southern boundary was removed near five miles farther north, and at the same time its northern boundary was also removed a like distance north, thus giving to it the same amount of territory as when first erected.

Canaan as originally erected was bounded north by Mount Pleasant, east by Palmyra, south by Delaware township and west by the western line of the county.

In 1803 part of its territory in its northeastern corner was made part of Dyberry, then erected; and in 1807 or 1808 all that part south of an east and west line, crossing the North and South Road at Middle Creek (Shaffer's), was detached to form part of Salem, then erected. At the same time its northern boundary was removed about five miles north so as to be on a line with the northern line of Dyberry township.

Palmyra when first erected was bounded north by Damascus, east by the Hilborn Road, which was the west boundary of Lackawaxen, south by township of Delaware and west by Canaan. The erection of Dyberry in 1803, took five miles in breadth from the northern end of Palmyra; and by the erection of Pike County, in 1814, all that part of the township east of the Wallenpaupack was included in Pike, and became Palmyra in Pike.

Townships Subsequently Erected.—Dyberry was erected at September court, 1803, from the townships of Damascus, Palmyra, Canaan and Mount Pleasant.

Its northern and southern boundaries were parallel east and west lines, one of which was five miles west of the south line of Damascus, and the other five miles south of the Damascus line. The south half of its eastern boundary was the "Hilborn Road," and the other half was a line bearing north, twelve and a half degrees west, from a point in the south line of Damascus, about half a mile west of the "Hilborn Road," extended to a point five miles north of the south line of Damascus, and its western boundary was the eastern line of the large tract of land called "Elk Forest Tract," and an extension of those lines northward and southward to the extent of the township. As thus formed, it was about ten miles square.

By the erection of Pike County in 1814 about nine square miles of the northwestern part of Lackawaxen township was left in Wayne County. This part was subsequently added to Dyberry township. Its territory has since been greatly diminished by the erection of the borough of Bethany in 1821, the township of Berlin in 1826, the township of Clinton in 1834, and subsequent additions thereto; and the township of Texas in 1837.

Salem township was erected at November court, 1807, or January court, 1808. (The court-record not found). Its original boundaries included that part of Canaan south of an east and west line crossing the old North and South Road at Middle Creek, and also that part of Delaware township westward of a line drawn from the north line of Delaware, at the Hilborn Road, to the south line of Delaware at the old road leading from Salem to Coolbaugh's, on the Delaware River. By the erection of Pike County all that part of Salem lying east of the Wallenpaupack Creek was included in Pike. But the small part of Delaware township which was then left in Wayne was added to Salem in Wayne. It has since been largely reduced in area by the erection of Sterling in 1815, and other townships subsequently.

Early Finances of the County.—A brief glance at the financial condition of Wayne County during the early years of its existence, and the difficulties that its officials had to contend with to keep the machinery of its organization in motion, is in order before a view of the circumstances leading to the change in the location of the county seat and the erection of new public buildings.

It must be borne in mind that Wayne County, as originally organized, including, in addition to its present territory, all of Pike and a portion of Monroe, had a population only equal to that of an average township of to-day, and the region now Wayne County contained but about eight hundred people, of whom Buckingham had 110; Canaan, 183; Damascus, 145; Mount Pleasant, 188, and Palmyra, 179. Such a mere handful of people, scattered over a large area of rough country, in which there were few roads for reaching the markets with the little produce they had to spare from their limited tillable acres, found the burden of taxation entailed upon them by the expenses of the new county a heavy one to bear. The first auditor's report was presented December 26, 1799, by Jason Torrey and John H. Schenck. It was generally complimentary to the commissioners, and the few errors which had been committed were excused in view of the crude state of public business in the county and the lack of experience on the part of the officers. The commissioners were mildly censured for having allowed the attorney-general to overdraw his account; but, in other respects, the board was praised for the correctness of their accounts and the economy of their disbursements. The report was accompanied with the apologetic statement that the auditors "having had to proceed without precedents, and the business of the commissioners being equally new to them, the examining, comparing and reducing the accounts to a settlement was rendered irksome, and could not be effected with that facility which, under other circumstances, might have been expected."

The difficulty of collecting taxes is well illustrated by the following report showing the first quota levied upon each township and the amounts paid into the county treasury:

	Tax on Inhabitants.	Total.	Paid.
Buckingham	$50.67	$447.11	$41.38
Canaan	48.39	244.69	44.77
Palmyra	91.21	325.52	84.78
Lackawaxen	24.02	106.10	31.86
Damascus	22.26	302.35	94.60
Mount Pleasant	59.81	165.46	76.48
Upper Smithfield	73.83	152.59	32.71
Middle Smithfield	100.62	171.03	19.48
Delaware	84.92	103.55	32.52
Total	$555.73	$2018.30	$459.58

To this amount paid in, $459.58, was added $210.62, advanced from the treasury, making the sum of $670.20 available cash, with which the pioneers managed to carry on the affairs of the county for a period of eighteen months. The board, however, felt warranted by the large amount upon the tax collector's duplicate still unpaid, in incurring some liabilities, and drew orders on the treasury to the amount of nearly $750. The total expenditures of the county for a year and a half were $1415.09, of which one item was $75.65 paid as premiums for wolf scalps.

The first commissioners were Eliphalet Kellogg, Johannes Van Etten and John Carson; but the first two were in 1800 superseded by Asa Stanton and Solomon Westbrook, who, with Carson, constituted a new board, and made Eliphalet Kellogg their clerk. They received more severe criticism from the auditors than had their predecessors. Jason Torrey had been re-appointed auditor, and, in conjunction with James Eldred and Martin Overfield, served during the year 1800. Their report was made at the February term of court, 1801, and was accompanied by a long letter from Mr. Torrey, who was prevented from being present by an accident which had overtaken one of his children. He very pointedly denounced some of the commissioners' proceedings, which, he charged, were irregular and unwarrantable. The improprieties with which they were charged were letting bridge contracts without prescribing the manner in which the work should be done or when completed; with permitting an insecure and unsafe structure to be put up across Middle Creek; with paying their clerk over two hundred dollars per year, when there were competent persons in the county who would gladly perform the services for less than half that sum; with withholding a transcript of the county tax levy from the treasurer; with allowing one of their number (Mr. Carson) to go to Philadelphia, and at great expense advertise in three daily papers for three months the fact of his being in that city to receive taxes on unseated lands, and receiving a considerable amount without accounting for the same to the auditors; with subscribing for the papers alluded to and charging the subscription and advertising account and his time and traveling expenses to the delinquent tax-payers; with withholding needed information from the treasurer, so that he had repeatedly been obliged to refuse money offered him in discharge of taxes, and with various other misdemeanors of lesser importance. Before the report was filed, however, Mr. Torrey appended to it a note partially exonerating Mr. Carson and the clerk, Eliphalet Kellogg, from the charges he had made in his letter.

During the year 1800 the receipts from actual residents were shown by the auditor's report to have been $605.87, including $91.92 of arrears from the preceding year, and the payments on the taxes of unseated lands added $613.68 to that amount, making a total of $1219.55, while the expenditures were $1650.06. The auditor's report for 1802 showed a balance due the county, in the form of outstanding taxes, of $3441.91, and this amount, the official said, would be much larger if they had any means of ascertaining the amount paid on non-residents' lands for the years 1799, 1800, and 1801. They expressed the belief that if all arrearages were collected there would be a sufficiency of funds realized to free the county from taxation for many years to come. Year by year the aggregate of taxes increased with the population, but expenses also grew, and the expenditures were in excess of the receipts. In 1803 the collectors of the county paid into the treasury $676.30, and $4082.71 was received from taxes on unseated lands, but these amounts aggregated $2861.51 less than the levy. The orders drawn on the treasury footed up $7069.35, and it was impossible to redeem them all. It was during this year that the county settled with the trustees of the Bethany tract, and drew an order in their favor of $1638.50. A considerable amount was also paid for running the lines of Dyberry township erected that year.

It was not until 1805 that the actual receipts were in excess of the disbursements, the settlement by the auditors in that year showing a balance in the hands of Treasurer Dimmick. Notwithstanding this improvement, the finances of the county were in a bad way and the accounts had got into a confusion which seemed almost beyond unraveling. An earnest effort was made during 1807 and 1808 to adjust the affairs of the county. Early in 1807 a careful examination of the accounts revealed the fact that there was no money in the treasury, while its liabilities, in the shape of unpaid orders, taxes to be refunded, etc., amounted to over $5000. The gratifying discovery was made, however, that more than $16,000 was due the treasury from owners of unseated lands, delinquent collectors, dilatory sheriffs, overpaid commissioners and other officers, which, if collected, it was urged, would put the county out of debt and leave a considerable balance in the treasury.

As a result of this investigation Sheriff Abisha Woodward was instructed to sell such unseated lands as were in arrears for taxes, which he did from time to time, until in 1809 the receipts from such sales had exceeded $9000.

By 1811 the inconvenience and loss which had been experienced by Wayne County and by individuals, through the neglect of treasurers to furnish information to the commissioners in regard to their finances, led to the passage of a resolution requiring that official to report the condition of the treasury on the first day of every term of court. Failure to do so and the buying up of county orders at a discount, with public funds, were declared misdemeanors in office.

From this time onward the financial affairs of the county steadily improved up to the panic of 1837, except that something of a hardship was experienced in 1814 and 1815 by reason of the severe and, as generally regarded, unjust provisions of the act setting off Pike county. The financial depression of 1837 was very severely felt in Wayne County. Specie payments being suspended by the State banks, the collectors found it almost impossible to receive taxes, owing to the want of small change, and early in the year the county commissioners, to obviate in a measure that difficulty, procured three thousand dollars' worth of checks of the denominations of twenty-five, fifty and seventy-five cents and one dollar, and put them into circulation. This led eventually to great loss and inconvenience, for many individuals engaged in mercantile and other departments of trade followed their example, and the county was flooded with this cheap currency, much of which being entirely worthless, caused all to be looked upon with suspicion, and thus to increase the very evil which it was designed to mitigate. That issued by the county, however, was chiefly paid to the officers of the several townships to the amount of the appropriations due them for school purposes, and most of the checks came back into the treasury through the hands of the tax collectors.[1]

Removal of the County-Seat to Honesdale.—The rapid growth of Honesdale foreshadowed the ultimate removal of the seat of justice from Bethany to that place. It was looked forward to for several years prior to 1840 as an inevitable result of the increasing importance of the town, but was finally effected by a sudden movement. During the legislative session of 1840-1841 the friends of the measure perfected arrangements with trustworthy men in each township, who, at an appointed time, started simultaneously and rapidly circulated petitions in their respective districts favoring the passage of a removal act. These, being placed in the hands of a partisan friend of the measure in Honesdale, were hurriedly taken to Harrisburg, and the passage of the act was secured before many of its enemies in the county were aware of the movement. The passage of the act was largely due to the influence of Ebenezer Kingsbury, then State Senator. A strong attempt was made to kill the bill before it was approved by the Governor, but it proved unavailing.

The exact site of the seat of justice in Honesdale was fixed on May 4, 1841, where the commissioners appointed by the Governor met the county commissioners, and accepted the present site, east of the public square, as a joint gift from the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company and the Torrey estate.

The court-house was erected by Charles Jameson upon contract, and, upon its completion, the Bethany court-house, together with certain real estate there, were sold to him for five hundred and ten dollars. The new building was formally accepted November 8, 1843. The removal of the records from Bethany had been effected on the 21st of August preceding, and the first court was held in Honesdale September 4, 1843.

The building soon proved insufficient for the accommodation of the county business, and to afford more ample quarters, an additional structure was erected, styled the "fire-proof." This was a brick building, in which were located the county offices. It was erected in 1856 by Beers & Heath.

The present jail was erected in 1859 by Messrs. Kelly & McAndrews, and has since been repaired.

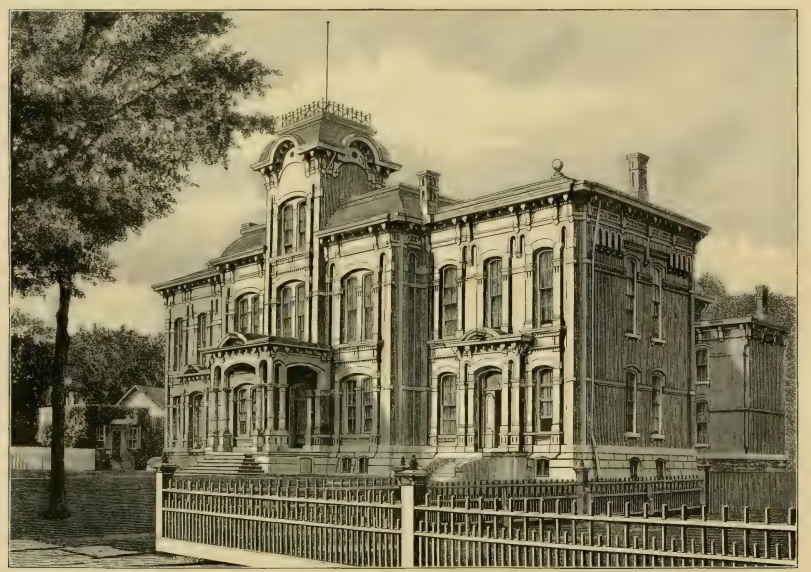
THE NEW COURT-HOUSE AND THE COURT-HOUSE WAR.—Even after the erection of the "fire-proof" or "county offices" building, in 1856, the court-house was noticeably insufficient for the growing demands of the county. The inadequacy of the court-room was gradually becoming apparent, and a few years later the court began to call the attention of the grand jury to the need of more suitable accommodations. This body at length responded in reports setting forth the obvious defects of the building, and with accompanying recommendations, of the following tenor:

AT SEPTEMBER SESSIONS, 1867.

"In regard to the Court-House, the grand jury entirely coincide with the Honorable Court, in the suggestions made on the morning of the 4th instant, and they believe the time has arrived for the consideration of the subject of the erection of a more substantial and capacious building than the one now occupied. The present term of court must have impressed every intelligent and thoughtful observer that the court-room is entirely inadequate to the wants of the people and the business of the county; the space so limited as to render it very fatiguing to those required to attend court, either as witnesses or jurors, and the consequent crowding of the room, and rendering the air exceedingly unpleasant, impure and unhealthy, and the accommodations of the bar and court so limited that the business cannot be dispatched, either promptly or pleasantly. Impressed with these views, which the jury believe to be correct, and so evident that they need no argument to enforce, they consider it within their appropriate sphere of duty to recommend that the County Commissioners should have this subject before them in future levying of taxes, that they may, at no distant day, be prepared to enter upon the work of erecting such a building as is required, and as shall be a credit to the enterprise and good taste of the people of the whole county."

AT DECEMBER SESSIONS, 1867.

"They would cheerfully adopt the recommendations of the September grand jury, in relation to a new court-house, and would suggest that means be derived and carried into execution to create a fund, with which, at no distant day, the County Commissioners may enter upon the work of erecting a suitable and commodious court-house, which will meet the wants and demands of our rapidly growing county, and of necessity increased business."



AT FEBRUARY SESSIONS, 1868.

"They would further suggest, that means be derived and carried into execution to create a fund, with which, at no distant day, the County Commissioners may enter upon the work of erecting a suitable and commodious court-house, which will meet the wants of our rapidly increasing and growing county."

The matter was further discussed as time went on; but, although the need of a more commodious court-house was generally recognized, the people were not quite ready to incur the expense of its erection. At December Sessions, 1871, the grand jury, in reporting on the county buildings, said,— "They would not recommend the rebuilding, or changes and repairs, to any great extent, of the county buildings, until a future time, when the necessities would be greater, and the resources correspondingly larger to bear the burden of expenses."

At December Sessions, 1873, the grand jury said, in relation to the county buildings,—

WAYNE COUNTY COURT HOUSE

"We believe them all that is necessary for the present, and we recommend that the commissioners commence no new work unless absolutely necessary."

At May Sessions, 1875, the recommendation for the erection of a new court-house was renewed; the grand jury, in a report on the county buildings, saying,—

"They would further report that they have considered the question of a new court-house, and do recommend that such a building be erected as soon as the financial condition of the business interests will admit."

In November following, a new Board of Commissioners was elected—viz: Thomas Brown of Texas, and George Foote of Salem, Democrats; and Francis A. Oppelt, of Sterling, Republican. During the canvass, the "court-house question" was among the issues discussed; and, as the industrial depression commencing in 1873 was then seriously felt in the county, the prevailing sentiment was adverse to the immediate erection of a new building.

At February Sessions, 1876, the grand jury, in reporting on the county buildings, said,—

"They would further report that they have considered the question of a new court-house, and do recommend that such a building be erected as soon as the financial condition of the business interests of the county will admit; that the present building is inadequate for the proper accommodation of the county, and that it is poorly ventilated."

The court, at the same sessions, supplemented this with the following recommendation:

"In view of the crowded state of the court-room, for the past year, and the manifest necessity for enlarged accommodations for the people of the county who have business in the court, as lawyers, jurors, parties and witnesses, and the very imperfect ventilation of the court room, we cordially approve of the report of the grand jury on this subject, and recommend to the County Commissioners to carry out the same by at once maturing plans and erecting the foundations of the new building the coming season. They can thus distribute the expenses through the years necessarily required for the erection and completion of a new building, which shall meet the wants of and be a credit to the county, and not impose unnecessary burdens upon the taxpayers.

"C. P. Waller, President Judge.
"Otis Avery, } Associate Judges."
"H. Wilson, }

May 11, 1876, the commissioners adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas: The erection of a new Court-House has been recommended by four Grand Juries of this county and their recommendations approved by the court, and has also been recommended and earnestly urged by large numbers of the citizens of the county, including many of the heaviest tax-payers; and

"Whereas: No opposition has been developed in any tangible form, and a new Court-House is urgently demanded by the present condition of the county buildings, and by the growing necessity for increased facilities and conveniences in the conduct of judicial proceedings and the business of the several county offices; and

Whereas: The present time is especially favorable for such an undertaking, both from the low price of labor and material and the desirability of giving additional employment to labor in our own community:—Therefore

Resolved, That in view of the circumstances herein referred to, it has become the bounden duty of the Commissioners to proceed at once to take the necessary steps for the construction of a Court-House suited to the wants and means of the county.

"F. A. Oppelt,
"George Foote, } Com's."
"Thomas Brown,

Plans were accordingly prepared, and early in July ground was broken for the new court-house. The work proceeded under the immediate supervision and direction of Commissioner Brown, who was an experienced practical builder; and at the close of the season the foundation was completed and a portion of the brick superstructure laid. The amount thus expended, as shown by the financial statement for the year, was $29,528.19, and the expenditures were approved by the county auditors on their examination of the matter in the following January.

Meantime the public mind had become much agitated on the subject. The most exaggerated ideas as to the probable cost of the building gained credence, and the people were, very generally, apprehensive of an extravagant and unnecessary outlay. Throughout the summer the discontent increased; and when, early in September, the County Conventions of the two parties met, it was expected that they would express some opinion and announce some policy on the subject. The opponents of the court-house formed a majority in both parties, and could easily have controlled both conventions had they taken the trouble to attend the primary meetings. But, with the political habit of mind long characteristic of the American citizen, they took it for granted that party action would follow public sentiment without any action by members of the party, and that no practical measures were required to give effect to the public will. Hence, but a small proportion of either party attended the primaries, while the great majority of both remained at home, complaining that "the party" paid no attention to public opinion, and that the people had no voice in the management of their own affairs. As might have been expected, the conventions took no action on the court-house question, but gave their attention solely to the business of looking after offices.

The county tickets being thus placed in the field, with no official declaration by the conventions on the question paramount to all others in the popular mind, attention was naturally directed to the attitude of the candidates on this subject. Isaiah Scudder, of Bethany, and Charles W. Gilpin, of Sterling, the candidates for Representatives, and Giles Greene, of Salem, the candidate for associate judge, on the Republican ticket, were known as "anti-court-house men." The Democratic party being in a majority, the views of its nominees for these offices became the subject of more anxious inquiry. For some time these candidates maintained in public a non-committal attitude. Finally, however, they were forced into positive action by the course of events.

Among prominent Democrats who had attended the Democratic County Convention as spectators was Dr. Rodney Harmes, of Pleasant Mount. He was a pronounced "anti-court-house man," and strongly urged his party to take a decided stand on the court-house question. Disgusted with the course of the convention, he returned home, resolved that if the candidates failed to express some positive convictions during the month he would make an effort to secure more direct action by the people. The month passed with the candidates acting after the manner of their kind—hedging with a view to secure the support of each element of the party without cutting loose from the other. Meantime the public mind was in a most inflammable condition, and struggling with inarticulate anger to make its purpose clear, and to indicate a distinct line of action. It needed only the man to determine how and when to apply the torch and fire the popular heart with a definite aim. While the situation was thus apparent to all, it fell to Dr. Harmes to take the initiative in giving voice to the popular feeling, defining the popular purpose, and directing popular action. At his suggestion, an "Anti-Court-House Convention" was held in Pleasant Mount, September 27th, at which resolutions were adopted condemning the action of the officials concerned in the erection of the new court-house, and a committee was appointed to canvass the county in behalf of the movement, and to report nominations for Representatives one week later. At the second meeting, October 4th, William M. Nelson, of Equinunk, a Democrat, and Butler Hamlin, of Salem, a Republican, were nominated for the Legislature. Orrin Lester, chairman, and J. F. Bass, secretary, were declared permanent officers of the organization; and the convention adjourned for one week. Mr. Hamlin declined the nomination for Representative; Frederick W. Farnham, of Hawley, was subsequently named to fill the vacancy, but he, too, declined. Mr. Nelson went to Honesdale, and, after a conference with the Democratic candidates and County Committee, William A. Smith, one of the candidates for Representative, withdrew from the ticket, and Mr. Nelson was substituted. At the same time A. R. Howe, the other Democratic candidate for Representative, published a letter which was construed as an anti-court-house deliverance; and a week later Michael Brown, the Democratic candidate for associate judge, followed with a letter of similar import. The latter, however, came too late to be effective. Messrs. Nelson and Howe were the successful candidates for the Legislature, while Mr. Greene, the Republican candidate, was elected associate judge.

Early in 1877 the commissioners began preparations to resume work on the court-house. As a preliminary step, they passed a resolution, January 16th, to submit to the people the question of an increase of debt under the act of April 20, 1874. The valuation of property was $1,777,726. The existing debt was $22,570.49. The increase proposed was $106,000, being six per cent. of the valuation. The increase was voted on at the township elections in February, and negatived by a decisive majority—the vote in its favor being 1119, to 3238 against it.

The triennial assessment was about to be revised; and after the vote against an increase of debt, the commissioners, sitting as a board of revision, decided to raise the valuation sufficiently to enable them to incur the indebtedness necessary to complete the court-house, under the act of 1874, without the sanction of a popular vote. They accordingly increased the aggregate valuation to $8,312,134. The revision which resulted in this increase was completed March 20th; and the period fixed for hearing appeals began April 16th and ended May 4th. March 21st the commissioners adopted a resolution to increase the debt of the county to an amount not exceeding one hundred and sixty thousand dollars—about two per cent. of the revised valuation—to be secured by bonds; with a provision for levying the tax required for payment of the interest and the redemption of the bonds.

The vote on the increase of indebtedness had shown the magnitude of the opposition to the plans of the commissioners; and the "anti-court-house party," having thus learned its strength, prepared for action against the new project of bonding the county. An organization was quickly effected, funds were subscribed, and counsel employed, for the purpose of testing in the courts the right of the commissioners to proceed. Hon. E. O. Hamlin and George S. Purdy were retained, together with A. Ricketts, of Wilkes-Barre, one of the most distinguished equity practitioners in the State; and May 9, 1877, a bill in equity was filed by William Holbert and forty-six others as plaintiffs, in behalf of the citizens and tax-payers of the county, against the commissioners.

The bill set forth the action already taken by the commissioners in relation to the erection of a new court-house; the debt already incurred, and the increase proposed; the revision of the assessment and increase of valuation; and the intention of the commissioners to destroy the old court-house. It averred the illegality of these proceedings, and prayed for an injunction restraining the commissioners from proceeding further with the erection of a court-house until they were lawfully empowered so to do; from issuing bonds, increasing the county indebtedness, or levying a tax for the erection of public buildings; and from tearing down or injuring the existing court-house.

A motion for a preliminary injunction was argued before Judge Dreher, May 14th and 15th, the counsel for the commissioners being Wm. H. Dimmick, C. S. Minor, G. G. Waller, H. M. Seely and H. Wilson.

The commissioners, in their answer, set forth the three successive reports of grand juries, and the recommendation of the court, as their authority for the erection of a new court-house; averred that their expenditures on the new building had been duly approved by the county auditors; that the assessors had returned the taxable property far below its value, and that the valuation had been revised, raised and equalized, as required by law; admitted their intention to increase the county indebtedness to an amount not exceeding $160,000, including the debt already contracted, and to remove the existing court-house whenever it became necessary or proper so to do; and denied that their action in the premises was in any manner unlawful.

On the hearing, the plaintiffs proposed to impeach the reports of the grand juries by the affidavits of various grand jurors that no such reports were made; that they were not agreed to by twelve grand jurors; or that the affiants had no recollection of a vote on the question.

The defendants produced counter-affidavits by other grand jurors; certified copies from the records of the Court of Quarter Sessions, showing that the reports were read and ordered by the court to be published in the county papers, and that at February Sessions, 1868, it was ordered that a copy of the report be furnished to the commissioners; and the affidavit of William H. Ham, then clerk of the court, that he had read the reports aloud in open court, in presence of the grand jury, by direction of the court, and that in each case the president judge stated to the grand jury that the court approved their recommendation, and ordered the reports to be filed and published in the county papers.

The counsel for the defense objected to the admission of affidavits by grand jurors to impeach their own reports. The counsel for plaintiffs, in support of such testimony, cited the act of 15th April, 1869, providing that "no interest or policy of law shall exclude a party or person from being a witness in any civil proceeding," etc., and argued that as such testimony had previously been inadmissible on the ground of public policy, the act of 1869, in removing that ground, had made the testimony admissible.

It was further contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the record showing no recommendation by the court until February, 1876, there was not the concurrent action of the grand juries and the court which the law required; the act of Assembly providing that "It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of any County, having first obtained the approbation of two successive grand juries, and of the Court of Quarter Sessions of such County, to cause to be erected," etc. As to the proposed increase of indebtedness to $160,000, it was contended, first, that the increase of valuation was unlawfully made; and, second, that even if lawful, it was not fixed, determined and adjusted until the final revision on appeals; hence, that "the last preceding assessed valuation," at the time of the vote to increase the debt, was that fixed by the preceding triennial assessment, $1,777,-726; and this proposed increase of debt to $160,000 being more than two per cent. of this valuation, was therefore unlawful, under the provisions of the Constitution (Article IX, Section 8).

The court, in deciding the case, held, (1) That if any fraudulent or fictitious report had been filed in the Court of Quarter Sessions, it could be corrected only by that court, and not by the Court of Common Pleas, to which the application for an injunction was made; (2) That there was no evidence of such fraud, the reports having been read in presence of the grand jury, and directed to be published. "If any juror did not agree to such report, it was his privilege then and there to make his protest, when all the jurors could have been heard, while their recollections were fresh, and the record made to conform to the facts;" that if the record, years afterward, could thus be impeached, "there would be no safety to persons acting upon the faith of such records; and instead of looking among the records of the Court for the proceedings and doings of the grand jury, the County Commissioners, before they would be warranted in proceeding in the erection of new public buildings, would have to interview the members of the grand jury to ascertain whether the record is correct;" (3) That the "interest or policy of law" intended by the act of 1869 did not include the case of a grand juror testifying in relation to his own finding (citing Tioga v. South Creek, 25 P. F Smith 437); (4) That the court was not limited as to time in affirming the recommendation of the grand jury, and that the law did not require the action of the court and the grand jury to be contemporaneous; (5) That the revision of the assessment and increase of valuation were lawful and regularly made, and that "the Court cannot interfere by injunction because of extravagant or unequal valuation, more especially as the law has provided a specific remedy by appeal;" (6) That the revision of the assessment and adjustment of the valuation were not complete until the final action of the commissioners on appeals, which was not concluded until May 4th, but that a loan subsequently made, not exceeding two per cent. of the valuation as then fixed, would not be in excess of two per cent. of "the last preceding assessed valuation," within the meaning of the act of 20th April, 1874; (7) That "if the circumstances under which the Commissioners propose to remove the old building should arise, they certainly will have the right to remove it."

But while refusing the injunction, for the reasons given, Judge Dreher called attention to the act of 9th April, 1868, which provides that "When two successive Grand Juries in any county of this Commonwealth have reported in favor of the erection or repair of public buildings, which report has been approved by the Court of Quarter Sessions, and the funds on hand in the County Treasury shall not be sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of the erection and repair of said buildings, it shall be lawful for the County Commissioners to borrow the money necessary, and issue the bonds of the county therefor. Provided, That before such loan is contracted the Commissioners shall present a statement of the financial condition of the county to the Court of Quarter Sessions of the county, and secure the approval of such Court for such loan." He added,—

"The Commissioners have no right to contract a loan, or issue bonds therefor, for the purpose of erecting a court-house, or any public building, until they have secured the approval of the Court of Quarter Sessions. They are therefore as effectually restrained from contracting a loan or issuing bonds for erecting a court-house, until they get the approval of the Court of Quarter Sessions, as it would be possible for the Court of Common Pleas to restrain them by injunction. If they should attempt to contract a loan, or issue bonds, or to collect any special tax to pay such loan or bonds, without the approval of the Quarter Sessions, the Common Pleas would enjoin them.

"The matter is now with the County Commissioners and the Judges of the Court of Quarter Sessions, to determine what amount of loan may be contracted."

May 21st—before Judge Dreher's decision was announced—the revised valuation having been reduced on appeal to $7,561,956, the commissioners rescinded the resolution of March 21st, providing for an increase of indebtedness to $160,000, and substituted a resolution limiting the increase to an aggregate of $140,000. A few days later Judge Dreher's opinion was filed, and the commissioners thereupon decided to apply to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the approval of an issue of bonds. Their petition for this purpose, presented June 2d, set forth the indebtedness already incurred in the construction of the court-house at $37,502.87, and asked the approval of a loan of $125,000, in which the existing indebtedness was included. June 8th, Judge Waller, the president judge, filed an opinion, limiting the proposed loan to $106,000, and approving of the issue of bonds to that amount—$38,000 to liquidate the indebtedness already incurred, and the remaining $68,000 to be approved "whenever the Commissioners shall obtain a responsible contract for the completion of the building in a proper manner" for that sum. June 9th, however, the associate judges, Avery and Greene, filed an opinion, refusing to approve the issue of any bonds or the negotiation of any loan for completing the court-house.

The question was next raised, on the part of the commissioners, whether the act of 9th April, 1868, was not repealed by the act of 20th April, 1874. Though the former act was cited by Judge Dreher in his opinion, the question of its repeal by the latter act had not been argued, or even presented, on the hearing before him. On this point there was some difference of opinion among the counsel for the commissioners. The bonds had already been printed and prepared for issue, under the resolution of March 21st, and it was soon understood that they had been or were about to be placed on the market, as a loan authorized by the act of 1874. P. P. Smith, a prominent member of the bar, decided to test the right of the commissioners to contract the proposed loan, and June 30th filed a bill in equity in behalf of two of his clients—John Hennigan and August Hartung—to restrain the issue of bonds and the collection of the tax levied for payment of interest. The commissioners, in their answer, admitted their purpose to contract a loan for the completion of the court-house and to meet other necessary expenses of the county, and contended that they were authorized to do so, without the approval of the court, by the act of 1874. July 3d a preliminary injunction was granted against the issue of bonds and the collection of the bond tax, without the approval of the court and July 19th was fixed for hearing a motion to dissolve the injunction. Instead of waiting to argue this motion, however, the commissioners appealed from the decree. The case was argued before the Supreme Court at Pittsburgh, in October following, and a decision was rendered by the chief justice in the following terms:

"PER CURIAM.—Decree affirmed, except so far as it restrains the Commissioners from levying and collecting county taxes, under the general system for levying and collecting county taxes, for the purpose of building a new court-house."

This decided that the commissioners had authority to levy the necessary tax for building the court-house, but not to borrow money for that purpose without the approval of the court.

On the opening of the political canvass, in the fall of 1877, the "Anti-Court-House Party" was strong and well organized throughout the county. It held a convention at Bethany, and placed a county ticket in the field; Judge Avery, whose term would expire in the following January, being nominated for associate judge, and Godfrey Stevenson, of Mount Pleasant, for treasurer. Candidates were also nominated as usual by the two political parties. The Anti-Court-House ticket, however, was elected by an overwhelming majority.

Meantime—in September—the old court-house was torn down. Arrangements were subsequently made, by which the courts were held in Liberty Hall until the close of 1878, and in Weaver's Hall from that time until the completion of the new court-house.

November 7th, Thomas Brown, one of the commissioners, died.

November 8th, Commissioners Oppelt and Foote adopted a resolution levying a tax of ten mills on the dollar, for the purpose of proceeding with the erection of the court-house, and to meet ordinary expenses.

The expenditures on the building, during the year 1877, as shown by the financial statement, were $18,030.53.

At December Term, 1877, the court appointed Wm. Holbert commissioner, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Brown. Mr. Holbert, having been the leading plaintiff in the original bill for an injunction, was an undoubted "anti-court-house man."

In January, 1878, the accounts of the commissioners and treasurer were laid before the county auditors (P. G. Goodrich, A. R. Peck, and Eugene Dorflinger) for settlement. The auditors refused to allow the commissioners credit for county orders drawn to meet expenses connected with the new court-house after the refusal of the court to approve a loan; or to allow the treasurer credit for the payment of such orders after Nov. 24, 1877, at which date an "Anti-Court-House Committee" had notified him to pay no more of them. These orders were printed in blue ink, to distinguish them from those drawn for ordinary expenses, and were known as "blue checks." The commissioners and treasurer were accordingly surcharged with the following sums:

" Brown	1970.85
" Foote	3335.61
Treasurer Paul Swingle	1511.44

The commissioners and treasurer at once appealed from this settlement of their accounts. The issues formed on these appeals were tried at the following May Term. The personal interests of Commissioners Oppelt and Foote, as appellants, being adverse to the claim of the county which they officially represented, an application was made to the court by the "Anti-Court-House Committee" for leave to appear in person and by their attorneys, Messrs. Hamlin and Purdy, in behalf of the county; and these attorneys also asked leave to appear for the county under an authority given by Commissioner Holbert. Before the cases were taken up, however, an arrangement was made by which C. S. Minor was employed to act as attorney for the county in the proceedings, and the applications on the part of Messrs. Hamlin and Purdy were withdrawn. The appeals of the commissioners were first tried. The evidence offered in behalf of the county consisted of that portion of the auditor's report relating to the matters in controversy, the assessment and tax levies for 1877 and 1878, and the testimony of Auditor Peck, as to the character of the claims which had been disallowed, and the reasons for disallowance. When the county closed, the defendants demurred to the evidence, and after argument the court directed judgment on the demurrer for the defendants. The appeal of the treasurer was next taken up, and as the question on which it turned had just been decided by the court against the county, the jury, under the direction of the court, rendered a verdict for the defendant.

At February Sessions, 1878, Commissioners Oppelt and Foote presented a petition asking for the approval of bonds to the amount of $100,000, conditioned on making a contract, to be approved by the court, for the completion of the court-house, at a total cost not exceeding that sum. A similar petition was laid before the grand jury, with the request that they take the matter into consideration, and if they thought the proposed measure advisable, to recommend it to the court. They declined, however, to take such action on it. Numerous remonstrances were presented to the court against the proposed issue of bonds, and again the associate judges declined to approve the measure. At May Sessions following, Judge Waller called the attention of the grand jury to the subject, for such action as they might think proper to take. They made a report, recommending the issue of bonds as asked for by the commissioners in February, with a proviso that the tax levy for the year should not exceed three mills. The associate judges, however, still withheld their approval.

In view of the continued refusal to approve a loan, and the depressed financial condition of the county, Commissioners Oppelt and Foote, at the suggestion of Mr. Dimmick, their counsel, May 14, 1878, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the resolution of November 8th, 1877, be and the same is hereby rescinded; and that a tax not to exceed five mills on the dollar of valuation be assessed for the year 1878, and that no further work be done on the court-house, or any contract entered into relative to the same for the present year; and that no further request be made to the court for the approval of bonds during our term of office."

In the fall of 1878 the "Anti-Court-House Party" was again in the field with a county ticket; William Holbert and William Hartwell being its nominees for commissioners, and N. F. Underwood and A. B. Gammell for representatives. Mr. Nelson, who had served a term as representative, received its support as a candidate for the State Senate. These candidates were elected. John Riefler, one of the Republican candidates, was chosen as the third commissioner.

At February Sessions, 1879, the grand jury, in reporting on the county buildings, after setting forth the inconveniences connected with the county offices, continued as follows:

"In view of the admitted want of a proper place in which to hold the courts of the county, and the insufficient accommodations for Prothonotary and Treasurer, the grand jury would recommend the Commissioners (if it be at all consistent with the duty they owe to the people of the county) to proceed to finish the new court house, so far, at least, as to afford the necessary court and jury-rooms, and an office for the Prothonotary's use, in as good and cheap a manner as they can."

In May following the plans of the new court-house were examined by the commissioners, various changes were indicated, and reduced estimates of the cost were made. July 3d the commissioners advertised for proposals to complete the building. July 15th they made a contract with A. S. Phillips to complete the erection of the court-house, according to the modified plans decided on, for $25,889. This included none of the interior fittings or furnishing. A subsequent agreement provided for the addition of a dome, or central tower, at a cost of three thousand dollars; and a further contract was made, under which the fitting up of the interior was done by Mr. Phillips. The date fixed for the completion of the building was April 20, 1880.

The purpose of the "Anti-Court-House Party" had been to prevent the completion of the court-house, or at least to postpone it until after the close of Judge Waller's term. The party accomplished nothing, however, by political action, except so far as the refusal of the court to approve the second application for a loan may have been due to the re-election of Judge Avery in 1877; for work on the building was suspended only through the impossibility of obtaining funds with which to continue it. The "Anti-Court-House" members of the Legislature secured the passage of various enactments on the subject, but none of these were of the least avail in arresting operations. The "Anti-Court-House" commissioners were elected under pledges against completing the court-house—

"Pay as you go; and if you can't pay, don't go," being the motto adopted; and up to the last moment the executive committee of the party pronounced against a resumption of the work. The commissioners, however, soon recognized that the existing conditions rendered further delay highly inexpedient, and took the responsibility of proceeding to complete the unfinished building. Their action in the premises was finally approved by the sober second thought of the great body of the tax-payers.

The building was substantially completed at the time fixed, and court was first held in it at May Term, 1880. The commissioners then presented a petition, asking that the grand jury be instructed to make "a full and impartial examination of the work and materials, and report the facts fully to the Court." This was accordingly done, and a report was made by the grand jury, setting forth—

"That we have examined the contracts, examined Commissioner Hartwell upon his oath in regard to them, looked at the specifications, and made such general examination of the building as we felt warranted in doing. That we are none of us practical builders, and therefore do not feel justified in passing upon matters which only experts can intelligently decide. That for these reasons it would not be just to the Commissioners, the contractor, or the people, to take the responsibility upon ourselves to pass judgment on so important a matter, as a contract is now on file between said Commissioners and the contractor, by which the Commissioners and the architect are to be the judges to decide in behalf of the tax-payers whether the contractor has done the work and furnished the materials in accordance with the specifications and contract."

During the two years preceding, numerous suits had been brought and judgments recovered against the county for money lent, and on the "blue checks" discredited by the county auditors in their report for 1877. Litigation was not to end even with the completion of the court-house. The commissioners and Contractor Phillips were unable to effect a settlement, and in August, 1880, the latter brought suit against the county, on a claim of $3000 for building the court-house dome, and of $2000 for seats and other fixtures erected in the court-room. The case was referred to arbitrators, who, November 19th, awarded the contractor the sum of $1790.13. He appealed, and subsequently obtained a change of venue to Monroe County. There he recovered a verdict of $4400, which was afterward reduced to $4000 as the alternative of a new trial. January 13th, 1882, the matter was closed by the payment of $4413.30 in full satisfaction of debt, interest and costs.

The court-house, as finished, is a fine two-story structure of brick, with granite trimmings. The ground plan is in the form of an H, with the wings on the front somewhat longer than those on the rear. The county offices, arbitration room, president judge's chambers, grand jury room and law library are on the first floor; the court-room, jury-rooms, judges' room, bar office, consultation room, and ladies' waiting-room on the second floor. The entire building is heated by steam, the furnace and boilers being in the rear portion of the basement. In the basement, also, are rooms for the janitor and his family. The outside dimensions of the main portion of the building are fifty-eight feet by one hundred and nine; of the front wings, thirty-five by thirty-seven; of the rear wings, twenty-two by twenty-one; giving a front of one hundred and twenty-eight feet, and a rear of one hundred and two feet. A corridor fourteen feet wide extends from front to rear, with an expansion, eighteen feet from the front entrance, octagonal in form, twenty-six feet in diameter. On opposite sides of this, two stairways lead to the front of the second floor and to the court-room; and from a private entrance near the rear of the corridor a stairway leads to the judges' room, bar office and rear of the court-room. The length of the court-room is eighty-nine feet, and its width fifty-three. The bar, bench, clerk's desk and jury boxes occupy thirty-two feet of the length. The judges' room is in rear of the bench; the waiting-room and jury-rooms are in the front wings; the bar office and consultation room are in the rear wings. The bar and jury boxes are elevated some eight inches above the level of the floor, and the tiers of seats in the jury boxes rise from front to rear. The seats of the audience are on a uniform level. This is a very faulty arrangement; since a row of chairs placed across the front of the bar, when occupied, shuts the witness-stand out of view from at least one-half of the benches. The acoustic properties of the room, also, are exceedingly bad; what is said within the bar and on the witness-stand being best heard in the most distant seats. Various plans have been proposed, and experiments tried, for improving the room in this respect, but with little success. The method most likely to be attended with favorable results is a reduction of the bar to the level of the floor, and the elevation of the seats toward the opposite end of the room.

It is impossible to ascertain the exact cost of the building, with the fitting, furnishing, heating apparatus, plumbing, gas fitting, etc., etc. Samuel B. Brown, the commissioners' clerk during most of the period of construction and payment, and the man most familiar with the subject, estimates the aggregate cost at about $130,000. This sum, however, does not include expenses of litigation, costs in suits against the county, interest on unpaid claims, political profits, or wear and tear of the public temper.

THE CIVIL LIST.

Following appear the names of the chief officials of Wayne County—so far as it is possible to ascertain them—together with the representatives in the National and State Legislatures. (For the judiciary, see the succeeding chapter.)

CONGRESSMEN.—For the district of which Wayne has been a part—varying from time to time.

Bucks, Montgomery and Northampton (two members).

1792–97.....Samuel Sitgreaves.
1797–1801.....Robert Brown.

Bucks, Montgomery, Northampton, Wayne and Luzerne (three members).

1803–1813.....Robert Brown.[1]

Bucks, Northampton and Wayne.

1813.....Robert Brown, S. D. Ingham.
1815.....S. D. Ingham, J. Ross.
1817.....Same. Both resigned in 1818.
1818–19.....S. Moore, T. J. Rogers (to fill vacancies).

Bucks, Northampton, Wayne and Pike (two members).

1821.....S. Moore, T. J. Rogers.
1822.....S. D. Ingham (in place of Moore, resigned).
1823.....S. D. Ingham (with Rogers).
1824.....George Wolf (in place of Rogers, resigned).
1825–27.....Ingham and Wolf.
1829.....S. A. Smith, P. Ihrie, Jr.
1831.....H. King, P. Ihrie, Jr.

Northampton, Wayne, Pike and Monroe (one member).

[Carbon added when erected.]

1833.....D. D. Wagener.
1841–43.....John Westbrook.
1843–49.....Richard Brodhead.
1849–53.....M. M. Dimmick.
1853–57.....Asa Packer.
1857–61.....W. H. Dimmick.
1861–67.....Philip Johnston.[2]
1867–71.....D. M. Van Auken.
1871–75.....J. B. Storm.

Bradford, Susquehanna, Wayne and Wyoming (April 28, 1873).

1875–77.....Joseph Powell.
1877–81.....Edward Overton.
1881.....C. C. Jadwin.
1883.....George A. Post.
1885.....F. C. Bunnell.

STATE SENATORS (for districts including Wayne County).—Previous to 1836 Wayne was in districts electing two Senators, and the names of those elected are not learned with certainty.

In 1836 the District was made of Luzerne, Wayne, Pike and Monroe.

1837.—E. Kingsbury, Jr., elected for 1838, 1839, 1840 and 1841.

1841.—Luther Kidder, elected for 1842, 1843 and 1844.

In 1843 New District of Susquehanna, Wayne and Wyoming.

Asa Dimock was on unexpired term.

1845.—William H. Dimmick, elected for 1846, 1847 and 1848.

1848.—F. B. Streeter, elected for 1849, 1850 and 1851.

In 1850 New District of Wayne, Pike and Monroe.

No election for 1852.

1852.—E. W. Hamlin, elected for 1853, 1854 and 1855.

1855.—I. H. Walton, elected for 1856, 1857 and 1858.

In 1857 New District of Carbon, Monroe, Pike and Wayne.

1858.—Thomas Craig, Jr., elected for 1859, 1860 and 1861.

1861.—Henry S. Mott, elected for 1862, 1863 and 1864.

[1] Elected five terms—1803, 1805, 1807, 1809 and 1811.

[2] He died in January, 1867.

In 1864 same District renewed.

1864.—H. B. Beardslee, elected for 1865, 1866 and 1867.

1867.—Charlton Burnett, elected for 1868, 1869 and 1870.

1870.—Albert G. Brodhead, elected for 1871, 1872 and 1873.

In 1871 New District of Bradford, Susquehanna, Wayne and Wyoming.

1871.—Lafayette Fitch, elected for 1872, 1873 and 1874.

In 1874 New District of Wayne and Susquehanna.

1874.—W. W. Watson, elected for 1875 and 1876.

1876.—Eugene Hawley, elected for 1877 and 1878.

1878.—William M. Nelson, elected for 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882.

1882.—William M. Nelson, elected for 1883, 1884, 1885 and 1886.

REPRESENTATIVES IN LEGISLATURE.—Previous to the erection of Wayne County, (1798) its territory was part of Northampton, and by the last preceding apportionment, Northampton was entitled to four members. After Wayne was erected, it was generally understood that Wayne should have one of the Representatives. The following were elected from Wayne:

1798, 1799 and 1800.—John Coolbaugh, of Wayne, was elected.

1801–2.—Richard Brodhead, of Wayne.

1803.—John Coolbaugh.

1804–5.—The people of Wayne did not agree on a candidate, and all four members were from Northampton.

1806.—John Coolbaugh.

1807.—No member from Wayne, the people being divided.

1808, 1809, 1810, 1811, 1812 and 1813.—Daniel W. Dingman.

1814.—No member from Wayne. Pike was now erected, and Wayne and Pike were expected to have one member.

1815–16.—John Brodhead, of Pike.

1817, 1818, 1819, 1820 and 1821.—Isaac Dimmick, of Wayne.

1822–23.—N. B. Eldred, of Wayne.

1824–25.—William Overfield, of Pike.

1826–27.—N. B. Eldred, of Wayne.

1828–29.—William Overfield, of Pike.

1830–31.—Thomas Fuller, of Wayne.

1832–33.—John Westbrook, of Pike.

1834–35.—N. A. Woodward, of Wayne.

(Wayne and Pike were made a district alone, with one member).

1836–37.—Oliver S. Dimmick, of Pike.

1838–39.—E. W. Hamlin, of Wayne.

1840–41.—John H. Brodhead, of Pike.

1842–43.—George Bush, of Wayne.

1844–45.—Richard Eldred, of Pike.

1846–47.—Pope Bushnell, of Wayne.

1848.—John W. George, of Pike.

1849.—Thomas E. Grier, of Wayne.

(Wayne alone was made a district).

1850.—Calvely Freeman.

1851.—Thomas J. Hubbell.

1852.—Richard Lancaster.

1853.—F. M. Crane.

1854.—Otis Avery.

1855–56.—Nathaniel W. Vail.

1857–58.—H. L. Stephens.

1859.—H. B. Beardslee.

1860.—A. B. Walker.

1861.—F. M. Crane.

1863–64.—William M. Nelson.

(Wayne and Pike were joined in a district).

1864–65.—William M. Nelson (Wayne).

1866–67.—Lafayette Westbrook (Pike).

1868.—William M. Nelson (Wayne.

1869.—William H. Dimmick (Wayne).

1870.—David A. Wells (Pike).

1871 and 1872.—J. Howard Beach (Wayne).

1873.—William H. Dimmick, Wayne. (He resigned and Thomas Y. Boyd was elected to the vacancy.)

[An apportionment under the revised Constitution gave Wayne two members, to be elected for two years' terms.]

1874.—Thomas Y. Boyd and W. W. Mumford.

1876.—William M. Nelson and A. B. Howe.

1878.—A. B. Gammell and N. F. Underwood.

1880.—Philip Ridley and James Millham.

1882.—Philip Ridley and C. S. Gardner.

1884.—E. B. Hardenbergh and W. B. Guinnip.

SHERIFFS.—Previous to 1839, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of 1790, two persons were to be elected by the people, one of whom was to be appointed and commissioned by the Governor.

Name of Candidate Elected who Received Commission.

1798.....Richard Brodhead.
1801.....Daniel W. Dingman.
1804.....Abraham Mulford.
1807.....Abisha Woodward.
1810.....Matthew Ridgway.
1813.....Silas Kellogg.
1816.....Salmon Jones.
1819.....Solomon Moore.
1822.....Oliver B. Brush.
1825.....Joseph Miller.
1828.....Paul S. Preston.
1831.....Lucius Collins.
1834.....Joseph Miller.
1837.....Lucius Collins.
1840.....Richard Lancaster.

1843.....John McIntosh.
1846.....William F. Wood.
1849.....Oliver Stevenson.
1852.....Thomas E. Grier.
1855.....James B. Eldred.
1858.....William Turner.
1861.....Robert S. Dorin.
1864.....Jeremiah F. Barnes.
1867.....Robert S. Dorin.
1870.....John R. Ross.

1876.....Perry A. Clark.
1879.....Joseph Atkinson.

PROTHONOTARY, CLERK OF COURTS, RECORDER OF DEEDS AND REGISTER OF WILLS.—Previous to 1839 these offices were part of the Governor's patronage and were sometimes all given to one person, and at other times divided between two or more persons. The limit to the term of office was usually stated in the commissions, as "until this appointment and commission shall be by me, or other lawful authority, superseded and annulled."

The appointees in Wayne County were as in the following statement:

John Broadhead, appointed by Governor Mifflin, March, 1798, to all the offices; reappointed by Governor McKean, January, 1800, to all the offices.

John Coolbaugh, appointed by Governor Snyder, January, 1809, to all the offices.

Eliphalet Kellogg, appointed by Governor Snyder, February, 1810, to all the offices.

Sheldon Norton, appointed by Governor Findlay, February, 1818, prothonotary and clerk of court.

John K. Woodward, appointed by Governor Findlay, February, 1818, register and recorder.

Thomas Meredith, appointed by Governor Heister, February, 1821, to all the offices.

John R. Woodward, appointed by Governor Shultz, February, 1824, prothonotary and clerk of court; died April, 1825.

James Manning, appointed by Governor Shultz, February, 1824, register and recorder.

Solomon Moore, appointed by Governor Shultz, May, 1825, prothonotary and clerk of court; reappointed by Governor Wolf, January, 1830, prothonotary and clerk of court; died December, 1831.

James Manning, appointed by Governor Wolf, January, 1830, register.

Isaac P. Olmstead, appointed by Governor Wolf, January, 1830, recorder.

George B. Wescott, appointed by Governor Wolf, January, 1832, prothonotary and clerk; reappointed by Governor Wolf, January, 1833, prothonotary, clerk and register.

Isaac P. Olmstead, appointed by Governor Wolf, January 1833, recorder.

Paul S. Preston, appointed by Governor Ritner, January 1836, to all the offices.

Leonard Graves, appointed by Governor Porter, January 1839, prothonotary and clerk.

John Belknap, appointed by Governor Porter, January, 1839, register and recorder.

PROTHONOTARIES.—This office became elective in 1839; one person to be prothonotary and clerk of the courts, and another person to be register and recorder, and elected for three years. The subsequent prothonotaries, etc., were:

Leonard Graves, elected in 1839, died August, 1842; Abraham Swart, appointed August 11, 1842, to fill vacancy, re-elected in 1842; Philip G. Goodrich, elected in 1845; Rufus M. Grenell, elected in 1848; John McIntosh, elected in 1851 and 1854; William F. Wood, elected in 1857; John K. Jenkins, elected in 1860; Henry W. Brown, elected in 1863; William H. Ham, elected in 1866; J. J. Curtis, elected in 1869 and 1872; Charles J. Menna, elected in 1875 and 1878; E. R. Gaylord, elected in 1881 and 1884.

CHAPTER II.

The Bench and Bar of Wayne County—A General Sketch, with Biographies.[1]

THE COURTS AND PRESIDENT JUDGES.—The first organization of the courts of Wayne County was made under the Constitution of 1790 and the judiciary act of April 13, 1791. The Constitution established in each county "a court of common pleas, orphans' court, register's court, and a court of quarter sessions of the peace," and required the Governor to appoint, in each county, not less than three nor more than four judges. It also required a division of the State into circuits, and the appointment, by the Governor, of a president judge of the courts in each circuit. All these judges were to hold office during good behavior. The judiciary act divided the State into five "districts or circuits," of which the counties of Berks, Northampton, Luzerne and Northumberland formed the Third. It also required the Governor to appoint "a person of knowledge and integrity, skilled in the laws," in each district or circuit, as president judge of the courts therein, and "a number of other proper persons, not fewer than three, nor more than four," as judges in and for each county; and it provided that "said president and judges" should "have and execute all and singular the powers, jurisdictions and authorities of judges of the courts of common pleas, judges of the courts of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery, judges of the orphans' courts, and justices of the courts of quarter sessions of the peace, agreeably to the laws and constitution of this commonwealth."

The act of March 21, 1798, erecting the county of Wayne out of part of Northampton, provided that the new county should have "all and singular the courts, jurisdictions, officers, rights and privileges" to which other counties were entitled under the Constitution and laws of the commonwealth. It placed the county in the Third Judicial District, made the president judge of that district the president of its courts, and provided that the courts should be held at the house occupied by George Buchanan, in Milford, until the erection of a court-house.

Hon. Jacob Rush was then president judge of the Third District, having been appointed August 13, 1791. He never sat, however, in Wayne, but for eight years after the erection of the county its courts were held by the associate judges.

By act of March 20, 1799, a Circuit Court was established, to be held in each county except Philadelphia, by a justice of the Supreme Court, instead of the courts of Nisi Prius then held by justices of the Supreme Court. Besides its original jurisdiction, the Circuit Court had jurisdiction of causes, civil and criminal, removed to it from the County Courts. In March, 1809, this court was abolished.

The record shows that the first court in Wayne County was held September 10, 1798, at the house of George Buchanan (spelled also, in the record, Buckhannan and Bowhannan), in Milford, "Before Samuel Preston, John Ryerson, Samuel C. Seely and John Biddis, Esquires, Justices of the said court." The preamble and the first, second and third sections of the act erecting the county were read; also, the commissions of the judges, respectively, in the order above named, as first, second, third and fourth associate judges, and of John Brodhead as prothonotary and clerk of the courts, recorder of deeds and register of wills. Jabez Rockwell was appointed "Cryer of the Court;" four attorneys were admitted to the bar; and rules were adopted for the regulation of practice. No venire having been issued, there was neither grand or traverse jury. Some business was transacted in the Quarter Sessions. Eight recognizances for appearance, on various charges, had been returned, one of which was forfeited and the others renewed. A place was designated for the confinement of debtors and other prisoners. Fourteen persons were recommended to the Governor for licenses to keep public houses, and four applications therefor were rejected. A draft laying out the northern part of the county into six townships was approved, in compliance with "a petition subscribed with twenty-five signatures." The townships were named Buckingham, Mount Pleasant, Damascus, Palmyra, Canaan and Lackawaxen. Commissioners were appointed to run and mark the lines, and constables and supervisors of the new townships were appointed. A vacancy in the office of constable of Middle Smithfield was filled. An order was made directing repairs on the bridge at Milford. These proceedings completed, the court adjourned September 12th.

[1] Judge Henry Wilson is, in a comprehensive sense, the author of this ample and admirable chapter. The sketches of Earl Wheeler, Wm. H. Dimmick (the elder), Samuel E. Dimmick and F. M. Crane, analytical as well as biographical in character, are from the always able pen of one who knew them all intimately—Francis B. Penniman. Several other biographies have been contributed by various writers.

Judge Preston was a Quaker. On the other hand, Judge Seely had been a lieutenant in the Revolutionary army; and his judicial commission was followed, March 24, 1798, by a commission from Governor Mifflin as "Brigadier General of the brigade composed of the militia of the county of Wayne," for the term of seven years. Thus peace and war were represented side by side on the bench when the courts of Wayne County were first opened.

Daniel Stroud, the first attorney admitted, seems to have had personal as well as professional reasons for attendance. Among the recognizances returned was one for his appearance to answer a charge of assault and battery on David Litch. At the next term an indictment was found against him; he pleaded "guilty, with a protestation, etc.," and was sentenced to pay a fine of one cent and the costs. This was the first penalty ever imposed in the criminal courts of Wayne County.

The bench, also, had its personal difficulties. The first writ of fieri facias issued out of the newly-created court was against Samuel C. Seely, the third associate judge, December 27, 1798, for a debt of fifty-two pounds.

At September Term, 1799, Samuel Preston, the first associate judge, found himself in hot water. An attempt was made to indict him, in which the prime movers were Samuel Staunton, of Mt. Pleasant, and Thomas Shields, of Damascus. Their hostility grew out of the location of a road in those townships. Judge Preston, in a letter to Henry Drinker, thus describes their efforts, and the method by which they were defeated,—

"Staunton was very busy for two days. He haunted the Grand Jury incessantly, importuning them to present me to the State's attorney for a Bill, indicting me for living with a woman without being married, and for the Orphans' Court to appoint trustees to bind out my children, lest I might use them ill and they become a public charge. Several of my friends in the Grand Jury informed me, from time to time, of his pressing solicitations, and that it had no effect with the majority of them, altho' some few of his party, that I could name, were violently warm for it. He then tried to have me indicted for writing an infamous libel, as he termed it, in which he was much nearer obtaining a presentment. It was that, in a letter which I had written on electioneering subjects, I had quoted a passage from 'Dallas' Reports,' which they said proved McKean had condemned John Roberts contrary to law. I took the Book, went in among the Grand Jury, read to them the same in that as in the letter, then told them they must first indict Dallas for publishing and McKean for recommending its being read, before they did me; that the duty of my office required that I should endeavor to disseminate among them a knowledge of the laws and Decisions of Courts, more especially such as were there recommended by the man who, for his virtue and wisdom, they had selected for Governor."

The charge of "living with a woman without being married" arose from the fact that Judge Preston and wife were married according to the ceremony—or, rather, lack of ceremony—practiced by the Quakers. The judge's brethren on the bench, also, seem to have been involved in the crusade against him, for he adds,—

"It was a Court of Great Commotion. There was every wrong thing tried to either stigmatize or put me off the Bench. All the other three Judges attended for that purpose, and they intended to have had twenty-three Grand Jurymen, in order to obtain a majority of twelve against me; that I clearly foresaw. Objected to S. Staunton; he had served the Court before. John Brink and C. Jayne, Esq., the other trustees [appointed to select a county seat], prayed to have him dismissed to join their Board. There were twenty left to serve and they divided, eleven in my favor and nine against me."

Thus the judge escaped for the time.

At December Term, 1799, Jonathan Butler, a justice of the peace, was indicted for "an assault and battery on the body of John Biddis, Esquire," the fourth associate judge, but was acquitted.

At September Term, 1800, the difficulties in which Judge Preston had become involved culminated in two indictments against him. The first charged the Quaker judge with an assault and battery on Thomas Shields. He was convicted on this, but at the next term a new trial was ordered. The case was then removed to the Circuit Court, and he was there convicted of an assault, and fined twenty dollars. The second indictment was for libels published in July, 1799, on "Thomas McKean, Esquire, a good, peaceable and worthy citizen of the commonwealth, then Chief Justice, and now Governor thereof." In politics, Judge Preston was a Federalist and McKean a Republican; and the alleged libels were contained in two letters written while the latter was a candidate for Governor. The first letter charged that McKean "was born in Ireland, and is now between seventy and eighty years of age, infirm, and addicted to liquor to great excess." The second referred to the case of John Roberts (1 Dallas 39), who was tried for treason before Chief Justice McKean in September, 1778, convicted, partly on his own confession, and executed; it declared the admission of the prisoner's confession contrary to law; and strongly opposed McKean's election—"For, as David said, he has blood in his shoes;"—"Meaning," averred the indictment, "that the said Thomas had taken the life of a man unjustly." The indictment, in this case, was signed by Joseph B. McKean, attorney-general, instead of by the deputy for the county, as was customary. At December Term, 1800, it was removed to the Circuit Court, and the defendant was held in five hundred dollars bail to appear there—an unusually heavy recognizance for that day, and probably required because the offense was scandalum magnatum. Nothing more, however, appears to have been done in the case.

At December Term, 1800, "Samuel C. Seely, Esq.," the third associate judge, was indicted for "an assault and battery on the body of Abraham Mulford, Esq.," a justice of the peace; and an indictment was found against Judge Seely and Jonathan Butler for "conspiracy against Hugh Ross, Esq.," an attorney. The latter case apparently grew out of an indictment for barratry preferred against Mr. Ross at the preceding term, but returned ignoramus, and was complicated by an indictment against Mr. Ross and Abraham Cole for conspiracy against Jonathan Butler, preferred at December Term, but returned ignoramus. Judge Seely was also indicted at February Term, 1801, for keeping a tippling-house. At May Term, 1801, he was tried on the indictment for assault and battery, and acquitted. At the same term the indictment for conspiracy was removed to the Circuit Court; and among the witnesses placed under recognizance to appear and testify against Judge Seely were his associates on the bench, Judges Preston and Ryerson. The final result, in the case removed to the Circuit Court, does not appear. On the indictment for keeping a tippling-house, nothing was done beyond holding the defendant to bail in sixty dollars for his appearance. The difficulty between the judge and the attorney, however, would seem to have been amicably settled not long afterward, for at February Term, 1803, Mr. Ross was one of a committee that examined Judge Seely as an applicant for admission to practice as an attorney, and reported him as duly qualified, and May 13, 1803, the judge, having resigned his commission, was, on Mr. Ross' motion, admitted to the bar.

Even George Bowhanan, the man in whose house the courts were first held, did not escape trouble. In the summer of 1800 he was charged with forgery, and held to bail in sixty dollars for his appearance at the September Sessions. The matter ended, however, with the failure of the prosecutor, John Brink, to appear when called.

The courts were held in Milford at September and December Terms, 1798, and February Term, 1799. By act of April 1, 1799, the place for holding them was fixed at Wilsonville, until a suitable spot for a county-seat should be selected, "within four miles of the Dyberry Forks of the Lackawaxen River," and public buildings erected. Accordingly, at May Term, 1799, the courts were held at Wilsonville, and for nearly three years they remained there. By act of April 5, 1802, they were transferred to Milford, to be held there for three years and no longer. At May Term, 1802, therefore, the courts were again held at Milford. Upon the expiration of the three years, Bethany had been finally fixed on as the county-seat and public buildings erected. The first court was held there May 6, 1805, and the court-room not being quite ready for occupancy, the court sat for that day in a front room of Major Jason Torrey's residence, the judges occupying seats placed on a carpenter's work-bench. Thus "the bench," on that occasion, had a literal as well as a technical meaning.

Thus far, the business of the courts, generally, was such as required a conscientious exercise of common sense, rather than high legal attainments, on the part of the judges. The term usually occupied from two to four days. But few civil suits were brought; the criminal matters were seldom of a serious character, the greater number of indictments being for intrusion, forcible entry and detainer, assault and battery, petty larceny, and keeping tippling-houses; and the more important suits were generally tried in the Circuit Court. As population increased, however, and with it litigation, the need of a law judge in the county courts became more and more apparent, and at length measures were taken to supply the want.

By act of February 24, 1806, the State was divided into ten judicial districts; Berks, Northampton and Wayne forming the Third. This act also provided for reducing the number of associate judges in each county to two, by leaving vacancies, beyond that number, unfilled.

March 1, 1806, Gov. McKean commissioned Hon. John Spayd president judge of the Third District. Judge Spayd presided in Wayne, for the first time, May 12, 1806, and for the last time, at December Term, 1808.

July 6, 1809, Gov. Snyder commissioned Hon. Robert Porter president judge of the Third District. Judge Porter presided in Wayne, for the first time, September 4, 1809, and for the last time, at August Term, 1812.

By act of March 24, 1812, Bradford, Tioga, Wayne and Susquehanna Counties were erected into the Eleventh Judicial District, and the Governor was required to appoint a president judge for the district, the appointment to take effect after the second Tuesday of the following October. Gov. Snyder, October 16, 1812, commissioned Hon. John B. Gibson president judge of the district. Judge Gibson presided in Wayne, for the first time, February 1, 1813, and for the last time, at January Term, 1816. June 27, 1816, he resigned, and on the same day was commissioned by Gov. Snyder a justice of the Supreme Court.

Meantime, by act of March 12, 1813, Luzerne was added to the Eleventh District; and by act of March 26, 1814, Pike County was erected out of the southern portion of Wayne, and placed in the same district.

June 28, 1816, Gov. Snyder commissioned Hon. Thomas Burnside president judge of the Eleventh District. Judge Burnside presided in Wayne, for the first time, August 26, 1816, and for the last time, at January Term, 1818. July 6, 1818, he resigned. More than a quarter of a century later—January 2, 1845—he was commissioned by Gov. Shunk a justice of the Supreme Court.

By act of February 25, 1818, Susquehanna, Bradford and Tioga Counties were erected into the Thirteenth District, from and after the first Monday of July following. This left the Eleventh District composed of Luzerne, Wayne and Pike.

July 7, 1818, Hon. David Scott was commissioned by Governor Findlay president judge of the Eleventh District. He first presided in Wayne County August 24, 1818.

No further change was made in the district for eighteen years, nor in the president judgeship for nearly twenty years.

By act of April 1, 1836, Monroe County was erected out of portions of Northampton and Pike, and placed in the Eleventh Judicial District.

Judge Scott presided in Wayne, for the last time, at January Term, 1838.

By the revision and amendment of the Constitution, completed February 22, 1838, and adopted by the people at the election in October following, the terms of judges of the Supreme Court were fixed at fifteen years, of law judges of the lower courts at ten years, and of associate judges at five years; and their appointment required confirmation by the Senate.

The term of Judge Scott, by the provisions of the amended Constitution relating to judges then in commission, would expire February 27, 1839. His hearing was becoming impaired, and he decided to anticipate the expiration of his term by resigning. March 17, 1838, he sent his resignation to Governor Ritner, accompanied with a request that the vacancy should be filled by the appointment of Hon. Nathaniel B. Eldred, then president judge of the Eighteenth District. The Governor promised to make this appointment, if Judge Eldred would resign from the Eighteenth early enough to be commissioned in time to hold the April term of the courts in the Eleventh District, commencing April 2d. Receiving, however, neither resignation or other communication on the subject from Judge Eldred, after waiting until April 7th, the Governor on that day commissioned Hon. William Jessup, of Susquehanna County, president judge of the Eleventh District. Judge Jessup first presided in Wayne County April 16, 1838.

By act of April 12, 1840, taking effect from and after the 1st of the following January, Luzerne was transferred from the Eleventh District to the Thirteenth, and Susquehanna from the Thirteenth to the Eleventh. Hon. John N. Conyngham then presided in the Thirteenth, and by this transposition the residences of Judges Jessup and Conyngham were placed within their respective districts.

During Judge Jessup's term the county-seat was removed from Bethany to Honesdale. The act for this purpose was approved February 15, 1841. The erection of public buildings occupied upward of two years, and the first court was held in Honesdale September 4, 1843.

By act of April 10, 1844, Monroe was detached from the Eleventh, and united with Carbon and Schuylkill to form the Twenty-first District; leaving the Eleventh composed of Susquehanna, Wayne and Pike.

By act of April 5, 1849, Wayne, Pike, Monroe and Carbon were erected into the Twenty-second District, and the Governor was required to appoint a president judge for the new district. Governor Johnston thereupon appointed Hon. Nathaniel B. Eldred to this position, his commission bearing date April 6, 1849.

In 1850 a Constitutional amendment was adopted, making the judiciary elective; fixing the term of president judge at ten years from the first Monday of December following the election, and that of associate judge at five years; and vacating the commissions of all judges holding by appointment on the first Monday of December, 1851.

At the first election, held in October, 1851, Judge Eldred was chosen president judge of the Twenty-second District without opposition. In April, 1853, he resigned, to accept the appointment of naval officer in the Philadelphia custom-house.

A succession of contests for the judgeship followed, carried on mainly within the lines of the Democratic party, to which all the competition belonged, which was not set at rest until the general election in 1855.

For the appointment to fill the vacancy caused by Judge Eldred's resignation, the most prominent candidate was Wm. H. Dimmick, of Wayne. Wm. Bigler was then Governor. In 1846, when Mr. Bigler and Mr. Dimmick were members of the State Senate, Mr. Bigler was the Democratic caucus nominee for Speaker. Mr. Dimmick affected to support him, but finally united with other disaffected Democrats and accomplished his defeat. This circumstance was recalled when, seven years later, Mr. Dimmick became an applicant for an appointment in the gift of Mr. Bigler. A brother of Mr. Dimmick, also—Milo M. Dimmick, of Monroe—came forward as a candidate. Giving as the reason for his action an unwillingness to decide between the two brothers, the Governor, April 29, 1853, appointed his personal friend, George R. Barrett, a comparatively young lawyer of his own (Clearfield) county. The appointment was received most ungraciously, the prevailing sentiment being in favor of the selection of a judge from among the bar of the district. Personally, however, Judge Barrett made a very favorable impression, and during the year laid the foundation of a popularity that bore fruit later.

As the election approached, the opposition on the part of leading Democrats led Judge Barrett to announce his purpose not to be a candidate. At the County Conventions Wayne declared for Wm. H. Dimmick, while Pike, Monroe and Carbon pronounced in favor of his brother, Milo M. Dimmick. There was, however, a formidable opposition to the latter throughout the district, and his opponents introduced James M. Porter, of Easton, as a candidate. September 20th the "regular" Democratic Judicial Conference met at Stroudsburg, and nominated Milo M. Dimmick. On the same day, another Judicial Conference was held in the same town, by representatives of the elements in Wayne, Pike and Monroe, hostile to Mr. Dimmick, at which Mr. Porter was nominated. At the polls Mr. Dimmick received a majority of 465 in Carbon and 185 in Monroe; but the scale was turned in favor of his competitor by a majority of 966 in Wayne and 28 in Pike, giving Mr. Porter the election by a majority of 344.

In the spring of 1855, an attack of paralysis having unfitted him for the further discharge of his official duties, Judge Porter resigned. To fill the vacancy, Gov. Pollock, March 23, 1855, commissioned Hon. Thomas S. Bell, of Chester County, formerly a justice of the Supreme Court. Though Judge Bell was a distinguished jurist, and Hon. George W. Woodward, then a justice of the Supreme Court and a leading Democrat, vouched for his fealty to the Democratic party, his appointment was, for local reasons, quite as unacceptable as that of Judge Barrett had been.

Early in August, 1855, Judge Barrett announced himself as a candidate for the judgeship. In the Judicial Conference he was nominated by the votes of Wayne, Monroe and Carbon. Judge Bell received the vote of Pike, and was soon afterward led to declare himself an independent candidate. He received, however, but a slender support, and Judge Barrett was elected by a majority of about three thousand. It was nineteen years before another contest for the office took place at the polls.

In 1865 Judge Barrett was re-elected, without opposition. He had, however, never removed his family from Clearfield, and, though claiming a nominal residence in Carbon County, to meet the requirements of the law, he seldom spent more time within the district than was necessary for the discharge of his official duties. This created much dissatisfaction, and, upon receiving the re-nomination in 1865, he declared his intention of complying with the law by taking up his residence in the district. He never did this, however; and his attachment to his home in Clearfield proved so strong that, rather than abandon it, he at length resigned the judgeship. This occurred early in 1870, and he was at once re-commissioned to fill the vacancy caused by his own resignation, until the election of his successor.

In September, 1870, Samuel S. Dreher, of Stroudsburg, was nominated by the Democratic Judicial Conference. The Republicans, also, supported him, and he was elected without opposition.

In 1873, the Constitutional Convention having adopted, in the article on the judiciary, a provision making separate judicial districts of counties having a population of forty thousand, and the population of Wayne and Pike being somewhat in excess of this number, the project of erecting these two counties into a separate district was broached. But Judge Dreher was held in such high esteem, and the uncertainty as to who might succeed him was such, that this measure at first received little support. At the December Term of court in Wayne, however, Judge Dreher, calling the members of the bar informally together, assured them that he should not view it as in any sense a reflection on himself should they desire a division of the district, and expressed his wish that they should feel no constraint on the subject, so far as it might affect him. The new Constitution was soon afterward adopted, and by the judicial apportionment act of April 9, 1874, Wayne and Pike were erected into the Twenty-second District, and Monroe and Carbon into the Forty-third. Judge Dreher decided to remain in the Forty-third, and accordingly retained the president judgeship of that district, as provided by the Constitution. The president judgeship of the Twenty-second District should then have been filled by appointment until the beginning of the new judicial term, which the new Constitution had fixed at ten years from the first Monday of January. But the bar was divided on the subject, and several candidates were presented. Unwilling to make a selection among them, Governor Hartranft made no appointment, and Judge Dreher continued to perform the duties of the office until the close of the judicial year.

In 1874 another contest for the judgeship arose, which was conducted mainly on party lines. The Democrats of the district were unable to unite on a candidate; Hon. Wm. H. Dimmick (the younger) being presented by Wayne, and Hon. Daniel M. Van Auken by Pike, and each county insisting on the nomination of its candidate. During the deadlock between the two counties, Hon. Frederick M. Crane, a Democrat, of Wayne, entered the field as an independent candidate, with a large support, chiefly from his own party. Meantime the Republicans of both counties nominated Charles P. Waller, of Wayne. On the 13th of October, just three weeks previous to the election, Mr. Dimmick withdrew, and the Democratic Judicial Conference thereupon nominated Mr. Van Auken as the candidate of the party. The contest being thus between three candidates, Mr. Waller received a plurality of the votes cast, and was duly commissioned for the ensuing term.

The vote in the district was as follows:

	Waller.	Crane.	Van Auken.
Wayne	2377	1770	530
Pike	204	406	716

Judge Waller died August 18, 1882. August 28, 1882, Gov. Hoyt commissioned Hon. Henry M. Seely to fill the vacancy; the Republican members of the bar having united in recommending him, while the Democratic members, for the most part, declined to act in the matter. The vacancy having occurred within three months of the general election in October following, Judge Seely was commissioned until the first Monday of January, 1884.

In 1883 the Republicans of the district opened the canvass by nominating Judge Seely by acclamation. The Democrats again encountered the difficulty they had experienced in 1874, Wayne presenting George S. Purdy, and Pike again declaring in favor of Hon. Daniel M. Van Auken. The result was a split in the Judicial Conference; both candidates remained in the field, and Judge Seely was elected by a plurality of the votes cast.

The vote in the district was as follows:

	Seely.	Purdy.	Van Auken.
Wayne	2694	2820	124
	3210	2949	989

THE ASSOCIATE JUDGES.—March 22, 1798, Gov. Mifflin commissioned Samuel Preston "to be one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas in and for the said county of Wayne; hereby giving and granting unto you, as first Associate Judge, full right and title to have and execute all and singular the powers, jurisdictions and authorities, and to receive and enjoy all and singular the lawful emoluments of a Judge of the said court," etc. The Governor also commissioned John Ryerson, Samuel C. Seely and John Biddis, on the same day and in the same form, except that their powers were given and granted unto them as "second," "third" and "fourth" associate judges, respectively, in the order named.

The commissions of their successors, for forty years, were in the same form, except that the powers of each were given and granted to him "as Associate Judge," no designation as to seniority being necessary. Since the Constitutional revision of 1838 the incumbent of the office has been commissioned simply "to be Associate Judge" of the court, etc.

March 30, 1803, Judge Ryerson was removed from office by Gov. McKean, and March 31, 1803, Richard Brodhead was commissioned in his place.

May 13, 1803, Judge Seely resigned, and on the same day was admitted to practice as an attorney. No appointment of a successor was made.

Some time subsequent to February Term, 1804, Judge Preston resigned; and April 3, 1804, Gov. McKean commissioned John Brink as his successor.

Upon the retirement of Judge Preston, and the appointment of Judge Brink, all three of the associate judges were residents of Milford or its vicinity.

Judge Preston, after leaving the bench, sought to become a member of the bar, but was less successful than his late associate, Judge Seely. May 8, 1805, a motion for his admission as "an attorney to the Barr" was made by George Griffin, and a committee was appointed to examine him. The next day, "on report of said committee, the Court delay further proceedings until the next term." So far as the record shows, the matter ended here.

In 1806, some time subsequent to February Term, Judge Biddis died. The act of February 24, 1806, having provided for reducing the number of associate judges to two, by prohibiting appointments beyond that number, his death left no vacancy to be filled.

Judges Brodhead and Brink continued in office until the act erecting Pike County took effect, October 1, 1814, when, as they resided in Milford, they became residents of the new county. They occupied the bench in Wayne, for the last time, at August Term, 1814.

October 14, 1814, Gov. Snyder commissioned Samuel Stanton, of Mt. Pleasant, and Abisha Woodward, of Bethany, associate judges of Wayne County; and at the same time commissioned John Coolbaugh, of Middle Smithfield, and Daniel W. Dingman, of Delaware, associate judges of Pike.

October 18, 1815, Judge Stanton resigned. November 17, 1815, Governor Snyder commissioned Moses Thomas, of Damascus, as his successor. Judge Thomas remained in office for nearly twenty-five years.

November 27, 1829, Judge Woodward died. December 7, 1829, Governor Shulze commissioned Isaac Dimmick, of Dyberry, as his successor.

In October, 1833, Judge Dimmick resigned. October 31, 1833, Governor Wolf commissioned James Manning, of Bethany, as his successor.

By the classification of associate judges, made by the act of June 20, 1839, as required by the amended Constitution of 1838, the term of Judge Thomas expired February 27, 1840, and that of Judge Manning, February 27, 1842. Governor Porter commissioned Moses Tyler, of Damascus, February 27, 1840, and Virgil Grennell, of Clinton, February 27, 1842, as the successors of the retiring judges.

March 11, 1845, Governor Shunk commissioned Oliver Hamlin, of Honesdale, to succeed Judge Tyler; and July 22, 1847, he re-commissioned Judge Grennell.

In February, 1848, Judge Grennell resigned. February 9, 1848, Governor Shunk commissioned James Mumford, of Preston, as his successor.

March 12, 1850, Governor Johnston commissioned Paul S. Preston, of Buckingham, a son of the first Judge Preston, to succeed Judge Hamlin, whose term had expired. After holding the office for about a year, Judge Preston resigned. March 18, 1851, Governor Johnston commissioned John Torrey, of Honesdale, as Judge Preston's successor; Judge Torrey's commission, by the Constitutional amendment of 1850, expiring on the first Monday of December, 1851.

The first election under the Constitutional amendment making the judiciary elective was held in October, 1851. The associate judges then chosen were Judge Mumford and Thomas H. R. Tracy, their terms commencing on the first Monday of December following.

May 5, 1856, Judge Tracy died. May 15, 1856, Governor Pollock commissioned Francis B. Penniman, of Honesdale, as his successor, until the first Monday of December following. The term of Judge Mumford expiring at the same time, James R. Dickson, of Honesdale, and Phineas Howe, of Sterling, were chosen at the October election, in 1856, for the ensuing terms.

In the autumn of 1860, Judge Howe resigned, his resignation taking effect December 1st. Dr. Rodney Harmes, of Mount Pleasant, was appointed his successor, and commissioned by Governor Packer until the first Monday of December, 1861. The term of Judge Dickson expiring at the same time, Butler Hamlin, of Salem, and Wm. R. McLaury, of Texas, were chosen at the election in October, 1861, for the ensuing terms.

In October, 1866, Phineas Arnold, of Prompton, and Isaiah Snyder, of Honesdale, were elected for the terms commencing on the first Monday of December following.

In October, 1871, Judge Arnold was re-elected. At the same time Friend B. Moss, of Salem, was elected, but he declined to serve. Governor Geary thereupon commissioned Dr. Otis Avery, of Honesdale, as his successor, until the first Monday of December, 1872.

Judge Arnold died January 19, 1872. Jan. 27, 1872, Governor Geary commissioned Frederick W. Farnham, of White Mills, as his successor, until the first Monday of the following December.

At the election in October, 1872, Judge Avery and John O'Neill, of Honesdale, were chosen for the ensuing terms. January 16, 1876, Judge O'Neill died. January 27, 1876, Governor Hartranft appointed Henry Wilson, of Honesdale, as his successor, and, pursuant to the Constitution of 1873, Judge Wilson was commissioned until the first Monday of January, 1877.

In November, 1876, Giles Greene, of Salem, was chosen for the ensuing term.

In November, 1877, Judge Avery was re-elected.

In November, 1881, Michael Brown, of Honesdale, was elected.

In November, 1882, Lorenzo Grambs, of Honesdale, was elected. In May, 1884, in consequence of ill health, he tendered his resignation, to take effect June 1st. June 18, 1884, Governor Pattison commissioned Elisha P. Strong, of Starucca, his successor, until the first Monday of January, 1885. At the election in November, 1884, Judge Strong was chosen for the ensuing term.

Terms of Court.—Since the judicial organization of the county frequent changes have been made in the times for holding the courts, and the terms have been fixed in every month of the year except June and July.

At the present time the terms commence on the first Mondays of March, May, October and December, and continue for two weeks, unless otherwise ordered. Since the beginning of the present year (1886) the grand jury has met on the Monday next preceding the term.

The second Monday of each month in which a regular term does not occur is designated as a motion day, at which the argument list is usually taken up, motions are heard and other matters requiring action by the court at that time are disposed of.

The Bar.—Among the records of the first court held in Wayne County, the beginning of the bar is thus set forth:

"September 10, 1798, on motion of Daniel Stroud, Esq., stating to the Court that he had been admitted to practice as an attorney of the courts in Northampton, and such being known by the Court here, he is admitted and affirmed an attorney of this court."

Mr. Stroud then moved the admission of John Ross and William A. Patterson, of the Northampton bar. Mr. Ross was accordingly "admitted and affirmed," while Mr. Patterson was "admitted and sworn." Mr. Patterson then moved the admission of Job S. Halstead, of the Northampton bar, and Mr. Halstead was "admitted and sworn."

At December Term, 1798, five attorneys were admitted to practice, and at February Term, 1799, three. Thenceforth admissions became less frequent. There was one at September Term, 1799, and one at December Term following. During the succeeding three years there was one annually; in 1803, there were three; in 1804, none; in 1805, one. Some degree of caution appears to have been exercised in the admission of applicants; for at February Term, 1805, Jesse Brush, as the record shows, was "admitted on motion and argument"; and at May Term following, the application of Judge Preston for admission as an attorney, after his resignation from the bench, was unsuccessful, notwithstanding the precedent in the admission of Judge Seely two years earlier. From the beginning of 1806 until the close of 1811 there were eight admissions, and but one thereafter until 1816. In the latter year there were three; in 1817, four; and thenceforward scarcely a year passed without the admission of one or more attorneys.

Dan Dimmick was the first attorney who made his home in the new county. He was a native of Connecticut; read law and was admitted to practice in that State; was admitted to the bar of Wayne in 1802, and commenced practice in Milford.

Most of those admitted prior to the erection of Pike were non-residents. Whether any of them had pursued their studies for the bar within the county cannot now be ascertained. The early records, in some instances, show admission "on examination and report of committee;" but this is no certain indication that the person admitted was a resident student, since attorneys from other States were subjected to some form of examination. The first to prepare for the bar within the present limits of Wayne County was Thomas Fuller, admitted in 1826. During the next fifteen years three more—Wm. H. Dimmick, Charles K. Silkman and Milton Dimmick—studied for the profession in Wayne, but only the first-named remained to practice.

Though the requirements for admission were nominally sufficient, it is impossible to say how high, during this period, the standard was practically maintained. Enough appears of record, however, to show that admission, after the prescribed period of study, was not always of course. Mr. Silkman, after studying from January, 1834, to April, 1836, was recommended by the examining committee—consisting of Amzi Fuller, George W. Woodward and Ebenezer Kingsbury—"to pursue a further course of reading previous to his admission." On his next application, in November, 1837, the committee, referring to their previous report, added: "The applicant having complied with their recommendation, they now believe him to be sufficiently grounded in the principles of the law to entitle him to admission, and recommend him accordingly." He was thereupon admitted, November 21, 1837.

With the removal of the county-seat to Honesdale a rapid increase in the number of resident students began; and for forty-five years thereafter the admission of those who had studied for the profession within the county proceeded at an average rate of about one and a quarter annually.

Of the two hundred and thirty-four attorneys on the court roll, but little more than one-third ever resided within the present limits of the county. Of the non-residents, some half-score habitually practiced in the courts of Wayne for a decade or more after Pike was detached, and a few for a longer period; others attended irregularly; while the larger number appeared only on the occasion of their admission. Of those having a residence in the county, a score, or thereabouts, failing of success at the bar, found other employment, or were so largely engaged in other pursuits as to be little more than nominally members of the profession. A still larger number, having completed their preparation and been admitted, went elsewhere to begin professional life, or, having commenced practice, sooner or later found the prospect of success unsatisfactory and removed from the county. Of those who continued to follow the profession in the county, eleven died while in practice, three retired after long terms of professional labor, three became president judges, and twenty are still at the bar, more or less actively engaged in practice.

Non-Resident Attorneys.—Among the leading non-resident attorneys, whose practice antedated the division of the county, were Daniel Stroud, Samuel Sitgreaves, George Wolf, John Ross and Hugh Ross, of Northampton; Dan Dimmick and Edward Mott, of Pike; and Roswell Wells and Garrick Mallery, of Luzerne. Among those admitted to the bar of Wayne within a decade after the erection of Pike, were Charles Catlin, of Susquehanna, and George Dennison, Oristus Collins and John N. Conyngham, of Luzerne. Among those of a later day, were George W. Woodward, Hendrick B. Wright, Luther Kidder, Warren J. Woodward and Henry M. Fuller, of Luzerne; and Franklin Lusk, Joseph T. Richards and Wm. Jessup, of Susquehanna. Of these, George Wolf subsequently became Governor of the State; Messrs. Mallery, Collins, Conyngham, Kidder and Jessup, president judges; George W. Woodward and Warren J. Woodward, president judges, and the former also chief justice and the latter a justice of the Supreme Court.

Resident Attorneys.—Milford having been designated as the place at which the courts should be held, pending the selection of a county-seat, it was naturally the point at which the bar of the new county began to establish itself. Neither the transfer of the courts to Wilsonville nor the removal of the seat of justice to Bethany made any immediate change in this respect. Not one of the attorneys admitted to the bar prior to the erection of Pike County made his residence in the territory now composing Wayne. Sanford Clark, admitted at Milford in 1799, did, indeed, remove to Mount Pleasant within two years after the county was divided; but on changing his residence he abandoned the profession, and took up the occupations of inn-keeper and farmer. His last appearance of record was September 18, 1816. Hence, though a resident of the county and an attorney, he was not a resident attorney. It was not until eleven years after the first court was held at Bethany—and two years after Milford was placed in another county, by the erection of Pike—that members of the bar began to make their homes within the present limits of Wayne, for the purpose of practicing law.

The pioneers of the profession in the territory now composing Wayne County were Andrew M. Dorrance, Amzi Fuller and Nathaniel B. Eldred. Messrs. Dorrance and Fuller were natives of Connecticut. The former was first admitted to the bar in that State; the latter studied for the profession in Milford. Mr. Dorrance was admitted to the bar of Wayne County in April, and Mr. Fuller in August, 1816, and both thereupon commenced practice in Bethany. In the spring of 1818, Mr. Dorrance died. Mr. Eldred was a native of Orange County, N. Y., read law in Milford and was admitted to the bar of Wayne County in January, 1817. Soon after the death of Mr. Dorrance he established himself in Bethany. For eight years thereafter Messrs. Fuller and Eldred were the only practicing attorneys residing in the county. In August, 1826, Thomas Fuller, a younger brother of Amzi, was admitted, and opened an office in Bethany. In 1829, George B. Wescott and John D. Taylor, of the Philadelphia bar, were added to the list of resident attorneys. They were chiefly employed, however, as land agents for Philadelphia owners. About the year 1831, Earl Wheeler, of the Susquehanna County bar, removed to Bethany. Some two years later Ebenezer Kingsbury, of Susquehanna County, and Charles K. Robinson, an attorney from the State of New York, were admitted to the Wayne County bar. Mr. Kingsbury had read law and been admitted to practice in Susquehanna; but he came to Wayne mainly for the purpose of taking editorial charge of the Wayne County Herald and Bethany Inquirer, the Democratic organ of the county, published at Honesdale. In 1835, Mr. Eldred was appointed president judge of the Eighteenth Judicial District, composed of the counties of Potter, McKean, Warren and Jefferson. In 1836, Wm. H. Dimmick, who had come from Milford and read law with Judge Eldred, was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Bethany. In the same year Mr. Wescott died. In 1837, Mr. Taylor removed from the county. In 1838, Mr. Kingsbury was elected to the State Senate for a term of four years. In 1839, John I. Allen, who had read law in the State of New York, was admitted to practice. He was the last attorney who took up his residence in the county prior to the removal of the county-seat to Honesdale; F. M. Crane, though admitted in 1840, not making Wayne County his home until 1844. Mr. Allen, however, soon became interested in journalism and polities, and made the practice of law but a secondary pursuit.

Thus, during the first quarter of a century beginning with the admission of Mr. Dorrance, eleven attorneys commenced practice in the county. Four of them, however,—Messrs. Wescott, Taylor, Kingsbury and Allen,—were engaged mainly in other avocations, and gave little attention to professional business. At the close of this period two had died, one had removed from the county, one had been appointed to the bench and one had been elected State Senator; leaving in active practice but five, viz.: Amzi and Thomas Fuller, Earl Wheeler, Charles K. Robinson and Wm. H. Dimmick. The bar had grown at the net rate of one in five years. Its increase in numbers during the next quarter of a century was more rapid. Its elements, however, were continually shifting, as a large proportion of those who commenced practice sooner or later removed from the county or turned to other callings, and few of those who pursued their legal studies in the county remained long after admission. During this period thirty-one attorneys commenced practice in the county, viz.: F. M. Crane, Ira Vadakin, S. G. Throop, Frederick Saxton, Elias Griswold, Hiram Blois, C. P. Waller, R. M. Grenell, J. M. Alexander, C. S. Minor, Jacob A. Kanouse, Joseph D. West, H. B Beardslee, S. E. Dimmick, John W. Myers, James H. Norton, M. C. Tracy, G. G. Waller, Wm. Minor, Jackson Woodward, Ebenezer Richardson, Francis Drake, Henry Peet, E. O. Hamlin, George W. Allen, H. M. Seely, Marshal Wheeler, C. F. Eldred, W. H. Dimmick, Thomas Hawkey and George F. Bentley. Three of these were also engaged more or less in journalism. Mr. Beardslee for fourteen years published the Wayne County Herald, giving little attention to the practice of law; and Messrs. Myers and Norton were for shorter periods connected with the same paper. On the semi-centennial of the beginning of a resident bar but eleven of the thirty-one remained in practice, viz: F. M. Crane, C. P. Waller, C. S. Minor, S. E. Dimmick, G. G. Waller, E. Richardson, H. M. Seely, C. F. Eldred, W. H. Dimmick, Thomas Hawkey and G. F. Bentley. Messrs. Woodward and Drake were dead; Mr. Beardslee was in the State Senate, and absorbed in politics; Messrs. Blois, Throop, Geo. W. Allen and Marshall Wheeler had given up the profession; and the remainder had left the county. Of the bar formed during the first quarter of a century, none remained but Judge Eldred and Earl Wheeler,—the former of whom had wholly and the latter largely retired from active professional life.

During the twenty years that followed, twenty-five attorneys entered upon practice in the county, viz.: M. Regan, F. A. Dony, M. M. Thorp, H. F. Power, F. B. Brown, G. S. Purdy, P. P. Smith, W. H. Lee, L. G. Dimock, E. C. Mumford, H. Wilson, D. H. Brown, H. Greene, W. Dickinson, W. J. Tracy, J. B. Dimmick, A. T. Searle, F. M. Monaghan, O. L. Rowland, J. J. O'Neill, C. A. McCarty, M. M. Treadwell, J. J. McCarty, F. P. Kimble and M. E. Simons. Ten of these, after following the profession for a time, dropped from the roll of resident attorneys. Messrs. Regan, F. B. Brown, D. H. Brown, Dickinson, Dimmick and O'Neill removed from the county, Mr. Dony entered the ministry, Messrs. Thorp and Dimock sought other pursuits, and Mr. Power, having given up the profession a few years after his admission, died in 1882. May 3, 1886, R. M. Stocker was admitted to the bar and commenced practice.

Of those having a place, either transient or permanent, among resident attorneys, the following, named in the order of their admission to the bar of the county, died while in practice, viz.: Andrew M. Dorrance, Thomas Fuller, George B. Wescott, Ebenezer Kingsbury, Chas. K. Robinson, William H. Dimmick (the elder), Frederick M. Crane, Samuel E. Dimmick, Jackson Woodward, Francis Drake and George F. Bentley. John I. Allen, George W. Allen and H. F. Power died after quitting the profession. Amzi Fuller, Nathaniel B. Eldred and Earl Wheeler retired after a long period of professional labor and died a few years later. Charles P. Waller died while president judge. Henry M. Seely became Judge Waller's successor on the bench. Edward O. Hamlin retired from active professional duties in June, 1885, in consequence of impaired health, after more than thirty years of labor at the bar and on the bench. The remainder removed from the county or left the profession for other employments, except the following, named in the order of their admission to the bar of the county, who are still in practice, viz.: Charles S. Minor, George G. Waller, Ebenezer Richardson, Henry Wilson, William H. Dimmick (the younger), George S. Purdy, Peter P. Smith, William H. Lee, Elwin C. Mumford, Homer Greene, William J. Tracy, Alonzo T. Searle, Francis M. Monaghan, Orville L. Rowland, Charles A. McCarty, M. M. Treadwell, James J. McCarty, Frank P. Kimble, Myron E. Simons and Rhamanthus M. Stocker. All of these reside in Honesdale, except Messrs. Richardson and Treadwell, who are residents of Hawley.

As the resident bar formed in Wayne, after the erection of Pike, was composed at the outset of two young men but recently admitted to practice, much of the legal business of the county naturally remained in the hands of the older and more experienced lawyers who had practiced at its bar before the territory was divided. But as the resident attorneys gained in numbers, in experience and in public confidence, the employment of non-residents gradually fell away, and it became comparatively rare soon after Messrs. Crane, Minor, the Wallers and S. E. Dimmick came to the bar. Among the last non-resident attorneys to cease practice in Wayne were Franklin Lusk and Judge Jessup, of Susquehanna, and Judge Collins and Henry M. Fuller, of Luzerne. In practice in Wayne, Mr. Lusk had usually been associated with Mr. Crane, Judge Collins with Charles P. Waller, and Mr. Fuller with Joseph D. West. As late as September, 1854, Judges Collins and Jessup appeared, associated with C. P. and G. G. Waller, in behalf of the defense, on the trial of Timothy Grady for arson.

The bar of the county, though not large, has long ranked high in professional ability. It has furnished three president judges and an attorney-general of the State. Under the rules adopted at September Term, 1798, the preparation for the bar consisted of three years' study under the direction of an attorney, or two years' study after reaching the age of twenty-one—the last year to be passed in the office of a resident attorney. A good moral character was a further requisite; and the unanimous approval of the examining committee was necessary to admission. These continued the requirements until December Term, 1876, when the period of study was raised from two years to three, with a proviso that graduation with the degree of A. B., from any institution authorized to confer such degree, should be deemed equivalent to one year of study. September 10, 1883, a further amendment was adopted, requiring a preliminary examination, previous to registry as a student, "in all the branches of a good English education, English composition, general history and particularly English and American history." Both preliminary and final examinations are made by a standing committee, now consisting of the three oldest members of the bar—Messrs. Minor, Waller and Wilson.

Law Students.—For a long time comparatively few of those who had prepared for the bar in Wayne County remained to practice for any considerable period; and forty years after the admission of the first resident student, those who had read law in the county composed but half of the resident bar. Thereafter the proportion steadily increased; and of the resident attorneys in practice twenty years later, three-fourths had studied for the profession in the county.

For twenty-five years after the admission of the first resident attorney but four students prepared for the bar in Wayne County, viz.: Thomas Fuller, Wm. H. Dimmick, Charles K. Silkman and Milton Dimmick. Of these, only Thomas Fuller and William H. Dimmick remained to practice; the others removed from the county. During the next quarter of a century twenty-eight pursued the study of law in the county and were admitted to the bar, viz.: Ira Vadakin, Hiram Blois, R. M. Grenell, J. M. Alexander, Joseph D. West, H. B. Beardslee, S. E. Dimmick, John W. Myers, Milton C. Tracy, William Minor, Jackson Woodward, E. Richardson, Francis Drake, Henry Peet, E. O.

Hamlin, Ara Bartlett, Albert Willis, M. J. Slocum, George W. Edgett, George W. Allen, Jason Torrey, Marshal Wheeler, Henry Box, C. F. Eldred, John P. Heath, William H. Dimmick (the younger), Thomas Hawkey and Geo. F. Bentley. At the close of this period but six of the number remained in practice, viz.: S. E. Dimmick, E. Richardson, C. F. Eldred, Wm. H. Dimmick, Thomas Hawkey and George F. Bentley. Messrs. Woodward and Drake had died; Messrs. Blois and Wheeler had given up the profession; Mr. Beardslee was devoted to politics, had been elected to the State Senate, and was but nominally a member of the bar; and the remainder had removed from the county. Thomas Fuller and Wm. H. Dimmick (the elder), previously admitted, had died. The years following, down to May, 1886, witnessed a greater proportionate development of staying power among resident students. During this period twenty-seven were admitted, viz.: Geo. V. Brower, Michael Regan, F. A. Dony, T. F. Ham, H. H. Ham, H. F. Power, F. B. Brown, Wm. W. Johnson, Geo. S. Purdy, Q. A. Gates, P. P. Smith, Wm. H. Lee, L. G. Dimock, E. C. Mumford, D. H. Brown, Homer Greene, John F. Wood, Wm. J. Tracy, J. B. Dimmick, A. T. Searle, F. M. Monaghan, O. L. Rowland, James J. O'Neill, Charles A. McCarty, M. M. Treadwell, Frank P. Kimble and R. M. Stocker. In May, 1886, thirteen of the number remained in practice, viz.: Messrs. Purdy, Smith, Lee, Mumford, Greene, Tracy, Searle, Monaghan, Rowland, McCarty, Treadwell, Kimble and Stocker; together with E. Richardson and Wm. H. Dimmick, resident students previously admitted. Messrs. Dony, Power, F. B. Brown and Dimock had given up the profession, and the remainder had removed from the county. Of those previously admitted, S. E. Dimmick, Thomas Hawkey and George F. Bentley had died, and C. F. Eldred had removed from the county.

The only resident attorneys in May, 1886, whose preparation for the bar was not made in Wayne County, were Messrs. Minor, Waller, Wilson, J. J. McCarty and Simons; and of these, Messrs. McCarty and Simons were natives of the county.

The Commonwealth's Attorneys.—Down to the middle of the present century the prosecutions on the part of the commonwealth in the county courts were conducted by deputies appointed by the attorney-general. By act of May 3, 1850, this office was made elective under the title of district attorney, and the term fixed at three years, commencing the first Monday of December. By the Constitution of 1873 the commencement of the term was changed to the first Monday of January following the election.

No record appears to have been kept in the attorney-general's office of the appointments of deputy attorney-general for the several counties, and in only a few instances does the record in Wayne County show even the fact of a deputation being filed. Hence it has been found impossible to ascertain the dates of these appointments for the county. The nearest approach possible has been made by a careful examination of the indictments during the fifty-two years preceding the first election of district attorney, the signatures to these showing when each attorney-general began the discharge of his duties. At times in the early history of the courts there appears to have been no deputy, and the indictments were signed by the attorney-general; but whether he attended in person cannot be ascertained. In some instances an attorney acted as deputy under a temporary appointment by the court.

Following is a list of the persons holding the appointment of deputy attorney-general and the office of district attorney, with the time of commencing the performance of official duties:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

The subjects of the following biographical notices are divided into four classes, viz.:

I. Attorneys of the county who have become president judges of its courts.

II. Resident attorneys in permanent practice, including those who followed the profession during life or the period of active professional labor; including, also, Judge Collins, who was reared in the county, and, though a non-resident, practiced in its courts for some thirty years.

III. Attorneys in temporary practice, including those who, after entering on practice in the county, gave it up or removed.

IV. Law graduates, including those who prepared for the bar in the county, but, after admission, went elsewhere to commence practice.

In the biographical sketches, descriptions of personal or professional characteristics are confined to the president judges and resident attorneys who have been for more than ten years at the bar.

I. President Judges.

NATHANIEL BAILY ELDRED, the first president judge appointed from the bar of Wayne County, was born at Dolsontown, Orange County, N. Y., January 12, 1795. His early education was such as the local schools afforded, supplemented by a diligent reading of all books that fell into his hands. While yet a boy he formed the purpose of becoming a lawyer, and about the year 1811 went to Milford, then the county-seat of Wayne, to begin the work of preparation. He first entered the office of Dan Dimmick, one of the leading lawyers of the county, and subsequently completed his studies under the direction of Edward Mott, deputy attorney-general for the county. Before his course of legal study was finished the county was divided, and Milford became the county-seat of Pike. January 27, 1817, he was admitted to the bar of Wayne. He continued, however, to reside at Milford until after the death of Andrew M. Dorrance, the senior of the two lawyers then practicing at the county-seat of Wayne, in April, 1818. Thereupon he took up his residence and commenced practice in Bethany, which remained his home for the greater part of the next half-century.

In thus commencing life, Mr. Eldred was favored with no advantages except those bestowed by nature. Those, however, were sufficient to win rapid advancement, especially in a community which recognized no conventional standards or artificial distinctions. His mental constitution was a rare combination of sturdy personal qualities, quick intelligence, keen powers of observation, generous impulses, rigid integrity and a ready adaptability to surrounding conditions. He rapidly gained the appreciation and confidence of the people of the county, both as a lawyer and a man; and in 1822, four years after he had come among them a stranger, he was elected to the Legislature. In the following year he was re-elected.

Under the system of rotation in the district that prevailed, the nominees were selected from Pike County for the next two years. When it again fell to Wayne to secure the candidate, Mr. Eldred was re-elected for two terms more. His fourth year's service completed, he declined a subsequent nomination. Later, when the system of public improvements constructed by the State was put in operation, he accepted the position of canal commissioner, but declined a second term. He was also a member of the board of commissioners appointed by the State —Hon. John Ross and Hon. David Scott being his associates—to treat with a like board appointed by the State of New Jersey in relation to the navigation and control of the Delaware River, and aided materially in the adjustment of all questions connected with this subject. In 1844 he was chosen a Presidential elector, and cast his vote for James K. Polk. In the spring of 1853 he received from President Pierce the appointment of naval officer at the Philadelphia custom-house, a position which he held for four years.

McKean, Warren and Jefferson were erected into the Eighteenth Judicial District, from and after September 1, 1835, and the Governor was required to appoint a president judge for the district. When the time for making the appointment arrived, Governor Wolf, who had often met Mr. Eldred at the bar, and recognized his fitness for the position, commissioned him president judge of the new district. In 1839 the death of Judge Slupper made a vacancy on the bench of the Sixth District, composed of Erie,

But it was in the field of his profession, rather than in politics, that his chief distinction was won. During a practice of nearly twenty years, in competition with such men as Amzi and Thomas Fuller, George Wolf, Dan Dimmick, Edward Mott, Garrick Mallery, Oristus Collins, John N. Conyngham and other noted practitioners of that day, he rose to a high position at the bar, and for nearly twenty years more he held a seat on the bench. By an act passed April 8, 1833, the counties of Potter, Crawford and Venango Counties, and Governor Porter commissioned Judge Eldred as president judge of that district. In 1843, Judge Blythe, of the Twelfth District, composed of Dauphin, Lebanon and Schuylkill Counties, resigned to accept the office of collector of customs of Philadelphia, and Governor Porter thereupon commissioned Judge Eldred as his successor.

In 1849 the counties of Wayne, Pike, Monroe and Carbon were erected into the Twenty-second District, and Judge Eldred desiring to return to his old home in Bethany, Governor Johnston commissioned him president judge of the district. In 1851, the judiciary having been made elective by the Constitutional amendment adopted the preceding year, many of Judge Eldred's friends throughout the State proposed his nomination for judge of the Supreme Court. He declined, however, to become a candidate, preferring to remain on the bench where his home was situated; and the desire to retain him was so general in the district that he received the support of both parties, and was elected without opposition. In April, 1853, the position of naval officer at Philadelphia being tendered him by President Pierce, he decided to accept it, and resigned the judgeship. This closed his judicial labors, and, substantially, his professional career.

On quitting the position of naval officer Judge Eldred returned to his home in Bethany. The remainder of his life was passed in comparative retirement. The advancing years were beginning to make their approach felt; he had begun to suffer in health; and though frequently consulted in important cases, he declined to resume active professional employment. The decade following was spent mainly amid the tranquil pursuits and interests of rural life, and he passed the limit of three-score and ten, loved and honored by all. He died January 27, 1867, just half a century from the day of his admission to the Wayne County bar, at the place which had witnessed the beginning of his career, and had for more than a generation been his home.

Judge Eldred was twice married. His first wife was a daughter of Dan Dimmick, his earliest preceptor in the profession. She died in 1824. His second wife, who survived him, was a daughter of Dr. Samuel Dimmick, of Bloomingburgh, Sullivan County, N. Y. He left three daughters and a son. The latter, Charles F. Eldred, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1861.

In casting his lot among the people of Wayne County, Judge Eldred identified himself with them in purpose and action. He made their general interests his own, and strove by every means in his power to promote them. In private and public life he was active in aiding the progress and development of the county, both as to material interests and educational advancement. By nature, and by habit of thought and of life, he was essentially a man of the people, and no man in Wayne County ever had a stronger hold on the popular heart. The people of the county appreciated his services, and at all times gave him an unwavering support. During the first decade of his residence among them the only office in their gift which he would consent to accept was bestowed on him again and again. They viewed his elevation to the bench with a feeling akin to personal satisfaction and pride. When his life closed, most of the generation which had witnessed his success and his usefulness had preceded him to the grave; yet his fame, though it had become largely a tradition, was so enduring that his death was felt and mourned as a loss of no common magnitude.

As an advocate Judge Eldred was clear in argument, earnest and persuasive, resting on the broad basis of equity, appealing largely to the natural perception of right, and arousing an aversion to every form of meanness, oppression and wrong. He was a jurist of more than ordinary rank. On the bench, however, he was little given to legal subtleties and refinements, or to the habit of measuring questions of right by narrow technical rules. He regarded the judicial function as designed for the practical administration of justice, and his decisions aimed at a fair and equitable adjustment of the difficulties between the parties. He was well read in his profession, and possessed a legal mind of a high order; but a controlling sense of justice, that responded instinctively to all questions respecting right as between man and man, predominated over the strictly professional view of a case, and his conclusions, even when not in strict conformity with technical rules and precedents, rested on a firm and obvious basis of equity. The essential justice of his purpose was so apparent as to command the respect of the bar, even when error was alleged in his rulings on questions of law. The people, without measuring his judicial action by professional tests, accepted its results as in the main just and equitable; they recognized his strong common sense and clear judgment, and had abiding faith in his judicial integrity. They gave him their confidence, because they knew him to be upright, impartial and devoted to the administration of justice in its broadest and noblest sense.

It will not be out of place to preserve anecdotes illustrating some of Judge Eldred's characteristics. While he was on the Dauphin County bench a case of assault and battery was tried before him. The evidence showed that while the defendant and his wife were walking on the streets in Harrisburg, a rowdy used some grossly insulting language toward the wife, whereupon the husband knocked him down. Judge Eldred's charge to the jury was substantially in the following terms: "Gentlemen of the jury, the defendant is indicted for an assault and battery on the prosecutor. You have learned from the evidence the character of the offence. In law, any rude, angry or violent touching of the person of another is an assault and battery, and is not justified by any provocation in words only. But if I was walking with my wife and a rowdy insulted her, I'd knock him down if I was big enough. Swear a constable." The verdict may be readily conjectured.

Another incident is related, showing his readiness and fertility in resources. On reaching the county-seat at which the first term of court was to be held, on his appointment to one of the western districts, his commission was not to be found, having been forgotten on leaving home, or lost on the way. It happened that the sheriff of the county had just been commissioned, and was to begin his official duties at that term of court. Judge Eldred at once decided on a line of action. Sending for the new sheriff, he told him that the practice of reading commissions in court, on assuming office, was a relic of the ceremonial established under a monarchy, and unsuited to the simplicity of republican institutions, and that he should dispense with it in the courts of his district; that the sheriff and himself having been duly sworn, nothing further was required of them, and they should enter on their duties in a quiet, unostentatious manner. Accordingly, the new judge and sheriff went into court together the next morning, took their respective places, and proceeded to the discharge of their duties without further ceremony, no question being raised as to their authority in the premises.

Charles Phillips Waller was born at Wilkes Barre, Luzerne County, Pa., August 7, 1819. His youth was passed in his native town, and, after a preparatory course at the Wilkes-Barre Academy, he entered Williams College, Massachusetts. He completed the second year's study in 1838, but, in consequence of impaired eyesight, was obliged to abandon the course. Having recovered in some degree from this difficulty, he spent portions of the following three years in teaching at Bloomsburg, Columbia County, Pa. He finally decided to study law, and in the summer of 1841 entered the office of Judge Collins, in Wilkes-Barre. In 1843, at the August Term of the courts, having passed a rigorous examination with much credit, he was admitted to the Luzerne bar. In the following autumn he decided to commence practice in Honesdale, which had recently become the seat of justice of Wayne County.

His professional ability commanded speedy recognition. His genial temperament and marked elevation of character, combined with a deportment distinguished by courtesy, refinement and dignity, won troops of friends; while his evident mastery of his profession, his untiring industry, his systematic business habits, his thorough preparation of causes and power as an advocate, with his faithful discharge of all professional duties, brought a large clientage. For about twelve years he continued in the active practice of his profession. At a bar which numbered among its leaders Earl Wheeler, William H. and Samuel E. Dimmick, Charles S. Minor and F. M. Crane, and with Oristus Collins, Henry M. Fuller, William Jessup, Franklin Lusk and other prominent attorneys from adjoining counties, as frequent contestants, he reached the front rank. While familiar with the various subjects of legal enactment and decision, he made a special study of the important questions arising from unsettled and conflicting land claims, the determination of which, for many years, formed a large proportion of the business of the courts. He made himself thoroughly familiar with the somewhat complicated system of land titles prevailing in the county, and took a leading part, as counsel, in the litigation connected with them. In dealing with these he met few equals and no superiors, and became recognized as one of the first authorities on the subject.

In 1848 he was appointed deputy attorney-general for the county by Governor Johnston, and entered upon his duties at September Term. He held this position until December Term, 1850. By act of May 3, 1850, this office was made elective, under the title of district attorney. The county being largely Democratic, and Mr. Waller being a Whig, he declined to become a candidate for election.

The close attention given to professional duties at length undermined his health, and in 1855 he consulted various physicians, among whom was Dr. Willard Parker, of New York. Finding him in a state of great exhaustion and with alarming symptons of consumption, Dr. Parker directed him to suspend practice and seek the benefit of an out-door life, at the same time giving him but little encouragement, and warning him that the chances were a hundred to one against his recovery. Acting on this advice, Mr. Waller purchased a farm a few miles from Honesdale, and passed the greater part of the time for several years in the open air. He resolved to overcome the threatening malady, and, maintaining the contest with remarkable tenacity and power of will, succeeded in repelling the dread enemy for more than a quarter of a century. He had, in 1850, formed a partnership with a younger brother, George G. Waller, who, after his enforced retirement, successfully conducted the large practice of the firm. The elder brother subsequently attended to the out-door business, doing but little office work, and seldom appearing in court except on the trial of some important land suit.

In 1862 the Republicans of the county nominated him for the Legislature; but party lines were closely drawn, and the Democratic majority proved too large to be overcome.

In 1874, the counties of Wayne and Pike having been erected into the Twenty-second Judicial District, Mr. Waller yielded to the urgent solicitations of the Republicans of the district, and accepted the Republican nomination for the office of president judge. The Democrats failed to unite, the Hon. F. M. Crane taking the field as an independent candidate, while the Hon. D. M. Van Auken received the regular party nomination. The result was the election of Mr. Waller by a plurality of four hundred and five, in a district which, at the State election two years previously, had given a Democratic majority of seventeen hundred and ninety-nine.

On the bench Judge Waller displayed the mental characteristics for which he had been eminent at the bar. He thoroughly understood every feature of every case tried before him. He possessed a matchless grasp of the facts, however numerous or complicated, with an unerring perception of their true relation to the issue in the case, and a clear apprehension of the principles of law controlling their operation and effect. His mastery of a case and his retention of all its essential points were often exhibited in a marked degree. On one occasion, during the argument of an important case, in which the testimony was very voluminous, the counsel, in reading it, inadvertently made a mistake, which the judge at once corrected from memory. On every subject that called for judicial action he had clearly-defined views and positive convictions, and he always had the courage of his convictions. Decision and promptness were among his prominent qualities; he was a stranger to hesitation and timidity; and he never wavered in the course to which his convictions impelled him.

Judge Waller remained on the bench until removed by death, though during the last year of his life his failing health interfered largely with the regular performance of his official duties. Nevertheless, he bore up bravely under increasing weakness and was frequently found at his post when his physical condition would have justified him in quitting it. To a bronchial affection of long standing, chronic gastritis was finally superadded. His stomach at length failed to perform its functions and his death resulted from inanition. He retained his faculties in his waking hours, and it was during sleep that he ceased to breathe. His death took place August 18, 1882.

About a year and a half after taking up his residence at Honesdale (April 3, 1845) Mr. Waller was married to Miss Harriet Ward Stone, daughter of the late Henry Ward Stone. Mrs. Waller died May 24, 1884. Their children—Lizzie (wife of William H. Stanton) and Miss Mary S. Waller,—survive them and reside in Honesdale.

The personal characteristics of Judge Waller are thus outlined by a life-long and intimate friend:

"The old log academy at Wilkes-Barre served to plant the seeds of culture in the mind of Judge Waller, and induce an aspiration after something beyond the rudiments of knowledge. He early appeared rapid in his acquisition, remarkably retentive in his powers of mind, keen in his perceptions, and sternly logical in his methods of deduction. He had a temperament that gave him an impassioned address, an imagination enlivening his expression even in early youth, and combined therewith a judgment the deliberate and careful movements of which would have indicated his fitness to draw the lines, at some future day, between the conflicting claims of men. He knew but little of idleness or waste of life; and in the application of excellent native endowments he was constantly in the pursuit of knowledge; ever grew in the breadth of his views of life. There seems to have been but little of the boy in him. Manliness of character seemed stamped upon every period of his early life, and personal dignity of bearing all remember as having marked his relations to men. Yet, with singular harmony, he possessed those qualities of a generous and noble nature, that prompt sympathy with the condition and experience of all others, which relieved the dignity of all hauteur and austerity, crowning his manliness with the more influential traits of fellowship in the ever-changing condition of those around him. He possessed a depth of character and a breadth of view, a courtliness of true nobility, an elevation above suspecting the motives of others, that enabled him to adapt himself with equal grace and power of influence to any and every class in society. He was a friend to every man and every man seemed his friend. Perfectly at home in the society of children, above moodiness amid the invasion of unyielding disease, possessing a temperament the vivacity of which rendered the suspicion of his actual age absolutely beyond a possibility, he would have been considered, while upon the bench, one of our younger men, wearing the ermine with singular grace, an expounder of the law hardly suggesting by his youthful appearance the names of those whose judicial career has been associated with advancing years and hoary hairs, as upon the English bench; but the community in which he administered, and whose interests he was called on to protect, can best testify to his integrity, his wisdom and his watchful care."

Henry M. Seely is the second son of Colonel Richard L. and Maria Seely, and was born in Seelyville—about a mile from Honesdale—September 18, 1835. After the usual preparatory course he entered Yale College, and was graduated from that institution in May, 1857. He soon afterward commenced a course of legal study in Honesdale, under the direction of F. M. Crane, and in the following year attended the Albany Law School for one term. He completed his course as a student in the city of New York, and was there admitted to the bar in May, 1859. In September following, while on a visit to Honesdale, he was admitted to the bar of Wayne County. He had, however, commenced practice in New York, and remained there until the breaking out of the Rebellion, in 1861. He then decided to make Honesdale his home, and removing to that place opened an office. In due time his abilities commanded recognition, and his professional acquirements, the fruit of close study, diligent research and deep thought, with his vigorous and well-disciplined mental powers, gave him a high rank in the profession.

In the summer of 1882 the death of Hon. Charles P. Waller, president judge of the judicial district, made a vacancy on the bench. There was no division of opinion as to the choice of a successor. The bar of the district looked to Mr. Seely as the man by whom it should be filled, and those who were confessedly entitled to high consideration, had they become his competitors, were foremost in asking for his appointment. August 28th, ten days after the death of Judge Waller, he was commissioned as president judge of the district, and the vacancy having occurred within three months of the general election in 1882, his commission extended until the first Monday of January, 1884.

On the opening of the judicial canvass, in 1883, the Republicans of the district nominated Judge Seely by acclamation. The impression he had made during a year on the bench was strikingly shown in the preamble and resolution accompanying his nomination in Wayne, presented by William H. Lee, one of the most prominent among the younger members of the bar, viz. :

"Whereas, The people properly demand that a candidate for the judicial office shall possess, in an eminent degree, certain qualities rightly considered indispensable to the due performance of judicial functions, among which are a thorough knowledge of the law, mature judgment, a judicial mind, fitted by habit and training to clearly discern and correctly apply the principles of law to the various combinations of facts arising in forensic contests, integrity above suspicion, rigid impartiality, and freedom from prejudice or prepossession in the discharge of his duties;

"And whereas, The Hon. Henry M. Seely, now the president judge of this judicial district, having long been recognized by the bar, the bench and the public, as endowed with rare intellectual powers, strengthened, disciplined and ripened by a collegiate education, profound study, a careful legal training and intimate association with the foremost legal minds of the State, and bearing a character above reproach, is pre-eminently fitted to perform the duties devolving on a presiding judge,

"And whereas, Judge Seely, by the judicious and conscientious discharge of these duties during the past year, has demonstrated his possession of all the qualities essential to a pure and enlightened judiciary,—a demonstration emphasized by the fact that in none of the numerous cases tried before him, in this district and in the various other districts in which he has from time to time been called to preside, has a writ of error or an appeal to the Supreme Court been taken. Therefore,

"Resolved, That this convention, guided by the established precedents in older counties of the commonwealth, of opposing changes in the judiciary, and retaining faithful and competent judges in office, presents with just pride the Hon. Henry M. Seely as a candidate for president judge, whose ability as a jurist and worth as a man have been adequately tested and amply proved; and feeling, in common with all who desire to maintain the high standard of the judiciary, that the office should be lifted above the mire of partisan politics, we earnestly appeal to the citizens of this judicial district, irrespective of party affiliations, to give him their support at the polls."

The nomination of Judge Seely by the Republicans of Pike was equally enthusiastic. Though, previous to his appointment, not so well known in that county as in Wayne, he had, during the short period for which he had occupied a seat on the bench, won a degree of respect and confidence not less than that manifested at his own home.

The Democrats of the district were unable to unite on a candidate. Wayne presented George S. Purdy, and Pike claimed the nomination for Hon. D. M. Van Auken. Both candidates remained in the field, and the result was the election of Judge Seely by a handsome plurality.

With unusual mental endowments, broad culture and weight of character, Judge Seely, during the three and a half years that he has occupied a seat on the bench, has made an admirable record. His official action has been marked by an evident sense of responsibility and conscientious purpose. It has been in the highest degree impartial, free from personal bias, and unaffected by any consideration calculated to warp the judgment, or by any influence not legitimately entitled to weight in the determination of the question before him. His analysis of a case is searching and accurate. With a profound knowledge of law, he possesses a strong innate sense of justice, and, in a large degree, those peculiar intellectual qualities that constitute what is known in the profession as a "legal" or "judicial" mind—a mind which seizes, as by instinct, on the essential issues before it, and applies to them, with rigorous precision, the legal principles by which they are to be decided. His opinions are models of legal research and judicial logic, applied to a comprehensive view of the essential facts. He commands the respect and confidence of the bar, not only of Wayne and Pike, but of the other counties in which he has from time to time been called to preside; and in an equal degree the confidence of the people.

II. Attorneys in Permanent Practice.

ANDREW M. DORRANCE[1] was the first attorney admitted to the bar of Wayne County after the erection of Pike, and the first to make his home and commence practice within the present county limits. He was a native of Connecticut; but of his history, before coming to Pennsylvania, nothing can now be ascertained, except that he entered Brown University in 1810, and was admitted to the bar of Windham County, Connecticut, March 31, 1815. The manner of his admission there is not without interest to the bar of the present day; and the law student who now faces three examiners, when a candidate for admission, undergoes an ordeal apparently less severe than that encountered by Mr. Dorrance, who seems to have run the gauntlet of seventeen. The recommendation for his admission was in the following language:

"To the Hon. Court of Common Pleas, now in session at Windham, within and for the county of Windham:

"The subscribers, practicing at Your Honors barr, beg leave to represent that we have examined Mr. Andrew M. Dorrence as a candidate for admission to practice as an Attorney at Law at Your Honors barr, and find that he is a young gentleman of good moral character, that he has complied with the rules of the Barr, and is in all respects well qualified. Therefore we recommend him to Your Honors for admission."

This was signed by seventeen attorneys—apparently the entire "Barr" of the county—and on its presentation Mr. Dorrance was admitted to practice.

April 15, 1816, Mr. Dorrance applied for admission to the bar of Pike County. A committee appointed to examine him reported favorably the next day, and he was thereupon admitted.

April 22, 1816, he was admitted to the bar of Wayne County, and, taking up his residence at Bethany, commenced practice. He died there April 9, 1818, unmarried.

AMZI FULLER, who, by the untimely death of Mr. Dorrance, became in 1818 the senior resident attorney of Wayne County, was born in Kent, Litchfield County, Connecticut, October 19, 1793. He was educated at the classical school of Daniel Parker, in Sharon, Conn. In 1814 Major Jason Torrey, whose son William was attending this school, wrote to Mr. Parker, requesting him to send a good teacher to take charge of a school at Bethany. In response to this, young Fuller came, reaching Bethany May 9, 1814. He made an engagement to teach for six months, but a severe sickness compelled him to leave his school before the close of the term. Early in 1815, having regained his health, he decided to prepare for the bar. Bethany, though for some ten years the county-seat, was still without a lawyer; Mr. Fuller therefore went to Milford, and entered on the usual course of legal study in the office of Dan Dimmick, maintaining himself, meantime, by writing in the county offices. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne County August 26, 1816, and, forming a partnership[2] with Mr. Dorrance, commenced practice. Less than two years later Mr. Dorrance died, and Mr. Fuller succeeded to the practice built up by the firm, and to the small library which had been acquired.

Wayne County was then a wild, rugged and sparsely populated region, distant from lines of travel, and traversed by few business thoroughfares. Lumber was the main staple of commerce, and, as the streams by which it was sent to market were small and difficult of navigation, even that was a precarious source of wealth, while its production withdrew attention from agricultural pursuits and left the general face of the country largely unimproved.

The legal business of the county was small. The courts were seldom occupied for more than a week in disposing of the causes, both civil and criminal, that came before them. Hon.

[1] Though the name, in the application for admission in Windham, Connecticut, is given as Dorrence, in the records of Wayne County it uniformly appears as Dorrance; hence the latter form is here adopted.

[2] As to the partnership with Mr. Dorrance, referred to in the foregoing sketch, it was apparently of short duration, and was probably formed not long before the death of Mr. Dorrance. The record nowhere shows the appearance of Messrs. Dorrance and Fuller as partners. In some instances they appear associated as counsel, much oftener each appears alone, and in many cases they appear on opposite sides.—H. W.

Nathaniel B. Eldred had just located at Bethany, and was a rising barrister of fine manners and commanding talents, and other able lawyers came to Bethany from the adjoining counties to divide a practice which seemed but too small for the resident attorneys. Mr. Fuller's dependence was wholly on his profession; he had no adventitious aids, and engaged in no other business. He gave careful study to the few books which he possessed, and devoted his energies to the faithful dispatch of the business intrusted to him. He cultivated the strictest habits of integrity, industry, temperance and frugality, and rose rapidly to public confidence. The increase in his practice allowed him to marry and establish himself and family in ease and comfort. From being a faithful and conscientious reader and worker, he grew to be a sound, honest and well-read lawyer, who enjoyed unbounded confidence, and in whose hands no business ever suffered from lack of skill and patience. His credit was unbounded and he left it whole; it is said of him that he rarely remained a fortnight as a debtor. To stranger and to friend alike he was exact, and ever scrupulous in his every dealing.

These qualities eminently fitted him for offices of public trust, but he was not an aspirant for political favor. He held but one civil office, though he was reappointed to it for several successive terms. It was that of deputy attorney-general, and he was retained by administrations of varying political complexion for many years, discharging its duties with the same zeal, punctuality and skill that marked his private transactions.

During his residence in Bethany Mr. Fuller's house was ever open with a ready and an elegant hospitality, and he had the same keen appreciation of the duties and privileges of social life that he manifested in his professional dealings. He was wide-awake and public-spirited, an ardent supporter of the schools, and alive to the interests of morals and religion. Whatever looked to the advancement of the people had his hearty co-operation. He loved Wayne County, not only because it was the scene of his early professional struggles and triumphs, but because he felt the gratitude of noble manhood. He had mixed with its hardy, enterprising people, and they had benefited him no less than he had them. He was alive to the obligation which rested upon him from the recognition of those qualities that had given him success and competence.

Late in middle life Mr. Fuller decided to retire from practice, and, in 1841, moved to the house of his son, Henry M. Fuller, at Wilkes-Barre, where he became an active and valued citizen until his death.

He died while on a visit to his early home in Connecticut, September 26, 1847, in the house in which he was born.

Mr. Fuller, after his removal to Wilkes-Barre, was not engaged in general practice, though frequently consulted in important cases. During the later years of his life three president judges resided in Wilkes-Barre—Hon. John N. Conyngham, of the Thirteenth District; Hon. George W. Woodward, of the Fourth; and Hon. Luther Kidder, of the Twenty-first. It was their custom to meet in Mr. Fuller's office and discuss with him all difficult legal questions which had come before them. Judge Conyngham, in speaking of this years afterward, said that Mr. Fuller, on hearing the facts, in every instance stated the principles of law governing the case with such accuracy that the three judges never failed to concur in his view.

Oristus Collins was born in Connecticut September 22, 1792. His father was Dr. Lewis Collins, one of the pioneer physicians of Wayne County. Dr. Collins removed to the county with his family about the beginning of the present century. His first residence was in that part of Canaan since erected into Salem, but in 1803 he made a permanent home within the present limits of Cherry Ridge. The son, after attending the local schools, went abroad to complete his education. He next read law, and was admitted to the bar at Owego, N. Y. Soon afterward he commenced practice in Wilkes-Barre, which thereafter remained his home until advancing years unfitted him for the active duties of his profession. He then removed to Rye, Westchester County, N. Y., and there made his home with his son, Rev. Charles J.

Collins. He died January 29, 1884, in his ninety-second year.

He was admitted to the Wayne County bar in 1819, and for a quarter of a century afterward was a regular attendant on its courts, except while on the bench in another county. He was one of the most prominent among the attorneys of that period in Northeastern Pennsylvania.

In 1836 he was appointed by Governor Ritner president judge of the Second Judicial District, composed of Lancaster County.

On the resignation of Judge Scott, of the Eleventh District, in March, 1838, Judge Eldred not resigning the judgeship in the Eighteenth District to become his successor, as had been anticipated, Governor Ritner proposed to Judge Collins a transfer to the Eleventh District, in which Luzerne County was situated. But the bar of Lancaster strongly pressing him to remain, Judge Collins declined the transfer, and wrote the Governor recommending the appointment of William Jessup, of Susquehanna County, whereupon the Governor at once commissioned Mr. Jessup.

Near the close of the same year Judge Collins was persuaded, against his better judgment, to take a step that resulted in his retirement from the bench.

The amended Constitution, completed February 22, 1838, fixed the term of president judge at ten years, and required the appointment to be made "by and with the consent of the Senate." It further provided that the commissions of those "who shall not have held their offices for ten years at the adoption of the amendments to the Constitution shall expire on the 27th of February next after the end of ten years from the date of their commissions." It also declared that "the alterations and amendments in the said Constitution shall take effect from the 1st day of January, 1839." At the election held October 9, 1838, a majority of one thousand two hundred and twelve was given for the amendments. December 11, 1838, the number of votes cast was certified by the Speaker of the Senate to the Governor, who, on the same day, issued his proclamation declaring that the amendments had been adopted.

In view of the change of tenure, several judges—among them Judge Gibson, of the Supreme Court, and Judge Darlington, of Chester County—resorted to the expedient of resigning before the change went into effect, to be at once recommissioned, and their terms of office extended as provided by the amendments. The leading members of the Lancaster bar urged Judge Collins to adopt the same course, but he was unwilling to do so, and for some time declined. The project, however, being seconded by Governor Ritner and other officials, he finally yielded a reluctant assent. December 26, 1838, he resigned, and the next day was recommissioned, to hold the office during good behavior, as provided by the Constitution of 1790.

The State election of 1838 had changed the political complexion of the administration; David R. Porter, a Democrat, having been chosen to succeed Governor Ritner, who, like Judge Collins, was a Whig. The validity, after January 1, 1839, of the commissions issued to the judges who had resigned was disputed, and writs of quo warranto were issued out of the Supreme Court to determine the question. In the case of Judge Darlington the court was understood to have reached a decision sustaining his commission, which was to be announced on the following Monday. On the Sunday preceding, however, Judge Darlington died, making an adjudication unnecessary. The case against Judge Collins was then proceeded with, and a decision in his favor was confidently expected. It was contended, in his behalf, that as the amendments did not take effect until January, 1, 1839, they applied to all commissions then existing, and continued them in force "until the 27th of February next after the end of ten years" from their date. The Supreme Court, however (Justice Huston dissenting), decided against him, and gave judgment of ouster, holding that the judicial tenure established by the Constitution of 1790 being expressly altered by the amendments, all commissions held thereunder become null and void on the 1st of January, 1839, except so far as they were extended by the amendments; that by the express terms of the amended Constitution no commissions were provided for or continued in force except those existing at the adoption of the amendments; and that the date of such adoption was December 11, 1838, when it was officially certified and proclaimed; hence that the commission of Judge Collins, not having been in existence at the adoption of the amendments, was not continued beyond January 1, 1839, when the change in the judicial tenure took effect, and not having been issued "by and with the consent of the Senate," it had no validity under the amended Constitution. (Com. ex rel. v. Collins, 8 Watts, 331). The commission of Judge Gibson was not affected by this construction, since the amendments applied in express terms to "commissions of the judges of the Supreme Court who may be in office on the 1st day of January, 1839." As to the correctness of the decision against Judge Collins, the opinion of the bar was much divided. It was largely viewed as due to political influences, and the division of opinion, for the most part, followed party lines.

After quitting the bench Judge Collins resumed practice. For some fifteen years afterward he frequently attended the courts of Wayne County, his last appearance in a matter of any importance being on the trial of Timothy Grady, for arson, in September, 1854, when he was associated with C. P. & G. G. Waller in the defense.

THOMAS FULLER, a younger brother of Amzi Fuller, was born in Kent, Litchfield County, Conn., February 26, 1804. He received a good education, and about the year 1823 came to Bethany for the purpose of teaching in the "Beechwoods Academy." While thus engaged he also commenced reading law, under the direction of his brother. Having completed the prescribed course of study, he was admitted to the bar August 19, 1826. He opened an office in Bethany, and won a marked professional success. The record shows numerous instances in which the brothers were engaged on opposite sides; the elder being distinguished as simply "Fuller," while the younger was designated as "T. Fuller." Their rivalry, however, if such it may be styled, was purely professional.

Thomas Fuller was a man of fine abilities and high character, and made a most favorable impression on all with whom he came in contact. Besides pursuing his professional duties, he took an active part in politics, and in principle was a Whig. Though the district contained a Democratic majority of some two thousand, his personal popularity was such that he was twice elected to the Legislature, first in 1830, and again in 1831.

With the removal of the county-seat, he changed his residence to Honesdale, and built the large house on the corner of Second and Tenth Streets. It was scarcely completed, however, when he died, and it was subsequently occupied by his son, William J. Fuller.

Mr. Fuller was married, September 10, 1829, to Caroline Nichols, of New York. She died March 24, 1830. October 31, 1831, he was married to Martha Robins, of New York. He died in Honesdale, December 16, 1843. His widow survived him until October 17, 1864. Their children were William J. Fuller and Mary R., now widow of the late Ralph L. Briggs. The former died June 9, 1884. The latter still resides in Honesdale.

GEORGE B. WESCOTT studied law with William Rawle, in Philadelphia, and was there admitted to practice. He subsequently came to Wayne County as an agent for Philadelphia owners of lands in the county. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne April 27, 1829, but appears to have given little attention to practice. In 1831 he was appointed prothonotary, and held the office for four years. He died at Bethany November 28, 1836, aged thirty-one years.

EARL WHEELER.—This venerable man, the patriarch for many years of the Wayne County bar, died at the residence of his brother-in-law, the late Mr. Hiram K. Mumford, in Dyberry township, this county, December 30, 1873, in the seventy-third year of his age. About ten years before he was smitten with paralysis, and was soon after constrained to retire from professional duties. Then commenced a very gradual declension of his physical powers, which continued to the end. His mental faculties at times suffered eclipse, but generally his mind acted with remarkable precision, though with a slowness which was one of its characteristics, even in his prime. On Christmas he was quite comfortable, but a day or two after a change came over him, and he faded peacefully away.

He was of old Massachusetts stock, being of the sixth or seventh generation of his family in this country. He was born in Montgomery, Hampden County, Mass., in August, 1802. His wife was Fanny Freeman, a sister of Calvely Freeman, late of Mount Pleasant township, this county. She was descended in the maternal line from Elder William Brewster, of the "Mayflower" company.

While Mr. Wheeler was still in childhood his parents removed to Hancock, Delaware County, N. Y. They both died there, and were buried in the cemetery on the Preston estate, situated in Buckingham township, this county.

His early educational advantages were not generous, but, through great perseverance, he acquired a thorough mastery of the English language, and made large progress in the higher mathematics, in mental and natural philosophy and in general literature. As he grew up he turned his attention to the legal profession, and entered, as a student, the office of the famous Erastus Root, at Delhi, N. Y. After a time he removed to Susquehanna County, Pa., and became a student under Almon H. Reed, at Montrose. He commenced practice at Dundaff. From thence he removed to Bethany, in this county, where he remained until the seat of justice was transferred to Honesdale, when he changed his residence to that place.

For many years he was one of the most prominent and successful lawyers at the Wayne County bar. If, in his professional career he had a blemish, it consisted in the indulgence of the phantasy that his clients were always in the right. It added to his efficiency, if it did at times elicit a smile at his expense.

Mr. Wheeler never held a public office. What chance of preferment he had (and that was not insignificant) he sacrificed by a change in his political affiliations, passing from a large majority in his district over to a weak minority, because of strong convictions touching the matter of slavery. He was perfectly aware what the consequences of the act would be to himself, but he did not hesitate. As he was made up, he could not falter on any point that he conceived involved a duty to be performed. His new associates subsequently nominated him for representative in Congress, but he and they understood that while the nomination was an honor, it was a barren one, the other side having an unusual preponderance of the voters. Whether there were in him the elements of decided success in public life, except in such lines as involved the pursuit of the law, is a point certainly open to question; but he did not seek the opportunity to solve the doubt, and the opportunity did not come to him. In his chosen sphere his career was not, indeed, brilliant, but it was successful.

He was not a man of genius, nor yet of a high order of talent. There was no glow of imagination and no warmth of enthusiasm in his nature. He was methodical and plodding. Whatever naked common sense, with industry and tenacity, might aspire to, was within his reach; what was beyond he did not waste himself in unavailing efforts to attain. He was a good lawyer and a judicious counselor. What the books contained he knew, and knew well. In the application of principles to particular cases, while not rapid, he was exceedingly correct. The graces of eloquent speech were not his, but there was a directness, an earnestness, a depth of conviction in his talk that was most persuasive and convincing. Clear, patient, laborious, he made a large reputation, and for many years was at the head of the legal profession in this county.

But he had still higher claims than these upon public confidence and esteem. He was a profoundly truthful and honest man. There was no alloy of falsehood, deceit, hypocrisy or fraud in him. In business, in politics, in religion, in social and domestic life, there was no guile found in him. He wore no masks. He said precisely what he meant, and squared his actions by his professions. He was never even suspected of an untruth or a dishonesty. Ambitious of wealth, he coveted no man's silver or gold. Emulous of honors, he refused distinctions at the sacrifice of principle. He was as true to his conscience as the needle is to the pole.

In private life his nature was child-like, simple-hearted, transparent. His domestic virtues were without a blemish. There was no mixture of contradictions in his composition. The image was not part gold and part clay. If there was lacking that stateliness of manners and courtliness of phrase which are prized in fashionable circles, there was a depth of sincerity, of generosity, of charitableness, that threw over his life a charm of greater value than any meretricious adornments.

Resolute in following his judgment when it was once matured, he was slow and cautious in reaching conclusions. He took nothing on trust; yielded nothing to authority. He challenged everything. He demanded proofs. He judged solely by what he knew. This instinct of timidity, of doubt, of scrutiny, ran into every department of his life, and was as observable when he committed himself to a wagon or a bridge as to a new point in law or theology. If he rejected what other men received and cherished, he did not do so captiously, or because it was pleasant for him to differ from other people. There was no obtrusion of differences in his intercourse.

If godliness really means to be godlike—if religion consists in the exemplification of Truth and Justice, Love and Mercy, Purity and Reverence, not for their uses, as profitable to one's self, but because they are supremely good and beautiful in themselves—then Mr. Wheeler was an eminently religious man and has undoubtedly passed to the glorification of the just made perfect. He left behind him the odor of a well-spent life, a moral character without a blemish, and a cherished recollection of true manliness and worth in the hearts of thousands who survive him.

Charles K. Robinson was born in Windham Centre, N. Y., in 1802. He was an uncle of ex-Governor Lucius Robinson, of New York. He studied law with Erastus Barnes in New York City, and was there admitted to the bar. He subsequently practiced in Kortright, Delaware County, N. Y., and there, in 1826, was married to Laura Stewart. He came to Honesdale a few years later. The date of his admission to the bar of Wayne is not shown by the record, but his earliest recorded appearance as an attorney was at November term, 1833. In 1840 he was appointed deputy attorney-general, and held the office for five years. He died in November, 1849.

Ebenezer Kingsbury came to Wayne from Susquehanna County. He studied law with William Jessup in Montrose, and was admitted to the bar of Susquehanna September 2, 1828. The date of his admission to the bar of Wayne is not shown by the record, but his earliest recorded appearance as an attorney was at November Term, 1833. He came to Wayne County to take editorial charge of the Wayne County Herald and Bethany Inquirer, the Democratic organ of the county, published at Honesdale, and devoted himself mainly to politics. In 1835 he was appointed deputy attorney-general for the county, and held the office until January, 1838. In 1837 he was elected to the State Senate, and in April, 1840, was chosen Speaker for the remainder of the year. He died about the middle of April, 1844.

Hon. William H. Dimmick (1st).—Elder Thomas Dimmock, the earliest American ancestor of this gentleman, came to Dorchester, Mass., before 1635, possibly in the company led by John Winthrop, Jr., in 1630. He was a selectman of that town. May 25, 1636, he was made a freeman of the colony of Massachusetts Bay. He removed to Hingham in 1638, to Scituate the next year, and to Barnstable in 1640, where he became locally prominent. He was a son of Edward Dimmock, of Barnstable, England, the family having been conspicuous in the mother country for five hundred years. His wife was probably Ann Hammond, widow of William Hammond, of Watertown, Mass.

The name is Welch, and was originally written David ap Madoc—David, son of Madoc. Then it took the form of Daimock, Dai being a contraction of David. Afterwards, and down to the present time, various orthographical forms were and are employed, as Dymock, Dimmock, Dimmuck, Dimuck and Dimock. Indeed, no two of Mr. Dimmick's immediate progenitors spelled the name in the same way. Diversities in spelling proper names are common enough in all old books and documents, but so great a diversity as is manifest in the spelling of this name is quite uncommon. The existing differences do not seem likely to be obliterated. Each has abundant examples to support it, and neither party is inclined to yield. In 1703 a man of this name was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature from Bucks County. That year his name was spelled on the official minutes Tobias Dymmoke. In 1705 he was again in the Legislature, and his name was then officially written Tobias Dymock. There is no evidence attainable that he was closely related to Thomas Dimmock, of Barnstable, Mass.

Deacon Shubal Dimmuck was the second son and third child of Thomas Dimmock, and was born in Barnstable and baptized there September 15, 1644. He was selectman in 1685–86 and member of General Court, as the Colonial Legislature was designated, at different sessions. About 1693 he removed to Mansfield, Conn., where he died, October 29, 1732, at the advanced age of ninety-one years. He married Joanna Bursley in April, 1663.

His son, John Dimuck, was born in Barnstable in January, 1666, and lived there until 1709, when he removed to Falmouth. He married Elizabeth Lumbert in November, 1689.

Timothy Dimock was the fifth child and second son of John Dimuck. He was born in Barnstable in July, 1698, and finally located in Mansfield. He married Ann Bradford, a descendant of Governor Bradford, of the "Mayflower" company, April 15, 1723.

Deacon Oliver Dimock, eighth child and sixth son of Timothy Dimock, lived in Mansfield, about half a mile east of the present Mansfield depot. He was a deacon of the North Mansfield Church. He married Sarah Gurley, daughter of Samuel, in April, 1764. She died in 1799 and he February 10, 1823.

Dan Dimmick, second son and fifth child of Oliver Dimock, was born March 1, 1775, in Mansfield. He came to Pennsylvania in 1800, and studied law in Milford, and followed his profession in that village until February, 1825, when he died. He married Jane, daughter of J. J. Aerts, better known as Dr. Francis Smith, of Stroudsburg, Pa. Mr. Aerts was born in Brussels, when it was the capital of the Austrian Netherlands. He was a son of Z. B. Aerts, Lord of Opdorp and Immerscele, and was named Josephus Jacobus Aerts. In 1771 he started for America, to join the colonists against Great Britain, and to facilitate travel through France, took the name of Francis Smith.

William H. Dimmick, seventh child and fifth son of Dan, was born in Milford, January 25, 1813. He was educated at Wendham, and at an early age entered the law-office of Hon. N. B. Eldred, at Bethany, Wayne County, Pa., and in 1835 was admitted to the bar, and began practice with Mr. Eldred, whose first wife was his sister, and whose second wife was his cousin. Soon afterwards Mr. Eldred was appointed to a president judgeship, which he accepted, leaving Mr. Dimmick to profit by the large and lucrative practice left to him. In 1842 the county-seat was removed from Bethany to Honesdale, when, in common with other members of the legal profession, he removed to the latter place, and at once was conceded high rank.

In 1844 he was elected, by the Democrats, State Senator from the district composed of the counties of Susquehanna, Wyoming and Wayne. He speedily acquired influence in the Senate through his industry and abilities. The point in his legislative career, however, which excited most attention and comment was his refusal to sustain the Democratic caucus nomination of James Buchanan for United States Senator, who was a candidate for re-election. The Democrats had a majority of only one on joint ballot, so that the selection of his successor was virtually in the power of Mr. Dimmick. Simon Cameron, up to that occasion, had steadily been a Democrat, and even then avowed himself to be such; but he affirmed that Mr. Buchanan was not sound on the tariff question, and, perhaps, on some other points. The Whig members of the Legislature took that view of the contention, or, at least, professed to take it. Mr. Cameron gave them in writing all the assurances they desired, and they gave him their votes for Senator. The vote of Mr. Dimmick, superadded thereto, made Mr. Cameron Senator for the full term of six years, and soon he commenced a long career at Washington, which was certainly conspicuous, if not illustrious.

W. H. Dimmick

In 1856 Mr. Dimmick was elected representative in Congress from the Thirteenth District, composed of the counties of Wayne, Pike, Monroe, Carbon and Northampton. In 1858 he was again elected representative from the same district. This must be said, that his Congressional service did not satisfy the expectation created by his record in the State Senate. But, then, it must be borne in mind that his health had become prematurely broken, and the final end for him was not far off.

On August 3, 1861, he died at his residence in Honesdale, after a protracted illness, proximately of dropsy, caused remotely, perhaps, by what was known at the time as the National Hotel poisoning. That was his conception of his malady. He believed and often asserted that the poisoning was an attempt by Southern radicals to remove Mr. Buchanan from the Presidency, and that he and a number of other persons incidentally became victims of the criminal endeavor, while the President fortunately escaped. Of course, he could not demonstrate the accuracy of his conception of the matter, for the actual facts were never authoritatively developed; but he adhered tenaciously to the last to that idea.

Mr. Dimmick's physical frame surpassed ordinary dimensions, massive rather than corpulent. His head was large and his countenance open and pleasant. To outward appearances it seemed, when he came to the bar, likely to endure to extreme old age. But those bodily indications were unreal and deceptive. In the meridian of his years, he withered gradually and passed away. He never married, but left the handsome competency he had acquired to his youngest sister.

He was a man of excellent understanding. His education, while not liberal, was sufficient for his purposes. He was proficient in his native language, using it ordinarily with considerable exactness and often with conspicuous force. He was not ignorant of general English literature, having a familiar acquaintance with many authors whose works have attained the rank of classics. He was a diligent student along the line of his profession, well grounded alike in elementary principles, in statutory enactments and in the decisions of the higher tribunals. He had a blending of capacities which made him strong with both the bench and the jury.

During his life an impression prevailed, somewhat widely, that he was specially absent-minded. Stories were told illustrating his alleged forgetfulness,—one to the effect that, having occasion while at a hotel in the city of New York, to send out a garment to be repaired, he thoughtlessly left in one of the pockets a large sum of money, the discovery whereof greatly frightened the messenger, who saw in it an artifice to accomplish his ruin. Another, that while preparing to quit a Harrisburg hotel, he fastened his trunk, leaving two or three suits of clothes in a wardrobe in the room he occupied, and was oblivious to what had become of them until they were forwarded to him. And yet a third, to the effect that he was once engaged to marry a lady; that the day of the wedding was fixed by mutual agreement between her and him; and that, forgetting the engagement, he failed to appear at the appointed time. These and other reports of similar nature were told in a tone sometimes of banter and sometimes of complaint. But how much fiction or how much fact entered into the composition of them was never apparent. It was, however, palpable that he did not forget his own business welfare or the rights and interests which clients committed to his care. Therein he was prompt, intelligent and efficient.

In social life he was attractive and large-hearted, full of kindly and generous impulses, with heart ever open to the appeals of the suffering and needy, and hand ever ready to minister to their necessities. There was no trace of malice in him, even towards his enemies, and his forgiveness of injuries to himself was swift and certain. His friendships once established were not lightly broken.

He had scarcely reached the summit of life and the best and fullest development of his powers when the summons for his final departure came. What possibilities lay in the future may readily be conjectured; but he left behind, in the recollection of friends and in the appreciation of the public, enough accomplished to ensure a kindly remembrance on the part of the generation to which he belonged.

Hon. F. M. Crane.—For many years this man was a conspicuous, unique and interesting figure in the professional, political and social life of Honesdale and of Wayne County. Nature was not kind to him in respect to form and bearing. Short, thick, dark-visaged, hair long, coarse and shaggy, with eyes black, penetrating and lustrous, and lips that smiled dismally, if at all, and in manner to leave a stranger in doubt whether the intent behind was hostile or friendly, he was decidedly repellent and forbidding in appearance and bearing. Yet, he was kind-hearted, sympathetic, generous, honest and truthful. All there was bad in him, was the appearance nature had forced upon him, and which he could neither cast off, nor quite counterbalance by the genuine and lovable qualities abounding in him.

He had excellent intellectual endowments; was eminently studious and reflective in his habits; well-read in the law, and capable of instituting and carrying forward the closest scrutiny. Perhaps he was inclined to be technical, instead of resting mainly on fundamental principles and the applications thereof to cases in hand. But he was always efficient, and often exceedingly powerful.

His educational advantages were not liberal; only such as the common schools and academies of New England furnished in his youthful days; but by industry and application he made up for the deficiencies to which he was subject, even in early manhood was proficient and exact in the use of his native language.

He was born in Salisbury, Conn., May 12, 1815, and was nearly sixty-two years old when he died.

In 1834 he went from Connecticut to Middlebury, Vt. The proclivity to politics was so strong in him that the next year he was a delegate to the Democratic State Convention. He had then scarcely reached his majority; but, unquestionably, he served with zeal, if not with the knowledge he evinced in his maturer years.

In 1836 he came to Mount Pleasant, this county, to teach a school, for which employment he was well qualified. He was not content, and felt a desire to go West. That same year he journeyed as far as Cincinnati, seeking a place to locate permanently, but did not find it, and retraced his way as far as Carbondale. In 1837 he again went to Cincinnati, but returned as far as Pittsburgh, where he spent the autumn of that year. Unsatisfied, he returned to Carbondale, determined to remain, and became a student-at-law, in the office of Lewis Jones, Esq. In 1838 he was admitted to the bar of Luzerne County, and was soon regarded as one of the most promising young members of the profession.

In 1840 he entered actively into the Presidential canvass, on the Democratic side, and soon acquired popularity as a political speaker. And this leads necessarily to statement and comment upon the sources of his power as a speaker, whether at the bar or before assemblies of the people. He was certainly not an orator. Neither in voice nor action was he eloquent. But he was exceedingly effective. He did not allow himself to speak until he was fully prepared, and then only in the line of his convictions. He was fluent, earnest, pointed, impassioned. What he lacked in grace he made up by intensity of matter and method.

From 1840 up to his decease he was always active in politics, but was not personally a favorite with the masses. He did not know how to win by dissimulation.

In 1843 he was appointed post-master at Carbondale, which office he resigned in 1844, upon his removal to Honesdale. At once he took high rank at the Wayne County bar, and gained an enviable reputation, not only for learning in his calling, but for professional and personal integrity, which was never sullied by a questionable transaction.

Nevertheless, while zealous and influential in advancing the political interests of friends, he largely lacked the qualities requisite to secure his own promotion. He could neither fawn nor flatter. He was as decidedly lacking in self-assertion as he was in personal magnetism; but, invited to accept position, no matter what, he was equal to almost any requirement or obligation.

In 1853 he was elected to the popular branch of the General Assembly, and served with ability. He was ready, independent, forcible. He made himself conspicuous and powerful in opposing the enforced break in the gauge of railroads at Erie or elsewhere. This break was insisted on, because changing freight from one set of cars to another, at particular points, furnished employment to considerable numbers of laborers, and so was esteemed a local benefit. Now, it seems almost impossible to comprehend that views so narrow and unworthy could have been seriously entertained, and could have found prominent and efficient advocates. But so it was. Mr. Crane's hostility to the scheme was spontaneous and irresistible. It exposed him to the senseless imputation of being subsidized by railway corporations, but after his exposition of the matter the accusation was ineffectual.

In 1861 he was again elected to the General Assembly by the Republicans, as a war Democrat. His speeches in the canvass were among the ablest made in Pennsylvania during the Rebellion.

In 1874 an extraordinary complication occurred, touching the president judgeship of Wayne and Pike Counties, and at the solicitation of hundreds of personal and party friends, he was induced to let his name go to the people as an independent Democratic candidate for the position. His competitors were Charles P. Waller, of Wayne County, as the Republican nominee, and D. M. Van Auken, of Pike County, as the regular Democratic candidate. The contest was a bitter and exciting one. Mr. Waller received 2588 votes, Mr. Van Auken 1257 and Mr. Crane 2176 votes. Considering that Mr. Crane did not have the support of either party organization, but was sustained only by his individual merits, the result was decidedly complimentary to him.

This was the last time he was a candidate for public office; while he evinced his old-time interest in political concerns, and acted with the Democrats, it was manifest he regarded his period of individual activity as closed.

In social life he remained what he had always been to his intimate friends. What an amplitude of sympathy, generosity and good fellowship lay concealed behind the reserve which was habitual to him before the public! While on the street he appeared to be haughty, taciturn and unapproachable; in his own home, or in the homes of his familiars, few persons contrived to be so winsome and agreeable.

Mr. Crane, in 1844, married Miss Olivia Sims, of Philadelphia. The union was a happy one but was childless. A few years before he died the deep shadow of insanity fell upon his companion, and she was removed to the Philadelphia Asylum, where she remains. There was a touch of almost infinite care and tenderness in his treatment of her until her absolute seclusion became imperative, and then a deep, impenetrable sorrow settled upon his life. His home was, indeed, desolate; with no child to bear him company, with no near kindred, except a young nephew, whose tenderness was loyal and complete, his life became parched and withered. One evening a friend called at his dwelling and spent an hour with him. His mind, subdued and mellowed by affliction, stored inexhaustibly by reminiscence and enriched by abundant reading and cogitation, made him especially attractive; at the moment of parting he grasped his neighbor's hand, tears came into his eyes and he seemed the embodiment of desolation. The heartfelt thanks he expressed for the recognition accorded has lasted until now as a most cherished recollection.

On Saturday, the 6th of January, 1877, he suffered from severe pains near or in the heart. He had before experienced like attacks, which he attributed to indigestion, so that he felt no alarm at that illness. On Sunday he was still unwell, but was up and about his dwelling and went over to the Allen House. On Monday his sufferings increased insomuch that he went to bed and sent for his physician. The examination convinced the doctor that there was serious trouble, but he hoped the disease might yield to treatment, for a time at least. During the day some improvement in the case was manifest, but it proved to be temporary. At seven o'clock in the evening a paroxysm of agony seized him. His nephew folded him in his arms and in a few moments all was over. Soon the traces of agony faded from his countenance, and only the repose of death remained.

Charles Sherman Minor, son of Sherman and Jerusha E. Minor, was born in Washington, Connecticut, January 11, 1817. He soon afterward removed to Roxbury, Connecticut. He there fitted for college, attending the academy in that place for six months, but for the most part pursuing his studies alone. He entered Yale College in 1837, and was graduated from that institution in 1841. He soon afterward went to Wellsboro', Tioga County, Pa., and for two years taught in the academy at that place, meantime studying law under the direction of James Lowrey. He then attended the New Haven Law School for one year and was admitted to the bar in New Haven. In 1844 he came to Honesdale, and December 3, 1844, was admitted to the bar of Wayne County. In 1845 he formed a partnership with Earl Wheeler, which continued for one year, and thereafter he practiced alone. In the summer of 1862 he was appointed by Governor Curtin a commissioner to make the first draft for troops to fill the quota of the State for service in the Union army, and was occupied for several months with the duties of this position. Soon afterward his health became so much impaired that he was obliged to suspend all professional labors for some time. In the fall of 1863, hoping for benefit from a change of climate, he accepted a position in the Treasury Department at Washington. He was soon afterward sent to California on important business of the department. In July, 1864, his health being restored, he returned to Honesdale and resumed the duties of his profession. Since 1869 he has been a trustee of the State Hospital for the Insane.

Mr. Minor has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Harriet I. Bache, of Wellsboro', to whom he was married May 19, 1846. She was attacked by a malignant fever a few months later, and died October 19, 1846. He, also, was attacked by the same malady, but recovered after a protracted sickness. March 30, 1848, he was married to Miss Nancy P. Brown, of Utica, N. Y. They have had one son—Charles Fletcher, who was drowned May 31, 1853, when a little more than four years old—and two daughters: Harriet E. and Catherine B., both of whom reside in Honesdale.

In years and experience, in professional acquirements, character and ability, Mr. Minor may justly be regarded as the Nestor of the Wayne County bar. He has been a life-long student, and his professional and scholarly attainments are of an unusual order. His arguments at the bar are characterized by a lucid statement and an effective grouping of facts, a breadth of view, a scope of thought, a mastery of principles, a grasp of details, a logical precision and force of reasoning rarely combined. In his view, the law is not a mere system of abstractions or artificial theories, nor yet a scheme of snares, pitfalls and traps for the ignorant and unwary; but is essentially a science, the perfection of human reason, designed for the government of mankind on the highest attainable plane of justice and equity. As such he presents, expounds and applies it. For the practice of law as a system of devices to perplex the understanding,—to make the worse appear the better cause, to promote the success of wrong and the sacrifice of right,—he has no tolerance.

Hon. Samuel E. Dimmick.—Nature was gracious and bountiful to him. It gave him a handsome body, a full, sonorous and mellow voice, easy and appropriate gesticulation, and a general contour and bearing of unusual attractiveness. These accessories were of high value to him in social circles, in the practice of his chosen profession and before assemblies of the people. His presence and action largely disarmed criticism and gave him credit and authority beyond the measure that would have been conceded to him strictly on the score of intellectual capacities and acquirements. He did not, indeed, belong to that large class of men who float easily and securely in professional or public life mainly by reason of admirable physical characteristics, but he was immeasurably helped thereby, obtaining consideration and favor that would not have been yielded to him had he been of contemptible or repulsive bodily appearance. On the street young men would stand, as charmed, and watch him till he passed out of sight.

Of the faculty of pure reason, as exemplified by Kant or Calhoun, he had not overmuch. His comprehension of first principles and power of applying them to specific cases, while not conspicuously lacking to ordinary scrutiny, upon definite measurement was comparatively meagre. Of imagination, and particularly in such sub-divisions thereof as wit and humor, he was manifestly deficient. In understanding—that supremest faculty for all common ends—he abounded. What special mental strength he had lay therein. This vigorous common sense was his peculiar equipment, and in his calling and way of life it was adequate to his needs. If his preliminary education had been liberal, or if he had supplied deficiencies by self-improvement, he would have been strong even among strongest men. As he was, he commanded an enviable position at the bar.

In his student years, as in the earlier period of his practice in the courts, his application was close and uniform, and he became well-grounded in the law, and especially in law relating to corporations. He was a wise and safe counselor, and all the more because he had a completer comprehension of practical business affairs than falls to the lot of most lawyers. He succeeded remarkably well as an advocate, his evident sincerity of purpose and intense earnestness of manner producing favorable impressions and contributed powerfully to the ends he desired to attain. In the examination of witnesses it was not in his refined nature to badger or bully. In his arguments to the bench, while always clear and frequently conclusive, he often fell below the level of his reputation. Before promiscuous assemblies he was unquestionably the most popular orator of his era in the county, delighting even when he failed to convince and making friends for himself among multitudes whom he did not draw to the acceptance of the ideas he advocated. Yet his range of studies, aside from the law, was not ample. It was a wise conclusion to which he came, that in an age where knowledge in all departments had unprecedentedly increased, it was best to confine himself pretty closely to his chosen field of investigation. He adjudged it better to be a strong lawyer than to fritter away his powers on side studies, which would, indeed, enrich his elocution, but would seldom increase his effectiveness before judicial tribunals. He had before him instances in which men, his superiors in native capacities and in educational advantages, had fallen conspicuously behind him because their best and longest hours had been given to studies apart from professional obligations and requirements, and he was careful to avoid that mistake. He remembered the injunction of Blackstone, that "the law is a jealous mistress," and he did not toy with any others. Hence he was a lawyer, a good one, and little else. But this concentration of his life had large compensating advantages. It left no chance to fail, as many versatile men do, by spreading over too broad a surface, by having a superficial acquaintance with many topics, and a thorough and remunerative familiarity with none; who could not convert their multifarious information into a barrel of flour for their families, if they had most pressing need of such alchemy.

Starting in life a Democrat, according to the traditions of his family, he early imbibed radical views against the institution of domestic slavery. And this phase of his development was the more peculiar in that it seemed to be eccentric. He created, concerning himself, at least, a current suspicion that he had strong tendencies towards aristocracy. He made no concealment of his feeling that manual labor was menial and degrading, and that he would take no employment that was not exclusively intellectual. But he had an instinctive hatred of oppression, a genuine love of fair play, and a ready disposition to help the lowly and friendless. In 1856 he attached himself to the Free-Soil party, led by Martin Van Buren, but after the close of that campaign identified himself with the Republicans, and became prominent in their councils and movements.

The only public office of consequence he ever held was that of attorney-general, to which he was appointed by Governor J. F. Hartranft, in 1873. The duties thus devolved upon him were performed to the satisfaction of the executive, and in a manner to concentrate upon him the respectful attention of prominent and observant people in all parts of the commonwealth.

He was, indeed, a member of the convention called to revise the State Constitution in 1872, but he did not participate in the deliberations of that body, his appointment as attorney-general assigning him to other duties.

There was fulness in his social nature. He loved his family and friends cordially and with all his heart. He had, moreover, great kindliness for many beyond those close circles. As wealth increased in his possession, it did not contract his attachments nor deaden his sensibilities, but he remained approachable, open-handed, charitable.

SAMUEL E. DIMMICK.

He was a cousin to William H. Dimmick. His father was Alpheus, brother to Dan, the father of William.

Alpheus was born in Mansfield, Conn., November 22, 1787. He graduated at Yale College in 1810, and in 1814 was licensed in the Supreme Court of the State of New York as an attorney. He commenced practice soon after at Bloomingburg, N. Y., and continued to reside there until his death, which occurred January 17, 1865. He married Maria Can, of Frederick, Md., November 5, 1818.

Samuel E., their second child and son, was born at Bloomingburg December 24, 1822. He received such education as the scant schools of his native town proffered, and no more. In 1843 he engaged as a clerk in a crockery store in New York, and served for the space of one year. In 1844 he entered the office of his cousin, William H. Dimmick, as a student-at-law, and was admitted to the Wayne County bar May 6, 1846. He entered at once into partnership with his cousin, and continued therein until the death of the latter, in 1861. January 28, 1855, he married Miss Lucretia M. Benjamin, daughter of the late Joseph Benjamin, of the city of New York.

His physical constitution was not robust, and he was averse to such exercise as might have improved its tone. Hence office life, combined with close professional labor, proved to be incompatible with possession by him of sound health. When he reached the meridian of his years his bodily vitality was seriously impaired. In this conjuncture he accepted the attorney-generalship, and at a time when there was an unusual number of important commonwealth cases requiring investigation and trial. Then, too, by virtue of his office, he was a member of the Board of Pardons, and many convicted persons were pressing either for an amelioration or cancelment of the sentences under which they rested. He felt, and said, that his strength was not adequate to the burden resting on him, that the most suitable place for him was at home; but pride and ambition conspired to keep him from following the dictates of his sober judgment. To be sure, in the trial of State cases at Harrisburg he was efficiently assisted by Hon. Wayne McVeagh, but even this superior help left him more to do than his physical strength was adequate to perform.

Monday, October 4, 1875, he left home to attend a meeting of the Board of Pardons at Harrisburg. The condition of his health was such as to excite serious apprehensions on the part of his family and friends. His physician advised against the journey. But he would not yield. His wife went with him, to care for him as far as possible. At New York he parted with neighbors who had made the trip so far in his company. To them he seemed oppressed by a sense of his feeble condition and the premonition that he would not last to return alive. He remained overnight in New York, proceeded next day to Harrisburg, and attended a meeting of the Board of Pardons that evening. On Wednesday he did not leave his room. The next three nights he slept in his chair, not being able to endure a reclining position. Pneumonia appeared. His system was too much enfeebled to make effectual resistance to its progress. On Monday evening he received visitors, who retired at an early hour. At eleven o'clock, alone with his wife, a change passed over him and in a few moments he was dead.

Thus ceased a life, mainly uneventful, but which seemed just blossoming to an abundant fruition.

George G. Waller, son of Phineas and Eliza Waller, and a younger brother of Hon. Charles P. Waller, was born in Wilkes-Barre May 3, 1821. He was graduated from Williams College in 1844. After the prescribed course of legal study, under the direction of Judge Collins, he was admitted to the bar of Luzerne County in 1846. After practicing for a year at Bloomsburg, Columbia County, he returned to Wilkes-Barre and formed a partnership with Judge Collins. In the fall of 1849 he came to Honesdale, temporarily, to assist his brother Charles, who was beginning to suffer in health. The next year, deciding to remain, he entered into partnership with his brother,—the firm-name being C. P. & G. G. Waller,—and has since continued the practice of law in Honesdale.

October 11, 1854, Mr. Waller was married to Lizzie J., daughter of Hon. B. S. Bentley, of Montrose. They have had two sons, who died in childhood; a daughter, Annie, who died in May, 1878, at the age of fifteen; and a daughter, Bessie, born September 24, 1868.

Mr. Waller has always been a hard worker in his profession. In quickness of perception, rapidity of thought, promptness of decision and power of close and continued application he has few equals. His cases show a completeness of preparation that overlooks nothing; while, at the same time, few surpass him in ready and dextrous management when an emergency demands action without due preparation. With unforeseen difficulties come swift suggestions of their remedy, and instantly-devised plans for meeting them. As an advocate, he is earnest, forcible and effective. His statement of a case is often, of itself, an argument, giving it an aspect of justice and reason well calculated to carry conviction to the minds of a jury. He has the power of terse description, sententious presentation, apt illustration and pithy characterization—otherwise known as "the art of putting things"—in a remarkable degree. To divest a thing of the form in which he has put it is often the most difficult task of the counsel who follow him. His discussion of evidence is marked by a marvelous memory of its details; by a logical keenness and discrimination that bring into view its most telling features, while masking its weak points; by an ingenious construction of ambiguous testimony that develops its strongest aspect; by acute suggestions as to circumstances but indistinctly appearing, or with a bearing more or less obscure; by adroit allusions to matters lying on the border line of proof; by shrewd and pungent criticism of counter-testimony;—and his application of the law is close and pointed, marked by compact argument and a cogent presentation of authorities. No lawyer is less technical, but none has a firmer grasp of the substance of a case. His practice has been varied and extensive, and he has been engaged in most of the important cases, both civil and criminal, that have been tried in the county during the past thirty-five years.

Ebenezer Richardson, son of Ebenezer and Mary Richardson, was born at Pittsfield, Berkshire County, Mass., May 16, 1816. In April, 1828, he removed with his parents to Preston, Chenango County, N. Y. He was educated at Hastings' High School, in Norwich, Chenango County. March 26, 1840, he was married to Miss Holt, of Steuben County, N. Y., and in June, 1843, he removed to Mount Pleasant, Wayne County. He subsequently read law under the direction of C. P. Waller, and was admitted to the bar December 3, 1850. He opened an office in Hawley, December 25th, and has since continued in practice at that place. He is chiefly engaged in office business, and seldom appears in court.

Jackson Woodward was a son of John K. Woodward, a younger brother of Hon. Warren J. Woodward, and a nephew of Hon. George W. Woodward. He was born in Bethany about the year 1822. After reaching manhood he was largely employed in the various county offices, and while thus engaged he studied law under the direction of R. M. Grenell and F. M. Crane. He was admitted to the bar December 7, 1850. May 5, 1853, F. M. Crane, district attorney, resigned that office, and Mr. Woodward was appointed to fill the vacancy. In October following he was elected for the full term without opposition, and in 1859 he was again elected. He died at Bethany, March 11, 1866.

Francis Drake came to Wayne County from the State of New York. June 1, 1848, in connection with George M. Reynolds, he commenced the publication of a newspaper called the National Reformer, supporting Van Buren, in opposition to Cass, the regular Democratic candidate for President. The enterprise came to an end soon after the election, and early in 1849 Mr. Reynolds removed the printing materials to Carbondale, and there commenced the publication of the Lackawanna Journal. Mr. Drake afterward read law under the direction of S. G. Throop, and was admitted to the bar February 5, 1852. His practice was principally before justices. In 1856 he was the Republican candidate for district attorney, but was defeated by Henry Peet, the Democratic nominee. He died in the autumn of 1859.

Edward Oscar Hamlin, son of Hon. Ephraim W. Hamlin, was born at Bethany, Wayne County, June 12, 1828. He received his preparatory education at his native place, under Rev. Willard Richardson; entered Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., in advance, in 1848, and was graduated from that institution in the class of '50. He commenced reading law at Wilkes-Barre with Hon. George W. Woodward, and finished the course of study at Honesdale, under the direction of Earl Wheeler. He was admitted to the bar September 7, 1852. After practicing for two years in Honesdale he decided to go West, and soon afterward settled in Minnesota. He rapidly rose in his profession, and a vacancy occurring in the judgeship of the Fourth Judicial District, he was appointed to that position by Governor Sibley. On the expiration of his commission he resumed practice at the bar in St. Cloud.

While a resident of Minnesota, Judge Hamlin held a high position, both professionally and socially. Being a Democrat, however, and therefore in a permanent minority, no opportunity was presented for a political career; yet he was a leader in his party, and his ability and integrity were recognized on all sides. He was elected the first mayor of the city of St. Cloud. On retiring from the bench he was appointed by Governor Ramsay a member of the State Normal Board of Public Instruction, and continued to fill this position until his removal from the State. He was also appointed by Governor Ramsay a member of the Board of Regents of the State University. Soon after the outbreak of the Rebellion, in 1861, Governor Ramsay, without solicitation, tendered him a commission as major of the Seventh Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, but his eyesight being defective, he was obliged to decline it. In the same year he received the Democratic nomination for Governor, and he was subsequently a candidate on the Democratic ticket for Judge of the Supreme Court. In 1864 he was delegate to the Democratic National Convention. On the floor of the Convention he denounced the platform adopted, because it declared the war for the Union a failure; and he was one of the four delegates who voted against it on that ground. In 1865, though a resident of Minnesota, he was nominated by the Democratic Convention of Wayne County for president judge of the Twenty-second Judicial District; in the Judicial Conference, however, Judge Barrett was renominated.

In 1873, yielding to the solicitations of his parents, Judge Hamlin returned to Wayne County and opened an office in Honesdale. In 1874 he was elected to the vestry of Grace Church, in that borough, of which body he has since continued to be a member and the secretary. After a short residence at the county-seat he removed to Bethany, which has since been his home. He continued the practice of his profession in Honesdale until June, 1885, when failing health compelled him to quit it.

Judge Hamlin was twice married. His first wife was Mary A., daughter of Judge Eldred, of Bethany; she died Sept. 27, 1868. His present wife is Ella F., daughter of E. B. Strong, clerk of the District Court of Stearns County, Minn. He has two sons,—Frank E., a lawyer at St. Paul, Minn., and Warren E., a jeweler, of Atkinson, Neb.

Judge Hamlin's mental powers, culture and professional attainments are of a superior order. His arguments at the bar were marked by wide research, acute logic, clearness of statement and accuracy in the application of legal principles. He was among the most eloquent of advocates before a jury, presenting a case in the light of reason, equity and fair dealing as between man and man, and with rare force of argument and demonstration. His arguments were naturally, in a large measure, a reflection of the earnestness, high moral tone, noble sentiment and devotion to principle, which are prominent traits of his character. He commanded the respect of the bench, the bar and the people and will long be remembered as one whose influence was exerted to elevate the standard of the profession in every aspect.

Henry Wilson, or Judge Wilson, as he is familiarly known, was born in the town of Franklin, Susquehanna County, Pa., October 7, 1834. He studied law with D. N. Lathrope, at Carbondale, and was admitted to the bar of Luzerne County in 1859. During his novitiate, and for many years after his admission, by close study and the exercise of a phenomenal memory, he acquired a most comprehensive knowledge of the law, both scientific and practical, which enabled him in after-life to readily perceive the legal aspect of every combination of facts, and apply the governing principles of law with facility and accuracy. His studies were not confined to the law, but being by nature a student, and endowed with intellectual faculties of a high order, he acquired an unusual familiarity with history, politics, political economy, science and literature.

In 1869 Hon. C. C. Jadwin, who had known Judge Wilson from boyhood, after several unsuccessful attempts to secure a suitable editor for the Honesdale Citizen, induced him to assume an experimental charge of that paper, which soon became permanent, and he thereupon removed to Honesdale. For several years he paid but little attention to professional business, devoting his time chiefly to his editorial duties, discussing the current public questions with such masterly ability and convincing force that the Citizen's articles were largely copied in the State and elsewhere. There may be found among the files of the Citizen, from the pen of Judge Wilson, some of the ablest articles extant on the subjects of political economy and finance. There, also, from the same trenchant pen, may be found some of the most caustic and complete exposures of the arts and wiles of demagogism, social and political, while numerous other productions exhibit rare powers of humor and sarcasm. Together with his varied abilities as a general writer, Judge Wilson possesses what is commonly known as a "legal mind," with an unusual fondness for professional studies, and when his legal attainments became known to his friends in Wayne County he was urged to resume practice, and finally decided to do so. He is now retained in almost every case of importance tried in our courts. His arguments on questions of law are always instructive, cogent and logical, and so strongly fortified by reference to the authorities and principles of law applicable to the subject matter, that he at once challenges the attention of the court and retains it throughout. He is distinguished as being one of the very few lawyers who command the attention of the judges of the Supreme Court. His presentation of points of law is clear, orderly and direct, with an accuracy in the use of language and pertinency of illustration rarely equaled. He never advances as undoubted law anything in which he has not full faith, and which he cannot fortify with authorities or analogous principles; and while possessing an unusual familiarity with precedents, his habit of mind leads him to place every proposition of law on a firm basis of established principles, rather than on the chance authority of an isolated decision or ruling. Herein, too, is often exhibited his wonderful power of memory and accuracy in the citation of authorities. If any of his propositions are questioned, he frequently calls to mind and cites all the leading cases on the subject, giving the names of the parties and the book in which each case is reported. His abilities as a lawyer are best known to the members of the bar, and where his opinion has been given there is, if not a general acquiescence amongst them, at least a marked hesitancy in denying the correctness of his views. On questions of practice and pleading, especially, he is regarded by common consent as being, next to the courts, the final authority. He is also distinguished for conciseness and accuracy in the preparation of legal documents, forms, etc. In recognition of this, a leading law-blank publishing house of Philadelphia has paid him the compliment of stealing bodily, and publishing as its own, a comprehensive form of lease, which he had prepared, after much study and consideration, for the use of the bar of the county. A prominent trait of his character is his uniform kindness and willingness to assist younger attorneys who desire information on questions of law or procedure. It is not an infrequent occurrence for other attorneys, after an unsuccessful search through the books, to question Judge Wilson, and be referred at once to an authority in point.

In January, 1876, he was appointed associate judge,—the first instance in the history of the county of that position being filled by a member of the bar. He declined the nomination in the following fall, and at the close of the year resumed the practice of his profession. While he was on the bench the court decided on a revision of the court rules, and this task was assigned to Judge Wilson. To the rules as revised he attached a table of the decisions in which they were applied, illustrated or construed, a work which, at the time, was of great value, as the decisions had not been digested for twenty years. In an appendix he added a list of the special acts of Assembly relative to Wayne County, together with a compendium of the statutes and decisions relating to proceedings, under the road and bridge laws, which has given much assistance to both bench and bar.

Another conspicuous trait in his character is his absolute disregard of adverse opinions or criticism when satisfied that he is in the right. Knowing what a fickle thing public opinion is, he never courts it, but often combats it editorially when it is based on erroneous principles, or is being manufactured by unscrupulous men for political or selfish purposes. Modest, courteous and unassuming, he is nevertheless a positive working force, both in journalism and at the bar.

William H. Dimmick, the younger, is a son of Oliver S. Dimmick, and a grandson of Dan Dimmick, the first practicing attorney who made a permanent home within the original limits of Wayne County. He was born in Milford, Pike County, March 19, 1841. He received a liberal education, and was graduated from the Claverack (N. Y.) Institute. He commenced his studies for the bar in the office of L. F. Barnes, at Milford, but soon afterward removed to Honesdale and completed his preparation under the direction of William H. & S. E. Dimmick. He was admitted to the bar December 4, 1862. After the death of his uncle, William H. Dimmick, he formed a partnership with Samuel E. Dimmick, which continued until the death of the latter, in 1875.

Mr. Dimmick was elected district attorney in 1864, and re-elected in 1867. In 1869 he was elected to the Legislature, and in 1873 was again elected. In 1874 he was the nominee of the Democratic Convention of Wayne County for president judge, but before the election he withdrew in favor of Hon. D. M. Van Auken, of Pike County. In 1878 he was the Democratic nominee of the district for Congress, Colonel Overton, of Bradford County, being his Republican opponent. The Greenback party, then at its highest estate, placed a candidate in the field. The triangular contest divided both the old parties, and resulted in the election of Colonel Overton by a small plurality.

In October, 1864, Mr. Dimmick was married to Annie, daughter of the late Zenas Russell. They have two children,—Lucy and Russell.

In personal qualities, Mr. Dimmick is a man of genial nature, generous impulses and peculiar tenacity in his friendships. In mental structure he is formed much on the model of "Odysseus of many counsels and devices." His leading characteristics are force of character, fertility in resources and expedients, a keen discernment of human nature, an instinctive perception of essential conditions and existing possibilities in any prospective line of action, with rare tact and dexterity in devising methods, forming varied combinations and adapting means to ends, readiness in meeting difficulties, and a confidence that never fails under the most threatening aspect of affairs. For more than twenty years he has been prominent in the politics and at the bar of the county, and these qualities have been conspicuously displayed in both fields. He is a graceful, eloquent and persuasive speaker, and his oratory is alike effective whether addressed to a popular assembly or to a jury. He has been engaged in some of the most important trials that have taken place in the county since his admission to the bar. Among these were the trials of Burke, Boyle and Jillard for murder, while he was district attorney; of Benjamin K. Bortree for the murder of Henry W. Shouse, 1880, and of the two men giving their names as Thomas Lyons and Walter Hagan, for a buglary committed at Equinunk, attended with the shooting of H. N. Farley, in 1881. He is also employed as attorney for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, the Pennsylvania Coal Company and the Erie and Wyoming Valley Railroad Company.

George F. Bentley was a son of Hon. B. S. Bentley, for a long time one of the leaders of the Susquehanna County bar, but who subsequently removed to Williamsport, Lycoming County, Pa. He was born in Montrose June 9, 1842. He passed a portion of his youth in Honesdale, where a sister, the wife of G. G. Waller, resided, and during this period he attended the Honesdale Academy. His education was completed at the High School in Aurora, N. Y. Early in 1864 he commenced the study of law in the office of C. P. & G. G. Waller, in Honesdale, and February 7, 1866, was admitted to the bar. He soon afterward formed a partnership with his preceptors, which continued until his death, October 4, 1881.

In Mr. Bentley was developed a rare combination of admirable qualities. Few men have possessed, in a higher degree, the elements of character that win friendship and command esteem, and there are few whose death has been felt as a personal bereavement throughout a wider circle. To discern the true nobleness of his nature, indeed, no special intimacy or close association was necessary; it was manifest to all,—it was unmistakable and unchanging,—and his daily life was its natural outgrowth. In whatever field of action he appeared—in social and private life, in the church, at the bar, and in matters that engaged public interest—he was single-hearted and conscientious, and made the visible record of a modest, manly and honorable character. He was an earnest friend, too generous to cherish enmity, and too just to entertain envy or jealousy. His intelligence and culture were recognized as more than ordinary. At the bar he displayed marked ability, and was rapidly rising. In everything in which he was engaged, whether in or out of his profession, his work was marked by accuracy and thoroughness. He neglected no duty, and was faithful to every trust. He interested himself, especially, in every worthy pursuit, having in view either usefulness, instruction or amusement, in which the young men of the community were engaged, and his influence was seen in the high standard of character and efficiency maintained in the various associations with which he was connected. Company E, Thirteenth Regiment, N. G. P., of which he was the first captain, owed its existence and high military standing largely to his efforts.

In April, 1865, Mr. Bentley made a profession of religion, and united with the Presbyterian Church of Honesdale. His life bore constant testimony to the sincerity of his profession. He was superintendent of the Sunday-school for several years, and at all times interested himself largely in the work of the church and the Sunday-school.

In May, 1870, he was married to Miss Lucy Tracy, youngest daughter of the late Hon. T. H. R. Tracy. She, with three children, survives him.

GEORGE S. PURDY, oldest son of Abbott N. and Eliza D. Purdy, was born in Paupack, Wayne County, January 24, 1839. He obtained a good education, largely as the result of his own energy, studious habits and efforts for self-improvement, and became especially proficient in mathematics. A part of his early manhood was passed in teaching, and for some time he was principal of the graded school in Providence, Pa. In 1866 he was appointed clerk by the commissioners of Wayne County, and held the position for ten years. While thus employed he read law, and was admitted to the bar May 9, 1873. In September following he was married to Agnes C. Addoms, a step-daughter of Judge Avery, of Honesdale.

In 1883 Mr. Purdy received the nomination of the Wayne County Democratic Convention for president judge. The Democrats of Pike presented Hon. D. M. Van Auken as their nominee, and the conferees who represented the two counties were unable to agree. Both Democratic candidates remained in the field, with Judge Seely as the Republican candidate. Mr. Purdy received a majority in Wayne County, but lack of time prevented an adequate canvass of Pike in his behalf, and the bulk of the party vote in that county was given to Mr. Van Auken, resulting in the election of Judge Seely by a plurality of two hundred and sixty-one. The contest had been bitter and acrimonious, but Mr. Purdy met the result with such admirable temper as to command the respect even of his opponents.

Professionally, Mr. Purdy is favorably known throughout the county. He is methodical in preparation, energetic and wary in management, earnest, comprehensive and strenuous in argument. He investigates with peculiar care and diligence, making a close examination of the questions presented, and reducing the results to definite conclusions of law and fact. Among his prominent traits are coolness and self-possession, with a steadiness of purpose and mental equipoise not easily shaken. He has taken part in the trial of various important cases and has scored some notable victories at the bar.

PETER P. SMITH, third child of Owen and Catherine Smith, was born in Honesdale June 2, 1851. His education was obtained in the local schools. His legal studies were pursued in Honesdale under the direction of Henry Wilson, and, May 7, 1874, he was admitted to the bar.

A difficult and discouraging task lies before the young man who, in the place where his boyhood and youth have been passed, enters upon a calling in which a large measure of public confidence in his professional attainments, experience and sound judgment is an essential condition of success. Whatever his ability or acquirements, the community that has known him chiefly as a boy, untried in the duties of life, is slow to realize that he has become a man, with a man's capacities, powers and purposes.

Such was the task to which the young attorney addressed himself, in the present instance, in opening an office in Honesdale upon his admission to practice. Though possessing no adventitious aids, the struggle on which he entered was by no means an unequal one. His preparation for the profession had been careful and systematic, and he well understood that the period of study, so far from closing with admission to the bar, was little more than the beginning of a legal education. A further course of study was marked out and steadily pursued.

While yet a student, he had shown unusual readiness, capacity, and faculty of well-directed application, and with the continued development of his powers he attracted attention as a young lawyer of superior professional acquirements. In 1875 he was elected district attorney, and in discharging the duties of this office he found opportunities which his preparation enabled him to improve. Various cases of peculiar difficulty came to his hands as public prosecutor. One of these, which came up at the first term of court after entering upon the office, gave rise to much comment among the profession. It was a prosecution for perjury, alleged to have been committed by the defendant in testifying in an action brought against himself and another person as executors de son tort. The circumstances were such that it was a matter of no little difficulty to draw the indictment properly. No precedent was to be found in the books, and the young district attorney, in framing the instrument, had no resource but in the application of the general principles relating to the subject. How correctly these were applied was shown in the sequel. Messrs. Crane and Seely, in behalf of the defense, assailed the indictment as insufficient, but the court sustained it, declaring it drawn with remarkable clearness and precision. Later, in a prosecution for arson with intent to defraud insurance companies, the district attorney was opposed by his late preceptor, Judge Wilson, but after a close examination the latter was obliged to pronounce the indictments sufficient.

In another instance, Mr. Minor, the oldest member of the bar, and one of the most accurate of pleaders, was employed for the defense, and after the trial he complimented Mr. Smith on the skill exhibited in framing the indictment, adding that he had examined it very critically, with the hope of finding some flaw in it, but was unable to detect any. During his term of office he was required to deal with other cases, presenting some peculiar difficulty, in all of which his management was highly creditable. The forms of various indictments which he prepared have since been printed by a Philadelphia law publishing house, and adopted by the profession throughout the State. At the close of his official term he was renominated by acclamation, but declined, in order to give closer attention to his rapidly increasing private practice.

By this time his abilities had become widely recognized, and thenceforth his advancement in the profession was rapid and permanent. His aid was sought in numerous important cases. In the celebrated series of trials known as the "Hollisterville Cases," in 1879, he was employed by the prosecution and showed ability of a high order in their management. On the trial of Benjamin K. Bortree, for murder, in December, 1880, he was engaged for the defense and contributed largely to the result of saving the defendant from the highest penalty of the law. On the trial of James P. McCabe, for murder, in March, 1886, he took the leading part in conducting the prosecution. Although the case was wholly one of circumstantial evidence, and the defense was conducted with rare ability, the testimony for the commonwealth was so effectively presented, and its bearing argued with such convincing force, that a verdict of murder in the first degree was speedily reached.

It is not in criminal cases alone that Mr. Smith's professional attainments have been exhibited. His practice has embraced numerous and important cases in the civil courts, besides an office business of a varied and extensive character. In this field he has shown many of the highest qualities, both as a lawyer and an advocate, and his care, industry and vigilance in research permit nothing essential to be overlooked. He possesses, in a high degree, the characteristics that distinguish the leaders of the profession,—a ready grasp of the most complicated questions of both law and fact; an instinctive perception of the vital points in controversy and of the legal principles that must govern their determination; a quick perception of the true bearing of every point, and unerring judgment in discriminating between the material and the immaterial; patience and thoroughness in preparation; tact, address and discretion in the presentation of cases; and logical force, candor and earnestness in argument. His success at the bar has been won by his natural endowments, supplemented by careful, systematic and thorough professional training. His success is the more noteworthy from the circumstance that he is the only man at the bar of the county, excepting Judge Seely, who has achieved a substantial success in the community in which he was born and reared. He has attained a professional eminence almost without precedent in one of his years, under similar conditions.

William Henry Lee, oldest child of Samuel and Anna M. Lee, was born January 1, 1849, in Clinton, Wayne County. His education was begun in the local schools, followed by a thorough course of study at the Waymart Normal School and the Delaware Literary Institute, Franklin, N. Y. On his graduation from the latter, in June, 1871, he was awarded second honors. At intervals during his studies he engaged in teaching. In March, 1866, he received from Rev. E. O. Ward, county school superintendent, his first teacher's certificate. In 1870 he received the "Regent's Certificate," from the New York State Board of Regents. In 1871 he received a county professional certificate, and in 1874 received one of the first permanent certificates granted in the county. Besides teaching various public schools in the county, he taught the school at Meredith Square, Delaware County, N. Y., and the Normal School at Waymart, Wayne County. He commenced his legal studies in 1871 under the direction of S. E. Dimmick. In the spring of 1873 he entered the office of Wallers & Bentley, and remained there until admitted to the bar, December 10, 1874. He has since been admitted to the bar of Pike and Susquehanna Counties.

In 1875 he was appointed deputy treasurer of the county, and held the position for three years. For the past seven years he has been attorney for the borough of Honesdale. For several years he has been successively chosen judge of election.

Since his admission Mr. Lee has been actively engaged in the practice of his profession. He is among the best read of those who have come to the bar during the past twelve years, and is one of the most energetic and tireless workers in the profession. He is an earnest and fluent speaker and a close reasoner, and his presentation of both law and fact are clear, thorough and effective.

Elwin C. Mumford, a son of ex-Judge Mumford, was born at Starucca, Wayne County, August 8, 1851. He received a good education, read law with Wallers & Bentley and was admitted September 6, 1876. In 1878 he was elected district attorney. During his term of office the trials of Mrs. Van Alstine and Benjamin K. Bortree, for murder, took place, and also the noted "Hollisterville Cases." In March, 1886, he defended John Howell, who was indicted for the murder of his four children, the result being an acquittal on the ground of insanity. Mr. Mumford is attorney for a large mercantile agency, and gives much attention to the practical application of legal methods to matters growing out of the relation of debtor and creditor. In this field he ranks as one of the most alert and efficient attorneys at the bar.

Homer Greene was born January 10, 1853, at Number 19, in Salem (now Ariel, in Lake), township, Wayne County, Pa. He is the only son of Hon. Giles Greene, of that place. He was graduated from Union College with the class of 1876, receiving the degrees of A.B. and C.E.; and from the Albany Law School with the class of 1877, receiving the degree of LL.B. He was, at the same time, admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of New York State.

In the summer of 1877 he came to Honesdale and entered upon a course of study in the office of H. M. Seely, Esq., and was admitted to the bar of Wayne County December 10, 1878.

In the fall of 1881 he was elected district attorney of Wayne County, on the Republican ticket, and held that office for one term of three years, at the end of which time he resumed the private practice of the law.

Mr. Greene has attained considerable eminence in the field of literature, and the reader is referred to that portion of the chapter upon Honesdale, which is devoted to the press and writers, where a more extended sketch of him will be found.

William J. Tracy was the youngest son of Milton C. Tracy, and was born in the city of New York February 16, 1859. He studied for the bar at Columbia Law School, New York, and in Honesdale, under the direction of F. M. Crane. He was admitted to the bar May 7, 1879. He soon afterward formed a partnership with Hon. E. O. Hamlin. In 1882 he was appointed attorney for the county commissioners, and held the position for three years.

Alonzo T. Searle, third son of Rev. R. T. and Emily A. Searle, was born in Berkshire County, Mass., September 13, 1857. He was graduated from Amherst College in 1877. After reading law for some time in Williamsport, Pa., he completed the course of study in Honesdale, under the direction of G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar October 2, 1882. After admission he formed a partnership with Mr. Waller, the firm-name being Waller & Searle.

Frank M. Monaghan, youngest son of Richard and Elizabeth Monaghan, was born in Honesdale May 10, 1857. He was educated in the public schools of his native place, and for several years was employed as a teacher. He read law under the direction of William H. Dimmick, and was admitted to the bar October 2, 1882. In 1884 he was elected district attorney, without opposition.

Orville L. Rowland, second son of Hon. George H. and Kate A. Rowland, was born in Lackawaxen township, Pike County, November 20, 1859. His education was acquired in the local schools and at Wyoming Seminary. He studied law under the direction of H. M. Seely. He was graduated from the Albany Law School in November, 1880, and was admitted to the bar of Wayne County December 4, 1882.

James J. McCarty and Charles A. McCarty are sons of James and Margaret McCarty, of Canaan, Wayne County, and are natives of that township.

James was born December 18, 1855. He began his education in the local schools, and afterward attended the Prompton Normal School. He was graduated from the Law School of the University of Michigan March 26, 1884, and was admitted to the bar of Wayne County October 6, 1884.

Charles McCarty was born February 22, 1858. His education began in the local schools, and he subsequently attended Wyoming Seminary, at Kingston, Pa. He studied law under the direction of George G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar May 10, 1883. He commenced practice in Honesdale, and on the admission of James, the brothers formed a partnership. On the trial of James P. McCabe for the murder of Michael Reilly, at March Term, 1886, they were associated with Cornelius Smith, of Scranton, the elder brother opening the case for the defense and the younger making the opening argument.

M. M. Treadwell, son of Nathaniel and Emeline C. Treadwell, was born at Ipswich, Mass., September 17, 1842. He was educated in the local schools. During the Rebellion he entered the Union army; enlisting in June, 1861, in the Twelfth Massachusetts volunteers. He served first as commissary sergeant, and subsequently as quartermaster. July 8, 1864, he was mustered out with his regiment, its term of enlistment having expired. In November following he returned to City Point, Va., where he was employed in a civil capacity at army headquarters until the close of the war. Some four years later he came to Wayne County. He read law under the direction of E. Richardson, in Hawley, and was admitted to the bar December 5, 1883. He has since been engaged in practice in Hawley.

Frank P. Kimble, second son of Herman N. Kimble, was born in Palmyra, Pike County, October 17, 1852. He received a liberal education, and was graduated from the State Normal School, at Mansfield, in 1878. He read law under the direction of C. S. Minor, and was admitted to the bar March 3, 1886. During a part of his term of study he was employed as deputy prothonotary.

Myron E. Simons, youngest son of John Simons, was born in Sterling, Wayne County, May 14, 1860. He read law with Blakeslee & Davies, in Montrose, and was there admitted to practice. He came to Wayne County in January, 1885, and received the appointment of commissioners' clerk, which he still holds. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne County March 13, 1886.

Rhamanthus M. Stocker, son of Albert Stocker, was born in Salem, Wayne County, October 5, 1848. In addition to the education given by the local schools, he studied for some time at the Honesdale graded school and attended Lafayette College for a year. For several years he was engaged in teaching, and for four years was principal of the graded school in Jermyn, Luzerne (now Lackawanna) County. In 1881 he was elected register and recorder. He read law with G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar May 3, 1886.

III. Attorneys in Temporary Practice.

JOHN D. TAYLOR, like Mr. Wescott, was first admitted to the bar in Philadelphia, came to Wayne County as an agent for Philadelphia land-owners, and made professional business secondary to his employment as land agent. He did not, however, prove well adapted to the latter pursuit. Though a good surveyor, under favorable conditions, and familiar with the use of his instruments in the open field, he became bewildered among the forests, hills and swamps of Wayne County, and finally gave up the agency to Stephen Torrey. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne August 25, 1829. In 1834 he was appointed deputy attorney-general for the county, and held the office for about a year. In 1837 he removed to what was then the far West, and subsequently engaged in business as a broker in St. Louis.

JOHN I. ALLEN came to Wayne County from the State of New York. He studied law in Schoharie County, in that State, and was there admitted to the bar. He came to Wayne and was admitted to the bar of the county in 1839. He took an active part in politics, and soon became interested in journalism. January 1, 1842, he became editor and proprietor of the Wayne County Herald, the Democratic organ of the county. In December, 1844, he gave up the editorial charge of the paper to John W. Myers, though still remaining proprietor, and frequently contributing to its columns. August 5, 1845, he resumed the editorial chair, but in December following sold the paper to William H. Dimmick, then State Senator. In 1846 he went to Easton, where he was connected with the Easton Sentinel for some two years. He then returned to Honesdale, where he remained for several years. In 1855 he went to Carbondale, and took charge of a Democratic newspaper, but in a few months the office was burned out. He again returned to Honesdale, where he remained until his death. He was accidentally drowned by falling from the tow-path bridge, at Honesdale, into the Lackawaxen, on the night of June 5, 1859.

IRA VADAKIN came from Susquehanna County, studied law with Earl Wheeler, and was admitted to the bar January 31, 1842. Mr. Wheeler removing to Honesdale on the transfer of the county-seat to that place, Mr. Vadakin purchased his residence in Bethany and remained there to practice. In 1852 he purchased a farm in Dyberry, and exchanged professional pursuits for the life of a farmer. A few years later he sold this property and removed to Susquehanna County.

SIMEON GAGER THROOP, long known in Wayne County as "Squire Throop," was born at Boswell, Conn., January 4, 1790. When quite young he removed with his parents to Hudson, N. Y. He read law in the office of Hon. Elisha Williams, one of the most distinguished old-time lawyers of the State of New York. After his admission to the bar he removed to Chenango County, N. Y., and engaged in practice with considerable success. He also entered into politics with great zeal, as a supporter of Governor Clinton, and in 1816 was elected to the Legislature. In that body he proved himself an able debater, and gave evidence of marked ability in dealing with public affairs. He shared in the downfall of the Clinton wing of his party, and never again became a candidate, though still retaining much political influence in his district. He came to Honesdale in 1842, and was admitted to the Wayne County bar September 1st. After a few years of practice he yielded to the desire of the leading business men of the place and accepted the office of justice of the peace. He held this position for ten years. In 1866 he removed to Stroudsburg. He was admitted to the bar of that county, and subsequently became one of the associate judges. He died at Stroudsburg February 14, 1877. His last words were: "I have my eye on the gun—I am prepared for the discharge."

Mr. Throop was a man of much ability, a good speaker, possessed of social qualities that made him highly popular and with a vein of quaint humor that made his conversation very entertaining. In habit of thought, language and address he was a high-minded, genial gentleman of the old school.

Frederick Saxton came from Vermont, and studied law at Montrose, under the direction of Franklin Lusk. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne County December 5, 1842. He practiced in Mount Pleasant for a few years. The date of his removal cannot be ascertained, except that it was later than September, 1844; and in 1849 he was practicing law in Carbondale. He subsequently returned to Wayne County, but did not resume practice; and some of his later years were passed on a farm in Damascus.

Elias Griswold read law and was admitted to practice in Utica, N. Y. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne County December 10, 1842. After remaining some three years in Honesdale, he returned to his home in Central New York.

Hiram Blois, son of David and Abigail Blois, is a native of Salisbury, Litchfield County, Conn. He is the oldest living member of the Wayne County bar; as old, in fact, as the courts of the county,—having been born on the day on which they were first opened: September 10, 1798. He attended the schools of his native town until he was sixteen years old. He subsequently studied medicine; and removing to Wayne County in 1829, commenced practice in Salem. He also engaged later in the practice of dentistry. After reaching middle life he turned his attention to law. He studied with Charles K. Robinson, and was admitted to the bar September 9, 1843. After practicing in Honesdale until 1850, he gave up the profession and returned to Salem, where he still lives.

Rufus M. Grenell was a native of Clinton, Wayne County. He was a younger brother of Hon. Virgil Grenell, who, at the time of his admission, was an associate judge. He read law in Honesdale and was admitted to the bar May 2, 1844. A little more than a year afterward he was appointed deputy attorney-general for the county, commencing his duties at September Term, 1845. He held this position for three years. In 1848 he was elected prothonotary, and held the office for three years. Some two or three years later he left the county.

John Marion Alexander came to Wayne County from the State of New York. He read law under the direction of Charles K. Robinson and was admitted to the bar December 2, 1844. He practiced in Pleasant Mount, and married Anna T., daughter of Eldad Atwater, of that village. In the spring of 1846 he went to Luzerne County, and practiced there for several years. He was among the early settlers of Kansas, but subsequently returned East and spent some time in Vineland, N. J. He afterward went to Florida, where his family now resides. He has two daughters—Blanche, born in Pleasant Mount in the spring of 1846, and Lizzie, born during his residence in Kansas. The latter, with her husband, George Rhodes, resides in Florida.

Jacob A. Kanouse read law in the State of New Jersey and was first admitted to practice in that State. February 8, 1845, he was admitted to the bar of Wayne County. He opened an office in Honesdale, but remained only a few months. He subsequently went to Texas, and there engaged in the business of cattle raising.

Joseph D. West came to Wayne County from New York about the year 1842. He began to read law with Thomas Fuller. After the death of Mr. Fuller, in December, 1843, he continued his studies in the office of Ebenezer Kingsbury. Mr. Kingsbury dying in the following spring, Mr. West completed his preparation for the bar under the direction of Earl Wheeler, and was admitted to practice May 5, 1845. Soon after coming to Honesdale he was appointed secretary of the Wayne County Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and held that position until the company closed its business. December 9, 1845, he was married to Harriet, daughter of Isaac P. Foster, of Honesdale. In 1850 he was the Whig candidate for the office of district attorney, but the county being strongly Democratic, F. M. Crane, the Democratic nominee, was elected. In the fall of 1851 he removed to Brooklyn, N. Y.

Howkin Bulkeley Beardslee was born in Mount Pleasant, Wayne County, April 15, 1821. He subsequently removed with his parents to Indian Orchard, in Texas township. In October, 1845, he was elected register and recorder of the county. He had already commenced reading law, first under the direction of Mr. Kingsbury and afterward in the office of Mr. Wheeler, and was admitted to the bar December 3, 1845. He practiced little, however, and his attention thereafter was given chiefly to politics and journalism. About August 1, 1847, he became the owner of the Wayne County Herald, the Democratic organ of the county. James H. Norton, another lawyer-journalist, was for a time associated with him in the management of the paper. Early in 1849 Mr. Beardslee became the sole editor and publisher. In 1859 he was elected to the House of Representatives. In March, 1860, Thomas J. Ham became assistant editor of the Herald. In September, 1861, Mr. Beardslee sold the newspaper establishment to Mr. Ham and Charles Menner, and for a time retired from the journalistic field. In 1862 he was elected district attorney. In 1863 he was elected to the State Senate, and resigned the former office. In May, 1869, he became indirectly interested in the publication of the Wayne County Democrat, which was at first published semi-weekly and afterward weekly. September 16, 1869, Hon. Wm. H. Dimmick, district attorney, having been nominated for representative, resigned the former office and Mr. Beardslee was appointed by the court to fill the vacancy. He held the office until December, 1870. In 1871 he removed to Wilkes-Barre and assumed editorial charge of the Luzerne Union, the leading Democratic organ of Luzerne County. In 1879 he retired from the Union. In 1882 he commenced the publication of the Luzerne County Herald. He died of consumption March 11, 1886, at the old family homestead at Indian Orchard, to which he had been removed a short time previously, in the hope that his health might there improve.

John W. Myers came to Wayne County from the State of New York. He first engaged in the newspaper business, and in December, 1844, succeeded John I. Allen in the editorial charge of the Wayne County Herald, the Democratic organ of the county. August 5, 1845, he retired from this position and Mr. Allen resumed the editorial chair. Meantime, Mr. Myers had commenced the study of law, under the direction of Mr. Allen, and May 6, 1846, he was admitted to the bar. At December Term, 1847, he assisted, in behalf of the commonwealth, on the trial of Harris Bell for the murder of Mrs. Eliza Williams, Messrs. Wheeler and Minor being the senior counsel. He left the county soon afterward and sailed for the East Indies, but died on ship-board and was buried in the Indian Ocean.

James H. Norton read law in Connecticut, and was admitted to the bar in Litchfield County, in that State, April 15, 1846. He soon afterward came to Honesdale, and was admitted to the bar of Wayne County September 9, 1846. In 1847 he became associated with H. B. Beardslee in the publication of the Wayne County Herald, but severed his connection with that paper in 1849. At December Term, 1847, and February Term, 1848, he acted as deputy attorney general, under a temporary appointment by the court, Mr. Grenell, the deputy, being for some reason unable to act. He removed from the county, as nearly as can be ascertained, about the year 1855.

Milton Crane Tracy, the eldest son of Elias B. Tracy and Caroline Crane, his wife, was born at Salisbury, Litchfield County, Conn., in the year 1822. He was a lineal descendant of Thomas Tracy, who, settling at Norwich in 1660, and rearing six sons, was the original head of a family which rendered good service in founding and establishing the colony of Connecticut; which, at a later period, was well represented in the Continental army, and which, still later, had one of its members in the first Senate of the United States.

Elias B. Tracy died when his son was but ten years old, and the latter, two years afterwards, went to live upon a farm near Lime Rock, Conn., owned by a distant relative. Here he remained until nearly eighteen, working upon the farm in summer and in winter attending the common school in the neighborhood. His progress in his studies was so rapid, and his love of books so marked, as to attract the attention of his uncle, Frederick M. Crane, through whose instrumentality, in the winter of 1840, Milton entered the academy at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. His stay there was, however, very brief. Benson J. Lossing, the historian, visited the school in the fall of 1840, and, at his wish, Milton removed to New York City to accept a position as a teacher in the Mechanics' Institute School, an academy of great reputation and high grade, of which Mr. Lossing was a trustee.

Mr. Tracy taught in this institution for about three years, in a subordinate capacity, pursuing at the same time, outside of school hours, an advanced course of study, including all the branches usually comprised in the classical or mathematical collegiate curriculum of that day. He labored under the great disadvantage of having no instructor, but, thanks to a retentive memory and a mind naturally quick and acute, joined to habits of the closest application, he qualified himself so thoroughly that, at the close of the period named, he received the honorary degree of Master of Arts upon passing an exceedingly creditable examination.

At twenty-three he was appointed principal of Mechanics' Institute and held the position for two years, leaving the city in 1846 and removing to Honesdale, Pa., for the purpose of studying law with his uncle, F. M. Crane, then in active practice in Wayne County. In September, 1848, he was admitted to the Wayne County bar, and at once entered into business with Mr. Crane.

In the spring of 1849 it became necessary for him to go to New York upon some matter connected with his profession, and the fact of his presence in the city being known at Mechanics' Institute, some four hundred of his former pupils presented a petition, unknown to him, to the trustees of the institute, asking that measures be taken to induce Mr. Tracy to resume his old position as principal.

The trustees were themselves exceedingly anxious to have him return, and so attractive an offer was made to him that Mr. Tracy felt constrained to accept it. He remained in charge of the institute for many years, and although a member of the New York City bar, and having a law-office there, yet the cares of the school consumed the greater portion of his time, which was also, to some extent, taken up with the labor of writing, preparing and compiling a series of school-books, that for an extensive period were adopted by the city schools, and used therein. In 1860 he removed from New York, to take charge of an excellent academy at Tarrytown, on the Hudson, the location of which was afterward changed to Sing Sing, a few miles further up the river.

In 1865 his health began to fail. Overwork, care and the strain of incessant study combined to weaken an iron constitution. In the winter of 1866 he went to Ripon, Wis., thinking that the trip would be of benefit to him, and there, at the house of an old friend, June 9, 1866, he died. His mental faculties were retained clear and bright to the last moment.

Milton C. Tracy was a sincere Christian, and greatly attached to the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member. In disposition he was kind, generous and benevolent, although by nature reserved, quiet and perhaps rather cold and stern in appearance. He was charitable beyond the bounds of prudence, and while a resident of New York was identified with and an active member of various societies and missions for the relief of the poor. In habits, character and speech he was absolutely pure and correct. His greatest passion was his love of books, and his character as a lawyer was much affected by this trait. He loved the study, but not the practice of the law. Nothing was more congenial to his tastes than to intently and thoroughly study abstract principles, and nothing could be more distasteful than the peculiar annoyances which every busy lawyer daily meets with, and of which his practice had its full share.

Mr. Tracy was twice married. His first wife died in 1863. His second wife survived him.

William Minor was a native of Peekskill, N. Y. After graduating from Yale College he came to Honesdale, and read law under the direction of his cousin, C. S. Minor. He was for some time deputy prothonotary while P. S. Goodrich held that office. He was admitted to the bar December 3, 1849, and for about a year afterward practiced in Honesdale. His health failing, he returned to Peekskill. He died there December 28, 1853.

HENRY PEET was born in Bridgeport, Conn., in 1827. When nineteen years old he went to Cazenovia, N. Y., and attended the academy at that place. He subsequently engaged in teaching, and came to Honesdale for that purpose about the year 1848. While thus engaged he read law under the direction of Earl Wheeler. He was admitted to the bar February 4, 1852, and commenced practice in Honesdale. In 1856 he was elected district attorney, but in 1859, being a candidate for re-election, he was defeated by Jackson Woodward. In 1863 he removed to Towanda, Bradford County, where he formed a partnership with Paul D. Morrow, now president judge of the judicial district composed of Bradford County. He died February 15, 1878.

GEORGE W. ALLEN was a son of John I. Allen, and was born in the State of New York in April, 1838. He learned the printing business during his youth, and subsequently studied law with William H. & S. E. Dimmick. He was admitted to the bar May 3, 1859, and remained, for a time, in the office of his preceptors. His hearing becoming much impaired, he finally gave up the profession, and resumed work in a printing-office. He left Honesdale about 1868, going first to Baltimore and subsequently to Newark. He returned in 1873, and died in Honesdale October 10th of that year.

MARSHAL WHEELER was a son of Earl Wheeler. He studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar September 8, 1860. He practiced little, however, but turned his attention to civil engineering and other pursuits. He left Wayne County about the year 1872.

CHARLES F. ELDRED was a son of Judge Eldred. He studied law partly with his father, and for a time under the direction of his brother-in-law, Judge Hamlin, in Minnesota. He was admitted to the bar December 5, 1860. During the Rebellion he served in a regiment known as "Scott's Nine Hundred." In 1870 he was elected district attorney. The trial of Langendorfer for murder took place during his term of office. He removed to the West about 1873.

THOMAS HAWKEY read law with C. P. & G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar May 4, 1864. In 1866 he was elected register and recorder. Soon after the close of his term he removed from the county. He died at Otisville, N. Y., in 1870.

MICHAEL REGAN was a native of Canaan, Wayne County. In 1863 he was elected register and recorder, and while holding that office read law under the direction of F. M. Crane. He was admitted to the bar May 9, 1866. Some time after the close of his term as register and recorder he removed to Luzerne County. When last heard from he was practicing law in the city of New York.

FRANCIS ASBURY DONY, son of Henry and Hannah Dony, was born at Dundaff, Susquehannah County, Pa., May 3, 1841. He removed with his parents to Honesdale about the year 1843. He was educated at the Staten Island Institute and Wyoming Seminary. He read law at Honesdale, in the office of F. M. Crane and H. M. Seely, and was admitted to the bar on motion of Mr. Crane, February 3, 1869. Removing then to Mauch Chunk, he practiced there for four years, during which period he was master in Chancery in the celebrated case of Asa Packer vs. Noble, Hammett & Co. In 1873 he returned to Honesdale. In 1874 he was appointed United States special agent, to investigate and perfect the title to the lands belonging to the Cherokee Indians in North Carolina. In April, 1875, he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is now a member of the Wyoming Annual Conference.

M. M. THORP was a native of Wayne County. He read law with D. N. Lathrope, in Carbondale. He was admitted to the bar of Wayne County May 6, 1870, and practiced in Waymart for some two years afterward. In 1872 he received the Republican nomination for district attorney, but declined it, and soon afterward removed to Carbondale. He there formed a partnership with C. E. Lathrope, and remained for several years. He finally gave up the profession and retired to a farm in Canaan.

H. F. POWER was born in Honesdale December 5, 1849. He read law under the direction of William H. Dimmick, and was admitted September 5, 1871. He gave up the profession without any decided effort to establish himself in practice. He died September 19, 1882.

Frank B. Brown, son of Peter P. Brown, was born in Honesdale, September 23, 1849. He studied law under the direction of C. F. Eldred, and was admitted to the bar September 5, 1871. On the 9th of December following, Mr. Eldred, the district attorney, having resigned that office, Mr. Brown was appointed to fill the vacancy. In 1872 he was elected to the office, and held it for three years following. During his incumbency the trial of Charles Regel for murder took place, in which he was assisted by Mr. Eldred. A few years after the expiration of his term he gave up the profession and removed from the county.

Lafayette G. Dimock, a son of Asa W. Dimock, was born at Waymart, Wayne County. He read law under the direction of C. S. Minor, and was admitted to the bar December 6, 1875. He opened an office in Honesdale and also practiced in Waymart for a time. He has since retired from the profession.

Daniel H. Brown, second son of Isaac O. and Charlotte Brown, was born in Damascus, February 19, 1849. He was well educated, and for some time after attaining manhood was engaged in teaching. He read law with Hon. E. O. Hamlin, and was admitted September 14, 1878. In January, 1884, he formed a partnership with William H. Dimmick, which continued two years. In March, 1886, he removed to Council Grove, Kansas.

Wharton Dickinson was admitted December 14, 1878, on a certificate of previous admission to the bar of Luzerne County. He opened an office in Honesdale, but after remaining a year or upwards removed to Scranton.

Joseph Benjamin Dimmick, second son of Hon. Samuel E. and Lucretia B. Dimmick, was born in Honesdale October 3, 1858. He was graduated from Yale College in 1881, and studied law in Honesdale under the direction of William H. Dimmick. He was admitted to the bar October 2, 1882, and commenced practice in Honesdale. In November, 1883, he removed to Scranton. After practicing law in that city until November, 1885, he accepted the vice-presidency of the Lackawanna Valley Bank. He is also at present the president of the school board of the city of Scranton.

James J. O'Neill is a son of Hugh O'Neill, of Carbondale, and a cousin of Charles B. O'Neill, of Honesdale. He studied law under the direction of P. P. Smith, and was admitted to the bar May 7, 1883. After remaining in Mr. Smith's office for some time subsequent to his admission, he removed to Carbondale, and engaged in practice in that city.

IV. Law Graduates.

Charles K. Silkman studied successively with Messrs. Robinson, Wheeler and Wescott, and was admitted November 21, 1837. Nothing is known of his subsequent history.

Milton Dimmick is a native of Milford, Pike County. He studied law in Bethany with his elder brother, William H. Dimmick, and was admitted January 25, 1840. He then returned to Milford. His practice in Wayne County was confined to taking charge of his brother's business while the latter was attending to his duties as State Senator, to which office he was elected in 1844.

Ara Bartlett is a native of Prompton, Wayne County. He was educated at the academy in Bethany, and subsequently taught school. He read law with R. M. Grenell and F. M. Crane, and was admitted to the bar May 3, 1853. He married Lucinda, a daughter of Judge Eldred, and removed to Kankakee, Ill., where he commenced practice. President Lincoln subsequently appointed him chief justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota. At the close of his term he returned to Illinois and resumed practice.

Albert Willis came to Honesdale from Delaware County, N. Y., and engaged in teaching. He read law under the direction of Earl Wheeler, and was admitted to the bar September 13, 1853. He soon afterward removed to Tioga County, Pa.

Milton J. Slocum is a native of Susquehanna County. He studied law with Earl Wheeler, and was admitted to the bar May 3, 1859. He returned to Susquehanna County, retired from the profession, and is now living in California.

GEORGE W. EDGETT is a native of Prompton, Wayne County. He read law with C. P. & G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar May 3, 1859. He soon afterward went to Texas, but remained only a short time. He subsequently removed to Massachusetts.

JASON TORREY is the youngest of three sons of Stephen and Mary Torrey, and the only one who survived infancy. He was born in Honesdale, May 31, 1839. He read law with C. P. & G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar February 8, 1860. He never engaged in practice, but entered the service of the Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., and was employed mainly in connection with its land and conveyancing business. He died at Carbondale, July 20, 1868.

FREDERICK FULLER came to Honesdale and entered the office of Earl Wheeler, May 1, 1860. He had previously studied ten months in Montrose, under the direction of F. B. Streeter, and thirteen months in Scranton, in the office of Sanderson & Willard. He was admitted to the bar September 8, 1860, and soon afterward removed from the county.

HENRY W. BOX was born in England, but came to Wayne County with his parents during boyhood. He read law with William H. & S. E. Dimmick, and was admitted to the bar September 8, 1860. He subsequently removed to Buffalo, N. Y., where he is still engaged in practice.

JOHN P. HEATH is a native of Honesdale, and son of the late Henry Heath. He read law under the direction of C. P. & G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar May 9, 1862. He removed to Hyde Park, Lackawanna County, gave up the profession and engaged in teaching.

GEORGE V. BROWER read law under the direction of G. G. Waller, and was admitted to the bar, May 9, 1866. He subsequently removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., where he engaged in practice.

THOMAS F. HAM and HENRY H. HAM are sons of John C. Ham, of Dyberry, Wayne County. The former read law with Wallers & Bentley, and the latter with S. E. Dimmick. Both were admitted to the bar December 9, 1869, and soon afterward removed to Wauseon, Ohio, where they are still engaged in practice. The former married a daughter of Isaiah Scudder of Bethany.

WILLIAM W. JOHNSON is a son of N. B. Johnson, a resident of the State of New York, opposite Lackawaxen. He read law with Wallers & Bentley, and was admitted to the bar September 5, 1871. He soon afterward removed to the West.

QUINCY A. GATES, a son of Alpheus W. Gates, was born in Scott, Wayne County, December 19, 1847. He was educated at the academy in Deposit, Delaware County, N. Y. He read law with Wallers & Bentley, and was admitted to the bar December 2, 1873. He at first opened an office in Carbondale, but in the spring of 1874 removed to Wilkes-Barre, where he has since continued to practice.

JOHN F. WOOD is a native of Pike County. He read law in the office of William H. Dimmick, and was admitted to the bar December 13, 1878. He soon afterward removed to the West.

CHAPTER III.

Medical History—Sketches of Prominent Physicians—Early Practice—Dentistry.[1]

THE first physician who settled in Wayne County with the intention of making it his permanent residence was probably Doctor Lewis Collins, of Cherry Ridge. He was the oldest son of Charles and Anna Huntington Collins, and grandson of Rev. Timothy and Elizabeth Hyde Collins, of Litchfield, South Farms, Connecticut. He was born at Litchfield October 29, 1753, and married, for his first wife, June 14, 1779, Ruth, daughter of Benjamin Root, and for his second wife, November 26, 1791, Louisa, daughter of Oliver and Anna Lynde Huntington, of Lebanon, Conn. That Doctor Collins pursued his medical studies with Doctor Seth Bird, of Litchfield, and that he was somewhat learned in languages, may be inferred from the following certificate, which was given him by Dr. Bird at the time of his commencing the practice of medicine, and which is yet extant:

"To whom it may Concern: These may certify that the subscriber, having been personally acquainted with Dr. Lewis Collins, of Litchfield, and knowing to his having closely applied himself to the study of Languages and Medicine for several years past with judgment and good proficiency and that he hath been acquainted with the most difficult cases in Practice, wherein he hath prescribed and administered judiciously. Appearing to be well qualified to enter on the Practice of Physic & Surgery, and as such I cordially recommend him to any People where he may incline to settle.

"Certified per SETH BIRD, Physician.

"Litchfield, 18th May, 1776."

Dr. Collins practiced for a time at Saybrook, Conn., and during the War of the Revolution was a surgeon in the Revolutionary army. From Saybrook he removed to Old Guilford, where he remained in the practice of his profession until the year 1800, when he, with his family, emigrated to Wayne County, Pa., and purchased and settled on what was then known as the Jacob Stanton place, at Little Meadows, in Salem township, where he remained until 1803, when, wishing to locate nearer the centre of his field of practice, he bought and moved on to the Enos Woodward farm, since known as the Collins farm, in Cherry Ridge. Here he resided up to the time of his death, in 1818. The doctor, as was the custom in those days, compounded the medicine he used and carried it about with him in his saddle-bags. His field of practice was large and the journeys to visit his patients were performed on horseback through an almost wilderness country extending to Paupack settlement, in Pike County, Sterling, Salem, Canaan, Bethany, Mount Pleasant and Damascus, in Wayne, and on one occasion he was called and traveled as far away as Owego, N. Y., and several times to Milford to visit the sick. Jabez Bidwell, of Salem, while chopping fallow, was struck on the head by a falling limb of a tree, which fractured his skull, compressing the brain. Doctor Collins was called and saw at once the necessity of performing the operation of trepanning. Not being provided with a trephine, the doctor applied to Robert Bortree, a gunsmith of Sterling and a skillful worker of steel, who, under the doctor's instructions, worked out and made an instrument with which the doctor successfully performed the operation on Mr. Bidwell, who lived many years after. Dr. Collins was one of the three physicians—Doctors Mahony and Seely being the other two—who made the post-mortem examination of the remains of one Roswell, who was poisoned at Bethany by Jones, and for which Jones was hanged, it having been found that Roswell was poisoned with arsenic. But little is now known of the characteristics or personal appearance of Doctor Collins. He was of tall, athletic build, sandy complexion and something of the Roman cast of features. He died at the house of Simeon Ansley, in Paupack settlement, having been taken with a violent fever during a visit to one of his patients at that place.

DR. THOMAS J. SEELY, son of Col. Sylvanus Seely, was born at Chatham, N. J., August 27, 1786, and when his father settled in Wayne County was a boy of fourteen. He commenced the study of medicine in 1804 with his brother, Dr. John W. Seely, who was then practicing in Greene County, Pa. He attended lectures in Philadelphia in 1807, and located at a place called Yarrington, not far from his brother. He subsequently settled at Greensburgh. In 1810 he married Hannah, widow of Dr. John Bell. He had some army experience, having served both as a surgeon and as a captain of infantry in the War of 1812, and having been present at the battle of the Thames, where the famous Tecumseh lost his life.

In 1815 he returned with his family to Seely's Mills and moved into the house built for him, now and for many years known as the Christian Eck house. Here he continued to reside, with some short intervals of absence, until after his father's death, combining with the practice of medicine, not a very secure reliance for income in the then sparsely-settled country, such other business in connection with his father as came to his hand. In February, 1817, he appeared as a witness in the inquest upon the body of Isaac Rozel, who was poisoned by Cornelius

Jones. Jones was convicted of murder and executed November 15th, that year. Dr. Seely appears to have allowed his eagerness for anatomical research to outrun his judgment, since he was arrested and bound over for disinterring the body. What came of it all does not appear. After his father's death he returned to Greensburgh and resumed practice there.

Some years later Dr. Seely suffered a severe injury in the head by a fall from his horse. He is said to have remarked that if a patient of his had such an injury, he should expect him to lose his reason. This result actually ensued. When his wife observed the first symptoms of mental disorder she sent for a council of physicians, one of whom afterwards told her that they consulted Dr. Seely himself, describing the case as that of some other person. His daughter relates that it was not an uncommon occurrence for him to be consulted during the entire period of his derangement, his mind having always been clear on topics of medicine and surgery.

This derangement continued to nearly the end of his life. He spent many years at the home of his sister, Mrs. Bruen, in Chatham, and afterwards lived with his daughter at Evansville, Indiana, where he died September 4, 1865. Shortly before his death his long-beclouded reason appeared fully restored, and he passed the last few weeks in the full possession of his faculties and in the enjoyment of a firm Christian faith.

His eldest daughter, Cynthia Dutton, was married to Dr. William M. Chartres, a distinguished physician of Savannah, Georgia, and died in 1860. The other daughter, Jane Williamson, now lives in Indianapolis, Indiana.

Dr. Seely was a man of fine presence, great dignity of manner, and even during his derangement conspicuously gentle and courteous. Stories told of him by members of his family indicate remarkable skill and boldness in surgery. His wife, a little woman of steady nerves, was often called upon to assist in important operations, and elicited high praise for her coolness and resolution.

Florence Mahony, M.D., was cotemporary with Drs. Collins and Seely at Bethany in 1815, and was born at Providence, Rhode Island, in 1794, of parents who came from Ireland. He had the advantages which the schools of New England at that day could give, and graduated at one of the Massachusetts medical colleges. He located at Bethany in 1814 for the practice of his profession.

In 1816 he married Christina, daughter of Ephraim Kimble (and sister of the late Asa Kimble, near Bethany), at "the Narrows," now Kimble's Station, Pike County, and there were born to them Asa and Melcena, in 1817 and 1818, respectively. The boy lived with his uncle, Asa Kimble, until he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, sharing precisely the same advantages as his cousins in that highly-respected family. At this time he removed to Wisconsin, where he prospered for a time, but died in 1858, leaving a son, Florence C. Mahony. The daughter, Melcena, had an excellent home with Mr. and Mrs. John Welden, and married Amos Townsend, of Montague, Sussex County, New Jersey, they having eight children, among whom is Florence Mahony Townsend, to whom we are indebted for this brief sketch.

After the death of his wife at Bethany, in 1821, Dr. Mahony removed to the county town of Pike, practicing far and near, frequently crossing the Delaware River into Sussex County, New Jersey, and was very successful in his profession. It is said of him that he was a Free-Mason, and there is a biographical fragment of him related by J. R. Keen, Esq., a gentleman now residing in Honesdale, aged eighty-five years, who says: "When my father had a ball enter his hip by the accidental discharge of a gun, one of his medical colleagues was called, who dressed the wound; but after a week or two, finding it very offensive and in a sloughing condition, the patient was carried to Bethany and was examined by Dr. Mahony, who removed from the wound the wadding of the gun, and with his finger reached the lodging-place of the ball, and by the aid of a razor in enlarging the opening secured the bullet with his finger, after which recovery was rapid." Dr. Mahony died at Milford, in 1828, universally regretted.

Isaac Roosa.—This Nestor of the profession was born in Orange County, N. Y., February 4, 1801; received his diploma to practice medicine and surgery in 1820; married Miss Mary, daughter of Eliphalet Kellogg, Esq., of Bethany, June 7, 1821, and died July 31, 1837. Their son—an only child—John P. Roosa is a retired merchant and successful financier residing at Monticello, N. Y., aged sixty-one years, having been born in Bethany in 1824. The arrival of Dr. Roosa in the county seat of Wayne must have been a welcome one to the people there. Previously there had been no regularly educated and scientifically trained physician and surgeon there, and advanced methods of treating the sick, improved surgical instruments and apparatus were now instituted to supply the place of the razor, carpenter's saw and blacksmith's trephine. Fresh from a respectable medical institution, Dr. Roosa opened a large and beautiful office, with his name and title upon a gilded sign, the shelving filled with neatly-labeled bottles and packages of medicine, the counter decorated with the inevitable mortar and pestle, scales, weights, etc. A spacious reception room was attached, where the patient could consult his physician in seclusion, an anatomical room where were specimens of the art of the anatomist and the surgeon, where the medical student might pursue his dissections unmolested, and from which the curiosity seeker was usually excluded, and if occasionally admitted, it was considered by him a distinguished favor. His medical library was ample and furnished with the then standard works of the profession, such as "Good's Study of Medicine," "Thomas' Practice," "Cooper's Surgery," "Bell's Anatomy," works of "Bichat" and "Richeraud" upon physiology, each book labeled with the printed name of the owner, containing thereon the Latin maxim "Legere et non Intelligere est Negligere."

Dr. Roosa was of the sanguine-nervous temperament, an accomplished practitioner of medicine, a skillful surgeon, ardently attached to his profession, quick to think and act, gifted with a brilliant mind, affable and courteous to all and generous to a fault

In prognosis, when asked for an opinion in a given case, it was his characteristic to answer positively and promptly, according to his actual conviction: as "Madam, I think your child will die!" or "You need have no fears as to the result; he will get well!"

With the masses of the people he was very popular, particularly with the farmers; for as a veterinarian he was quite as ready to act for them as in his usual professional capacity, and wherever there was an injury or case of sickness, the exclamation was, "Send for 'Rose!'" the familiar name by which he was known. Around the domestic fireside many have been the almost marvelous tales related of him, and no greater evidence of the estimation in which he was held by his cotemporaries can be mentioned than the fact that there are now residing in this county men from sixty to sixty-five years of age who bear the name of Isaac Roosa.

Dr. Edwin Graves was born in Oneonta, Otsego County, N. Y., August 10, 1804, of humble but respectable parents, who soon after removed to Delaware County, N. Y. In that region of country, eighty years since, the benefits of education were not so widely diffused as at present, and the subject of this sketch was indebted chiefly to his own exertion and energetic perseverance for so much practical education as fitted him for future usefulness, and laid the foundation for a career as honorable to himself as beneficial to the community. Having prepared himself, he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Western New York, at Fairfield, in Herkimer County, then under the superintendence of Drs. McNaughton, De Le Mater, Beck and others of similar reputation in the profession. Here his studious habits and untiring assiduity soon attracted the notice of the professors, by whom every facility was afforded the young man for a thorough school training in the healing art. It is recollected that at one time early in his attendance at that institution, when every dollar he possessed was stolen, such was the interest felt by the faculty in his progress that he was not permitted to retire from his studies, but his expenses were generously defrayed by the professors; nor was it till after he had entered upon the duties of his profession and accumulated means that a reimbursement was accepted.

The date of his diploma is January 22, 1830. In possession of all the academic honors of that institution, he commenced practice in Wehawken (now Hancock), Delaware County, N. Y., in the same year, where, stimulated by an honorable ambition, he soon won for himself a high standing, and there, as here, in after-years, none were too humble to command his services.

In 1833 he formed a matrimonial alliance with Miss Mary, daughter of Hon. John H. Gregory, of Colchester, Delaware County, N. Y. Although they had other children, only two are now living (1885),—Elizabeth, who married Charles Torrey, of Bethany, and Mary, wife of George Searle, of Honesdale.

After ten years of the most unremitting diligence in a laborious practice he left a community in which all regretted his removal and located in Bethany, in the hope of partially relieving himself from the perils and hardships of travel in a rough and broken country traversed by rudely constructed thoroughfares and often impassable streams. After the decease of Dr. Isaac Roosa, in 1837, he purchased his stock, fixtures and anatomical preparations and entered the vacant office of that gentleman, being assisted by his brother-in-law, Dr. Harrison Gregory, now of Deposit, N. Y. They found the field an ample one, and the people ready and anxious to receive them—the time was opportune. He now engaged in an extensive and lucrative practice, in robust health, living literally in his saddle day and night. It was characteristic of him to assist the poor with the same cheerful and prompt readiness as the more fortunate and wealthy, exhibiting in this respect the higher and more liberal traits of the professional character, which, bestowing the practical blessings of skill and science upon the human family, forgets the limited views of self-aggrandizement. It was yet the fashion for the physician to furnish medicines himself for his patient, and it was proverbial among the masses that his professional charges to all were absurdly light, while he gave gratuitously of his medicines without hope or expectation of reward. In fact, it seems as if his overwhelming business prevented him from registering his charges. His qualifications as a surgeon and also as a physician were unquestioned, and devoting himself entirely to the duties of a profession at all times laborious, perhaps no one labored with an energy more untiring, and with a success which could not be otherwise than gratifying to an honorable ambition. In 1841, when the county-seat was removed from Bethany to Honesdale, Dr. Graves purchased lots on Main Street, in the latter place, built an elegant residence and office, and removed thither, Dr. Gregory remaining in the former place. During his short life in Honesdale Dr. Graves maintained the same elevated position he had taken in his profession, and endeared himself to the people, proving to be a worthy successor of Dr. Roosa.

His manner and personal appearance were calculated to inspire the sick or injured with confidence in his reliability. In stature he stood nearly six feet, and was very erect. His habits were active, temper agreeable and equable, although rather warm when aroused. He possessed a serious cast of countenance, expressive of activity and wakefulness, but was animated and cheerful when engaged in conversation. His complexion was fair, eyes dark blue, hair dark brown, high cheek-bones, forehead high, wide and full of intellectual promise.

"'Death, that loves a shining mark,'" found him in the discharge of the duties he loved. Contracting a violent cold in the inclement winter weather, and continuing his exposure and exertion for others too long, to the neglect of himself, pneumonia supervened, which was found to be remediless; and after a brief and distressing illness of seven days, he left the scene of all his labors and anxieties on the morning of the 6th day of January, 1849, universally regretted," the community losing a councilor and the poor a friend. His wife survived him until June 16, 1873, and died, aged sixty-four years.

Up to the year 1848, the period of the completion of the Erie Railroad to Narrowsburg, a student in medicine in this county was compelled, in the face of stringent laws and the insuperable prejudice against dissections of the human body, to obtain his material by stealth with a coroner's jury theoretically by his side, and the verdict "guilty" staring him in the face.

A medical student's life was not as luxurious then as now. He then performed more menial duties. The care of the office, the compounding of the medicine, collecting of bills and running of errands were some of them, but the greatest difficulty of all in his pursuit after knowledge was that disagreeable and loathsome of all necessities, the dissection of human subjects; the knowledge of anatomy being the first step in his medical education, the foundation of all his future usefulness must be had at all hazards, and in no other way can it be obtained.

In obtaining a subject for dissection strategy was required, and many were the risks taken in accomplishing this end, for it was against law and popular opinion to obtain a body, and after its being secured few can imagine the danger incurred in keeping it sufficiently long to examine it, such was the watchfulness of these prejudiced and diligent observers of the "Imps of Satan," as the medical students were termed.

There are now living those who remember the daring of some of them in their endeavors to dig up a body in the distant burying-grounds; and engaged in these enterprises are remembered the names of Lillibridge, Snyder, Stearns, Whiting, Fish, Mumford, Hayden, Olmstead, Reed and others, who have scaled walls and jumped fences in their pursuit of knowledge under difficulties.

In 1818, when Jones was executed, an attempt was made to "resurrect" the body for dissection, but the self-constituted police were on the "qui vive," and the scheme circumvented, but at the execution of Marthers, in 1829, a more successful result was obtained. Isaac Brink was detailed for guard duty at the grave, but being enticed elsewhere by a bottle of "Old Rye," the body was made to subserve the purposes of science.

In the year 1836 a great excitement was created at Prompton, which extended to Honesdale, Bethany, Canaan and the whole surrounding country, and threatened mob violence for a time. At the former place the body of the esteemed wife of Levi Bronson, Esq., was disinterred and removed to Dr. Snyder's office, in Honesdale. Some arrests were made; the doctor and his associates abandoned the partially dissected woman, and the mutilated remains being restored, the parties were not further prosecuted, but by reason of the popular feeling, a residence here was no longer agreeable, and a change of climate considered desirable by all concerned, of which they gladly availed themselves.

When Bell was executed, in 1847, his body was surrendered to the students of Dr. Graves, and no objection was made by the people.

Gratifying, indeed, it is to know at the present time that our deceased friends, when safely deposited in the tomb, are free from the danger of molestation by medical students, as, for a few dollars, they go to the metropolitan dissecting-rooms, and procure in a legitimate way the remains of poor mortality which they need.

No man in the county was better known than Ebenezer T. Losey, M.D., and none knew but to respect him. His name was a household word, for he was truthful, honest, would do unto others what he would have others do unto him, and his name has been and will be cherished in scores of grateful hearts,—those to whom he was endeared as the faithful friend and beloved physician. About 1830 he came to this county from Morristown, N. J., where he studied medicine after having graduated and received his diploma in New York City. September 21, 1831, he married the estimable daughter of a prominent citizen of Honesdale, viz., Miss Lucy, daughter of Joseph B. Walton, Esq. Their children were Emeline W., Joseph W., Abbie T., Cornelius, Sarah W., Ebenezer T., Daniel W., Henry B. and Lucy M.

In the early years of his professional life he was cotemporary with Drs. Roosa and Strong, and later with Strong, Graves, Gregory, Sanger, King, the Reeds and others. His kindness and warm sympathy, extending through so many years of active practice, are interwoven like a thread of gold in the joys and sorrows of some of our families, for, as a physician, he was trusted, and his patients always felt that in him they had a careful, courteous and considerate friend.

He was not eminent in, nor did he profess taste or desire for, surgery; but was efficient as a physician, and unexcelled as an obstetrician. In the latter branch he was often thrown upon his own resources in important cases, and was always found equal to the emergency.

In appearance he was of full size, symmetrical build, and of clerical look, as he was dressed with scrupulous neatness, and wore a white neck-cloth. He possessed a pleasing countenance, a bearing dignified and commanding, yet easy and natural; was cordial in his greeting, always genial, kind-hearted and obliging, especially when approached by men younger than himself in the profession.

The writer of this was his patient during a terrible and protracted fever, was his professional colleague in practice for several years, and his medical attendant in his last illness; and feels that there are no words in Dr. Losey's eulogy too strongly expressive of his manly virtues in reference to his life and character; and can also testify to a compliment paid him by the late Dr. Sanger, upon taking leave of him, when he had been making a visit to his hospital at Blackwell's Island, in 1856: "Remember me to Losey," he said; "among all your honorable men he heads the list."

It is unmistakably true that few country practitioners make more than a living by their practice alone, and that not a very sumptuous one; hence medical students mistake that they do not learn business of some kind as an adjunct when they become located. Dr. Losey acted upon this view. In 1832 he had a drug-store, and later a farm, which he successfully cultivated, near Honesdale. He died in Honesdale March 9, 1870, after having passed a good, useful, exemplary life, characterized by the highest sense of duty; and in all relations, professional and social, uprightness and purity of motive were the qualities which governed him. His good deeds and an honorable name live after him.

Adonijah Strong, who practiced in Wayne County from 1829 until his death, in 1879, a period of fifty years, though during the last few years he retired as far as was possible from the cares of his profession, was a native of Salisbury, Conn., born October 8, 1800. He was of a distinguished and ancient family, a direct descendant of Noah Strong, one of the pilgrim band of the "Mayflower," who landed on the shores of Massachusetts in 1620. His father was Martin Strong, who for many years was the president judge of the Litchfield County courts.

Adonijah was educated with a view to the adoption of the legal profession, and graduated from Yale College with a good preparatory discipline. Among his father's intimate friends was Benajah Ticknor, a surgeon in the United States navy, who importuned Judge Strong to educate the young man in medicine and surgery, with a view to his becoming his assistant in the government service. He accordingly studied with Dr. Luther Ticknor, a brother of Benajah, and was admitted to practice by license from the Massachusetts Medical Society at Litchfield, August 18, 1824. Shortly afterwards he formed a matrimonial alliance with Miss Mary A. Myers, daughter of Colonel Nathan Myers, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., to whom he was married on the 26th of October in the same year. This marriage revolutionized his plans for the future, so far as entering the naval service was concerned, and he entered upon the practice of his profession at Poughkeepsie. Through the influence of Hon. Pope Bushnell, of Bethany, he removed to that place in 1829, himself and wife living for a time in Mr. Bushnell's family. In spite of considerable professional opposition, he secured a fair practice; but seeing that it might be improved, he removed to Honesdale in 1839. On locating here he opened a drug store, and for many years did a prosperous business. His practice was extensive, but as he grew older he relinquished it to the younger members of the profession, several of whom had been his students. In his younger days the doctor took quite an interest in politics, being a pronounced and leading Democrat. He never held office, however. He united with the Presbyterian Church, and was elected an elder in 1850, and held that office until his death. Dr. Strong was of a reserved and retiring disposition, though an excellent conversationalist on subjects both within and foreign to his profession. He was of erect person and dignified appearance, "the very beau ideal," says a friend, "of the old school physician."

Dr. Luther Appley was born November 15, 1790, in Canterbury, Windom County, Conn. His father being a tanner and currier, he learned the trade as he was growing up. He left Connecticut and came to Hancock, Delaware County N. Y., in the summer of 1809. He followed surveying part of the time; ran the line between the towns of Hancock and Colchester, Delaware County, N. Y.; taught school the following winter in Shehocken, now called Hancock. In 1810 he commenced studying medicine with Dr. Lewis Allen, at Deposit, Delaware County, N. Y.; remained with him one year; then came to Damascus, Wayne County, Pa., and studied two years with Dr. Freeman Allen; was licensed to practice as physician and surgeon by a board of physicians and surgeons November 24, 1821; was appointed surgeon's mate in and for the regiment comprised in the county of Wayne, by Oliver B. Brush, colonel, Jacob Schenk, lieutenant-colonel, Pope Bushnel, major, and received commission as surgeon's mate for the Seventieth Regiment of the Militia of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in the Second Brigade of the Eighth Division composed of the militia of the counties of Northumberland, Union, Columbia, Luzerne, Susquehanna and Wayne, from Governor Joseph Heister, dated January 29, 1822.

"Dr. Luther Appley,

"Dear Sir:

"You are hereby appointed surgeon for the 70th Regt. Penn. Militia.

"Yours Respectfully,

"Nathaniel B. Eldred,

"Col. 70th Regt. Penn. Militia."

He was commissioned surgeon of the Seventieth Regiment, comprised in the county of Wayne, by Andrew Schulze, Governor, August 3, 1829. He was re-commissioned surgeon of the Seventieth Regiment, comprised in the county of Wayne, by George Wolf, Governor, November 26, 1832. He was a member of St. Tammany Lodge, No. 83, Ancient York Masons.

For his first wife he married Phebe Land, daughter of John Land. They had eight children,—William L., Maria L., Abigail R., Theodore, Theron, Lilly T., Luther and Mark. Theodore died in childhood.

His second wife was Mary E. Effinger, a lady of a prominent and wealthy family from Philadelphia, who, as his widow, now resides in Honesdale. Two daughters were born to them, Agnes Adelaide, who died in infancy, and Adelaide Josephine, who lived to maturity and was married very young to Luther W. Peck, son of Rev. George M. Peck, grandson of George Peck, D. D., of Wilkes-Barre, and nephew of Bishop Peck. Mrs. Peck is deceased.

He moved to Philadelphia in 1838, where he resided and practiced medicine and surgery until December, 1842, attending lectures at Jefferson College some part of the time; returned to Damascus, Wayne County, Pa., December, 1842, and immediately commenced practicing medicine and surgery, and continued the practice until his last sickness. His death occurred October 20, 1853.

In the beginning of his practice his ride extended from Damascus down the Delaware River to Lackawaxen, Pike County, Pa., and up the Delaware River from Damascus to Shehocken (now called Hancock), in Delaware County, N. Y.; as far east as White Lake, Sullivan County, N. Y., and west to Rileyville, Wayne County, Pa. His rule was to visit the sick at all times of night and in all kinds of weather, whether they paid or not.

Dr. William L. Appley, a son of Dr. Luther Appley and his wife Phœbe, was born at Milanville on the 26th of March, 1812. He commenced study with his father and afterwards attended lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York (sessions of 1833–34). The following year, at the age of twenty-three, he commenced practice, being associated with his father until 1837. He was zealous and successful. He said of himself upon one occasion,—

"From almost life-long connection with the science of medicine and some of its eminent votaries, I have endeavored to become possessed of a fund of practical ideas and to have these based on a fair degree of common sense, and to link them with honesty and perseverance; this I thought would not fail to reward me with an honorable and successful future."

In 1858 he received the honorary degree of M.D. from the New York State Medical Society, and the same honor was conferred upon him by the Castleton Medical College, in Vermont. In 1867 he was elected a permanent member of the New York State Medical Society, and in 1872 of the American Medical Association. In 1851, while in the discharge of his duty, he met with an accident by which he lost his left leg or sustained injuries making necessary its amputation below the knee. In 1852 he moved to Cochecton, N. Y., and during his residence there was twice elected president of the Sullivan County Medical Society and also chosen the first president of the Tri-States Medical Society.

As a surgeon, he had a wide reputation and he was appointed surgeon of the Erie Railroad. During thirty-two years' practice he performed more than five hundred operations in which he had to administer chloroform.

He was married three times,—in 1835 to Julia Reed, in 1851 to Harriet Wheeler, and in 1864 to Mindle Lakin, who survives him. He died January 6, 1877.

Dr. William W. Appley, a present practitioner at Cochecton, N. Y., and having much to do in Wayne County, is a son of the late Dr. William W. Appley, and was born in Damascus township, June 24, 1847. Drs. Theron and Otto Appley are practitioners in Damascus.

Dr. Urial Wright was born in the town of Windsor, Berkshire County, Massachusetts, May 15, 1790. His grandfather, Asa Wright, was an architect and planned and superintended the building of Dartmouth College, New Hampshire. His father, Asahel Wright, subsequently graduated at that college, and after completing a medical course, was appointed a surgeon in the United States navy, serving in that capacity until the close of the War of the Revolution. He then settled in Windsor and raised a large family. There were eight sons, seven of whom became professional men, and all were successful in life. Five chose the medical profession. Worthington, who became a minister, also studied medicine and practiced for a time, so that there were, at one time, the father and six sons in practice. Urial was the fourth son. He received an academic education, and studied medicine with his father two years, then with Dr. Asa Burbank, of Lanesboro, Mass., nine months, and with Noadiah Swift, of Bennington, Vt., six months. In the spring of 1814 he left his home in Massachusetts to commence his practice in the "Beech Woods" of Northeastern Pennsylvania, locating at Mount Pleasant. He traveled on horseback, his outfit consisting of his horse, a valise, a pair of saddle-bags and twenty-five dollars in money. His attention was directed to this point by his brother, the Rev. Worthington Wright, who was then laboring in Wayne County as missionary under appointment of the Connecticut Home Missionary Society, and who resided in Bethany. His rides at first were long, over bad roads or no roads, sometimes being only a bridle-path marked by "blazed" trees, and his practice extended from Scott to Canaan, comprising the townships of Mount Pleasant, Preston, Clinton, Canaan, Buckingham and Lebanon, in Wayne County, and Thompson, Herrick and Clifford, in Susquehanna County; but as new business centres sprang up, it became less extended but none the less extensive. By nature Dr. Wright was equipped for pioneer service. He possessed a sound mind in a sound body; was compactly and stoutly built, with an iron constitution and robust health. Excepting an occasional attack of inflammatory rheumatism, he was never ill until his last sickness. For forty years he never lost a meal unless he was where it could not be obtained. In 1816 he was married to Jerusha Spencer, a daughter of Peter Spencer, who had settled in Preston, on the farm now occupied by Nathan A. Monroe, the same spring that he came to Mount Pleasant. The marriage was a happy one, his wife being helpful and his home pleasant. They had a patriarchal family of ten children, one of whom died in infancy, and five are still living.

Hosmer, the oldest, was drowned at the age of twenty-five, being then postmaster at Pleasant Mount, and having entered into a business partnership with Henry W. Stone. William, the second son, is living in Mount Pleasant and holds the office of justice of the peace; Eliza J., wife of A. D. Higbie, of Newark, N. J.; Catharine S., wife of Edward M. Atwater, died in 1880; Ellen A., wife of Henry H. Rogers, of Danvers, Mass.; Henry C., killed at the battle of Gettysburg, July 3, 1863; Charles A., died in 1860; John S., of Boston, who enlisted at the outbreak of the war for the Union, and went out as captain of Company C, Sixth Pennsylvania Reserves, the first company that enlisted from Wayne County; and Julius C., of Scranton, who served three years in the war.

In 1828 Dr. Wright was appointed surgeon's mate by the commanding officer of the Seventieth Regiment of Pennsylvania Militia, receiving his commission from Governor Shultze. His duties consisted mainly in granting certificates of disability, exempting men from military duty in the days when militia trainings were in vogue. He had been in practice some thirty years, when, in 1845, the degree of M.D. was conferred upon him by the Berkshire Medical College, of Pittsfield, Mass.

Dr. Wright's life was not marked by great achievements or remarkable incidents. He pursued the even tenor of his way, practicing his profession with remarkable fidelity and success. He possessed a receptive mind and retentive memory, acquiring skill by long and extensive practice, and keeping abreast of the times in the progress of medical science. He was peculiarly successful in the treatment of fevers. He responded alike to the calls of the rich and poor, and performed a large amount of hard labor, for which he received no compensation. He commanded the respect of all, while his affability and kindness endeared him to many, and he was ever a welcome visitor to the sick. Always self-possessed, he was calm when others were alarmed and excited, his presence often proving a benediction, and his cheerful countenance doing good like a medicine. He was a man of sound judgment and excellent common-sense, was no speech-maker and what he said was uttered in brief, sententious sentences. His moral character, like his physical structure, was sound, square and upright. In 1829 he united with the Congregational Church, and in 1831, when the form of government was changed to Presbyterian, he was chosen one of the ruling elders, which office he held until his death. During the winter of 1865--66 his health began to fail, and the following May he was compelled to relinquish practice altogether, having practiced just fifty-two years. He died September 30, 1866, of dropsy of the heart, in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

Dr. Erastus Wright, one of the pioneer physicians of Wayne County, was born in Windsor, Berkshire County, Mass., May 11, 1794. When quite young he received some medical instruction from his father, who was a practicing physician in the town of Windsor; he subsequently renewed the study of medicine with his brother, Dr. Urial Wright, of Mount Pleasant, and later with Dr. Isaac Roosa, of Bethany; he graduated at Pittsfield Medical College, and to the valuable instruction received from Professor Chester Dewey he often referred; soon after graduating he located in Salem, where he practiced medicine with almost uninterrupted success for thirty-seven years, and at one time, for a period of two or three years, he was the only physician from the locality now known as Greenville, Lackawanna County, to Hawley, on the east and west turnpike, as well as from Waymart to Stoddartsville, Stroudsburg, etc., on the old Belmont and Easton turnpike; he usually rode on horse-back, with medicine in saddle-bags fastened to his saddle, and scarce a mountain-path or by-way for more than a score of miles around could be found with which he was not familiar. He had thoroughly studied the standard works of that day, which, together with extensive practice, gave him a knowledge in the diagnosis of diseases, and the needed treatment, peculiarly his own. Some characteristic features might be named, one of which was his love for his chosen profession, that he persistently held to the close of life; another was that he never prescribed at random, ever questioning closely, not hasty in giving an opinion, but when once given he seldom had reason to change it. Possessed of a vigorous constitution, as well as a benevolent heart, he was eminently successful in all the duties of his profession, anxious to relieve suffering if possible with potent remedies and cheerful words, thus securing the esteem and confidence of many. On the 23d of February, 1825, he was married to Miss Lydia Muzzey, daughter of John Muzzey, of Brookfield, Worcester County, Mass., and his character as a Christian, moral and temperance man and uprightness as a citizen, he was often heard to say, was due largely to her godly influence. They had two daughters,—Mary Lucy, who married Rev. A. R. Raymond, Presbyterian clergyman of Salem, with their only son now residing in the dwelling formerly occupied by Dr. Wright; Frances Amelia, married Colonel B. T. Cook, of Franklin, Delaware County, N. Y., where they now reside. His beloved wife died October 8, 1849, aged fifty-two years; he subsequently married Mrs. Nancy Nicholson, widow of the late Zenas Nicholson, March 15, 1854; she still lives at the advanced age of eighty-three years. Dr. Wright was respected by the physicians of the county, and in his last sickness, many of them manifested professional kindness and interest. At the time of his death he had been a member of the Presbyterian Church twenty-seven years. He died rejoicing February 21, 1860, aged sixty-six years.

Dr. William W. Sanger, who practiced in Honesdale from 1849 to 1853, was born at Canterbury, Conn., August 10, 1816, and removed to Wheeling, Va. (now West Virginia), in 1836, where he commenced the study of medicine in 1842. He went to New York to attend lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1844, and graduated from that institution with credit in 1847. He served in several official positions in New York, and then was invited to supply the vacancy in Honesdale occasioned by the death of Dr. Graves, which he accepted. His unusually long probationary period as student in the great metropolitan centre of medical education had given him adequate preparation to perform the duties of the vocation he had selected, and an acquaintance with the eminent of the profession there, enabled him to come well recommended.

At that period the practice of medicine in the medical centres of the nation was undergoing a transition state, but it had not reached the country villages. Those marvelous agents of anæsthesia, ether and chloroform, had just come into use; new discoveries in etiology and treatment of disease and improvements in the science of medicine had occurred, promising much and predicting a glorious future for the profession.

The physicians who were then in practice in Honesdale had become old, having been educated when almost all diseases were designated inflammatory, and supposed to require a perturbing treatment called antiphlogistic, the lancet being the principal remedy—blood-letting, copious, frequent and heroic. Besides, in accordance with the humoral pathology, the stomach was foul, and required an emetic to cleanse it; or the same condition of the bowels required a cathartic. Often, in the same patient and at the same time, all this bristling array of offensive weapons was used in succession. There was a popular faith, too, in the potency of drugs; they were fond of heroism and brave doses, and portentous appearances favored the idea of magnificent results. These physicians were now designated as those of the "Old School" (or old fogies), in contradistinction to the new school, and were ultimately obliged to consent to the social requirements of the age.

Dr. Sanger was of the new school, a man of science, educated power, acquired skill, and acted upon the principle that disease is not an entity to be attacked and driven out of the system by violent and destructive expedients, and instead of venesections and emetico-cathartics, he had his fever patients sponged with water and fed with gruel.

At the advent of Dr. Sanger in this county there had never been a medical organization, and he found the physicians engaged in rivalry, jealousy and competition, instead of cultivating a spirit of reciprocity and cherishing amicable relations with each other. In all his relations with them, however, he adhered strictly to the code of ethics adopted by the National Medical Association, which is now authority in our country, thus exemplifying their duty, and exacted from them a like treatment. On one occasion, upon enforcing the principle, a serious result was threatened. One of his surgical patients became fretful and restless during his temporary absence, and friends called in another surgeon, who commenced removing bandages, and was caught in the act by the doctor upon his unexpected return, who exclaimed, "Sir! you have no right here; this is my patient, and you have no business to even look at him in my absence!" at the same time with his strong right arm thrusting the intruder aside. A suit for assault was commenced, but good counsels afterward prevailing, the matter was quieted.

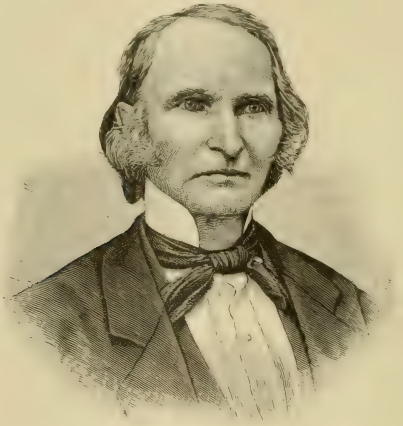
There were two conspicuous elements in his nature, viz.: humor and ridicule, unsurpassed by none of his cotemporaries, the former subserving a practical utility, the latter a sort of harmless, mirthful sport, which, when reversed, so as to fall upon himself, was productive of the greatest humility. The humorous element in his address was his greatest strategy, and with this he dosed his patients with many a pill of wisdom, cunningly sugar-coated. He approached his patient with a cheerful and encouraging demeanor, thus rendering all the moral aid to be derived as a curative agent.



In relation to fees, the old school practitioners, in their rivalry, had been endeavoring to ascertain how cheaply they could conduct a given case of sickness, and charges were regulated with reference to future employment; hence the fear of an extortionate bill. For a visit in town was charged a half-dollar; and out of town the same, with twenty-five cents added for every mile of travel one way, including medicines, for a distance of four miles one dollar, and eight miles two dollars was charged. They rode on horseback, equipped with saddle-bags filled with medicines, strapped behind the rider (John Gilpin fashion), the outfit containing also a turnkey and forceps for extracting teeth, the fee for which was one shilling.

On Dr. Sanger's arrival he found this state of things existing in Wayne County, and it was the subject of his sharp ridicule. He had no objection to the gratuitous distribution of medical services, if such could be afforded; but he did not like to see the medical fee disgraced by its association with a half-dollar; and as for giving away his medicines, a physician was simply foolish. This bold innovator doubled the fees at once. He adopted the plan of writing his prescriptions, to be filled by the druggist, and the medicines to be paid for by the patient; rode in his carriage, sometimes with one horse, at others with two, accompanied by his groom. He asserted that he knew nothing about teeth; "pulling teeth" was a specialty belonging to another profession.

By some of the profession and laity it was at first predicted that the people would not be submissive to such extravagance and increased charges, and that such a course could not be maintained; nevertheless, the people admired his dignity of bearing, loved his jokes, laughed at his ridicule, and the doctor was always popular with them, and had no idle moments to spare. He was not a failure. In 1853 he was appointed resident physician of the Almshouse Hospital, Blackwell's Island, which position he filled for several years. While there the city authorities requested him to investigate thoroughly, and report freely, the facts relating to the social evil. Two years of assiduous effort in this direction resulted in the publication of his famous book, "The History of Prostitution." Dr. Sanger was much interested in politics and was a member of the Tammany Society, of New York. He died May 8, 1872.

Hon. Rodney Harmes, licentiate of medicine, was born in the town of Neversink, Sullivan county, N. Y., on April 1, 1813. He was on his paternal side of German descent. His grandfather, Jacob Artman Harmes, was a native of Brandenburg, in Prussia, but after reaching his majority was, with a boon companion, imprudent enough to travel into the domains of the Elector of Hesse Cassel, where he and his companion were seized and put on board of a man-of-war, transported to America, and forced into the Hessian army for the purpose of aiding England to conquer her rebellious colonies. In a short time he escaped from the Hessian army, became a soldier in the American army and served until the close of the war. After this period he married Miss Margaret Lummox, and settled in the town of Neversink, Sullivan County, N. Y. He was a very ingenious smith, and could make locks, gun-locks, cow-bells, traps and all edge-tools. He raised a large family, comprising three sons and seven daughters, and died about 1821, aged nearly eighty years. His oldest son, Charles Harmes, was the father of the subject of this sketch. He was a large, powerful man, and worked at various occupations, including farming, lumbering and blacksmithing. Although his education was very limited in Neversink, his native town, he was elected and served two consecutive terms as justice of the peace. He was married three times, and raised a family of twelve children. He moved to Illinois when advanced in life, and soon after died there, aged over eighty years.

Rodney Harmes

Rodney Harmes, the oldest son of Charles Harmes, from the time of his mother's death, which occurred when he was between eight and nine years of age, never had a permanent home until he located at Pleasant Mount, Pa. But little reliance could be placed upon the schools where he spent his boyhood days, and he was ten years old before he could read and understand what he read. He then became fond of reading, but owing to his inability to obtain books, and to the frequent changes of place to which he was subjected, he had few opportunities to gratify his inclination. At the age of nineteen years he bargained with an uncle to live with him a year, to receive eight dollars a month for nine months' labor, and three months' schooling. His uncle was a blacksmith, and kept him busy with the bellows and sledge during the summer. When the winter term of school commenced he took his books and went to school, as he believed, according to the contract, with the intention of studying, in addition to arithmetic and geography, grammar, the teacher being competent to instruct in that art, an acquirement which few possessed in Sullivan County at that time. He returned to his uncle's home in the evening, and found his prospects for schooling blasted. His uncle claimed that he had not agreed to board him and permit him to attend school at that busy time in his shop.

The nephew, believing it to be the wisest course, continued, and completed his nine months of labor. His uncle then offered to fulfil his part of the contract during the term of the following summer school. His nephew chose to relieve him from that expense, believing, ignorant as he was, that he was more capable of teaching the female teachers of that time than they were of teaching him. He took his wages and went to another shop and worked two months, for which he received twenty-four dollars. In the month of May, 1833, at the age of twenty, with a very limited education and with less than fifty dollars, he went to Ellenville, Ulster County, N. Y., and commenced the study of medicine, Dr. Edwin Eldridge, who, in 1834 and 1835, practiced in Mount Pleasant, being his preceptor.

Dr. Eldridge took a deep interest in the welfare of his student, who soon became useful in his office. He was persuaded by his preceptor to visit patients in order to speedily obtain, with his reading, some knowledge of pathology. He remained under the tuition of Dr. Eldridge about eight months, and then removed to Liberty, Sullivan County, N. Y., and entered the office of Dr. Blake Wales, studying under him eighteen months. During a part of this time, however, he taught school. In the fall of 1835 he went to Castleton, Vermont, and attended lectures at the Vermont Academy of Medicine for three months.

He then returned to Sullivan County and entered the office of Dr. Daniel M. Angell, at Monticello, where he continued his studies until the fall of 1836, and then taught school four months, at twelve dollars a month. At this term of school he endeavored to teach grammar, although he had never studied it. He then returned to Monticello for the purpose of reviewing his studies. But his preceptor was taken sick and he was compelled to have him for a patient, besides taking charge of other patients and riding occasionally to visit the sick for the other physician in the village. Finally, on the 25th day of July, 1837, he was examined by the board of censors of the Medical Society of Sullivan County, N. Y., and received his diploma of licentiate of medicine.

Soon after he established himself in the practice of his profession at Pleasant Mount, Wayne County, Pa., where he has remained engaged in his professional labors half a century. During most of this time his rides have frequently extended to a distance of from ten to fifteen, and sometimes twenty miles. He usually rode on horseback, both winter and summer. As student and licentiate of medicine, he has practiced his profession fifty-two years, and still, occasionally, visits patients and prescribes in his office. Twice he ran a very narrow risk of having his horse slip and fall on the ice, and then rise up when his left foot was fast in the stirrup. The first time he escaped by climbing up the stirrup strap, his horse remaining quiet. The next time his horse rose up and ran, dragging him on the ice, but fortunately his foot loosened before he received any injury.

He has been closely identified with local affairs in his township and county, and exerted a wide and favorable influence. Probably no man in the county is more generally known. He has held various offices of trust and responsibility, always performing his duties in a prompt and faithful manner. On August 3, 1842, he was elected lieutenant-colonel of militia, and on June 13, 1845, was made colonel of his regiment.

On November 24, 1860, he was appointed and commissioned associate judge of Wayne County, and served one year. He has been twice married : first, to Mary T. Miller, daughter of Jonathan Miller, Esq., to whom he was united September 2, 1838. She died August 20, 1848, leaving a daughter named Catharine, born February 8, 1845, who married Adolf Charles Lempke, November 8, 1865. He died February 2, 1884, leaving two sons, namely,—George, born September 20, 1866, and Rodney, born July 10, 1868.

For his second wife he married Emeline Eaton, widow of Wellington K. Eaton, and daughter of Andrew Lester, one of the pioneers of Mount Pleasant township. Of this marriage were born Rudolf Harmes, M.D., born June 30, 1851, died February 15, 1883; and Herman Harmes, his only surviving son, born February 9, 1863, a popular teacher and student-at-law.

Like most of the old practitioners of Wayne County, Dr. Harmes has failed to accumulate much property, but owns and occupies a small farm at Pleasant Mount, where he is passing the remainder of what has been an active, earnest, energetic and successful life. Had he possessed broader opportunities, his natural ability would have insured him success in any field of labor. Such men deserve great credit for accomplishing what they do in the face of obstacles which cause many to fall by the wayside.

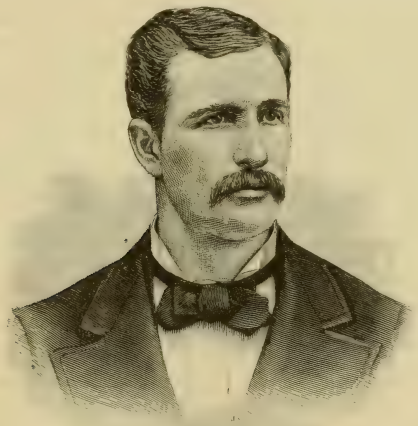
Rudolf Harmes, M.D., son of Hon. Rodney Harmes, licentiate of medicine, was born at Pleasant Mount, Wayne County, June 30, 1851. From the age of five to eighteen his chief delight was (like that of his grandfather, Andrew Lester) angling, trapping and hunting, being, at the age of ten, a good marksman. His progress in acquiring an education at the district school was rather tardy; but he admired tales of hazardous adventures and marvelous escapes, and indulged in reading that kind of literature many hours, and occasionally amused himself by looking at anatomical plates and learning the names of bones, muscles and arteries, thereby obtaining knowledge which was eventually of much benefit to him, although, at the time, he was of the firm belief that he would never practice medicine.

In the fall of 1869, when the Pleasant Mount Academy went into operation, he commenced studying at that institution with the determination of becoming, at least, an ordinary English scholar. From that time his progress was successful and speedy, and at the end of a few months he was qualified as a teacher, and the following winter taught school for a term of four months, but became dissatisfied with teaching as an occupation.

He next applied himself to dentistry, an art which he soon learned, and which, with reading medicine, occupied his time for a few months. For the purpose of obtaining further improvement in knowledge, he again returned to his studies at the academy, and in addition to other branches, studied Latin.

In the fall of 1872, he went to New York, and spent the winter attending lectures at the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, and the spring following returned to his father's home, with the full determination to become a physician and surgeon.

He spent the summer engaged with his professional reading and assisting his father in attending patients, and the following fall—1873—returned to the Bellevue Hospital Medical College and attended lectures during the winter, at the same time receiving special tuition on diseases of the heart and lungs from Dr. Austin Flint. At the college commencement, the following spring, he received his degree of Doctor of Medicine, and returned to Pleasant Mount conscious of being qualified to enter upon the duties of his profession. His father at that time had a large practice, and was desirous that his son should eventually supersede him.



The popularity of the young physician, and the confidence which the people had in his ability, obtained for him immediate patronage, which he retained during one year; but, believing that he could find a more desirable, or, at least, a more lucrative practice elsewhere, he moved to Becket, Berkshire County, Mass., where, on the 28th day of April, 1875, he was admitted as a Fellow of the Massachusetts Medical Society. At Becket he had, during a few months, a liberal patronage and satisfactory compensation; but in the fall of 1876 the manufacturing establishments in that part of the State were suspended, laborers were discharged and were leaving the place, and he found his practice too unprofitable to remain there.

He then returned to Pleasant Mount, where he found his father still the chief practitioner and desirous to have him again established in the place of his nativity. He received a warm welcome from his former friends and patrons, and immediately engaged in an extensive and laborious practice, which he retained until the time of his death.

As a surgeon he was confident and competent, and delighted in performing operations which required good eyes and a steady hand. As an accoucheur he was not outrivaled by any practitioner in his county. He was quite a large and strong man, and occasionally, during the season of haying, would go into his father's field and use a scythe, where he rarely found his equal. At boxing, an amusement in which he sometimes indulged, strong men declared that they would not like to have him strike them in anger.

On June 19, 1877, he married Kate Atwater, daughter of Edward M. Atwater, by whom he had a son, named Edward, born July 16, 1880, who is still living to cheer the declining years of his grandparents.

In consequence of an injury of his head, received by a fall when he was a boy, he was occasionally a sufferer from severe headache, sometimes attended with vomiting, but could not be persuaded to discontinue visiting the sick until compelled by sad necessity. But his troubles were known by only a few, for he suffered without complaining. His final sickness commenced the fore part of February, 1883. The attack being like previous ones, gave no alarm, excepting to his father and his family and friends, but, on the 15th day of the month, when all but his father were hopeful, suddenly and apparently without warning, even to himself, he ceased breathing. The day previous to his death he had, as he told his wife, a slight paralytic attack of the heart, which soon passed off. It was his father's opinion that he had sub-acute inflammation of the stomach, but that the real cause of his death was paralysis of the heart. No other man in the northern part of Wayne County ever passed away so universally beloved, regretted and mourned.

Dr. Dwight Reed was born in Salisbury, Litchfield County, Conn., March 8, 1824. He is a descendent in the seventh generation of John Reed, who emigrated to this country from Cornwall, England, at the restoration of the Stuarts. He was a junior officer in the army of Cromwell, the Protector, and is supposed to have left his native shores to secure greater personal freedom, and because of the opposition of an older brother to his proposed marriage. He first located at Providence, R. I., then removed to Rye, New York, and finally settled at Norwalk, Conn., where he died in 1730, at the advanced age of ninety-seven years, leaving descendants. The intervening generations, in the line of descent, down to the subject of this sketch were represented by Thomas, John, Josiah (1st), Josiah (2d) and Charles G. Reed. Of these, Josiah (1st) was the great-grandfather of Dr. Reed, and emigrated from Norwalk to Salisbury, Conn., where he became the progenitor of the Salisbury branch of the now numerous Reed family. He inherited the warlike instincts of his ancestors and died at Ticonderoga while performing active service in the French and Indian War. His son Josiah, a farmer, tanner and shoemaker by occupation, succeeded him, married and had a large family of children, of whom Charles G. Reed, born 1797, was the father of Dr. Reed. The latter married Semanthe E. Bird, a descendant of Thos. Bird, who resided at Hartford, Conn., in 1644, and daughter of Lieutenant Isaac Bird, a soldier of the Revolution, and engaged in mercantile pursuits in Connecticut. In 1832 he removed to Bethany, Wayne County, Pa., where he followed farming until his death. He had six children—Dwight Charles Bird (died); Egbert Garfield, who resides in Honesdale; William Henry, a graduated physician and druggist at Honesdale; Loranie Abigail (died); and Ellen Salome, wife of Rev. Melville Smith, a Methodist minister in Illinois.

Dr. Dwight Reed came to Wayne County with his parents in 1832, when eight years of age. Soon after he was sent to Salisbury, Conn., where he attended the district school, a more advanced institution in that old settled section than any in the pioneer country in which his father had located in Pennsylvania. He subsequently attended the Beech Woods Academy, in Bethany, where he completed his studies. In 1844 he began the study of medicine with Dr. Adonijah Strong, of Honesdale, and later attended lectures in the Medical Department of the University of the City of New York, where he was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1848. While in attendance at the university he was under the private instruction of Dr. William Detmold, an eminent surgeon in New York City.

After receiving his degree, Dr. Reed established himself in the practice of his profession in Honesdale, where, in connection with his brother, Egbert G. Reed, he also opened a drug-store in the old Arcade building. In 1855 he disposed of his interest in the store to his brother and thereafter confined himself to the practice of his profession alone. He continued to enjoy a large and lucrative practice, taking high rank as a surgeon and general practitioner until he relaxed his energies in late years and limited his practice to certain families and cases, acting frequently, however, in consultation with other physicians, where his recognized ability and skill are deemed necessary. In surgery he has always advocated the largest possible conservatism, esteeming that surgeon deserving of greatest commendation who saves a limb rather than seeks after the establishment of a reputation in the community by the performance of amputation. In the practice of medicine he has not that confidence in the curative influence of drugs that would be expected in a physician, but relies more upon surrounding his patient with favorable influences, and trusting to the vis medicatrix natura than to the nimia cura medicina—believing that it is easier to prevent disease than to cure it. For the former he would depend upon the proper observance of the laws of nature, and for the latter upon her medicines,—food, drink, exercise, sleep, air and warmth.

As a man Dr. Reed holds a high place in the esteem of his fellows, and his integrity and uprightness of character have never been questioned. While sacredly respecting the creeds and beliefs of others, he is himself non-religious, having early in life adopted the rationalistic hypothesis of life, that nature or the universe is all that exists; that it is self-existent, or uncreated, and contains inherently all the laws, forces and modes of action which produce its varied phenomena. Being asked what he thought of the Apostles' Creed, he replied, "I have adopted one less dogmatical,—

"I believe in the Darwinian theory; in the Evolution Hypothesis; in the Undulation of Light and the Luminiferous Ether—and in the Atomic Constitution of Matter."

"Now then about Providence?" "I will answer you in the words of that Priest of Science, John W. Draper, my revered instructor in chemistry: 'There is no such thing as Providence, for nature proceeds under irresistible laws. The vital force which pervades the world is what the illiterate call God.'"

In politics the doctor is intensely Republican; and believes the republic is to be preserved and perpetuated only through the principles of its party.

Dr. Reed married, in 1852, Caroline W., daughter of Nathaniel and Lydia Bliss, of Brattleboro, Vt. His only child is Ada Carrie, wife of Louis J. Dorflinger, of Honesdale.

DR. CHARLES A. DUSINBERRE was born at Warwick, Orange County, New York, October 20, 1823. His father, William V. Dusinberre, engaged in mercantile pursuits at Cornwall-on-Hudson, and married Mary, daughter of Daniel Jessup, of Florida, Orange County. His grandfather, Daniel C. Dusinberre, was an extensive farmer near Edenville, Orange County, and one of the early settlers of that section.

Dr. Dusinberre's early education was derived by attendance at a private school taught by Rev. Jonathan Silliman, of Canterbury, Orange County, New York, in which he received careful instruction in the English branches of study. He subsequently served as a clerk in his father's store for several years, and then began the study of medicine with Dr. George C. Blackman, of Canterbury, by whose advice his attention was directed to the profession. Dr. Blackman was a prominent physician and surgeon, and subsequently filled the chair of surgery at the Cincinnati Medical College.

C. A. Dusinberre M.D.

While pursuing his medical studies with Dr. Blackman, Dr. Dusinberre attended lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, for two winters, but owing to his father's failing health he was obliged to discontinue his studies, and go with him to Key West, Florida, in the hope that the change would prove beneficial to him. Returning in the spring of 1845, he taught school in Orange County for about two years, and in the fall of 1847 resumed his attendance upon the lectures of the Medical College. At this time the disease commonly known as "ship-fever," a low type of typhus fever, was prevailing to a serious extent on Ward's Island, and a call was made upon the college for medical assistance. Among the students who volunteered to go to the succor of the afflicted was Dr. Dusinberre, who soon after was stricken down with fever himself, and narrowly escaped with his life. After his recovery he returned to Ward's Island and resumed his labors and practice in the hospital at that place. In the spring of 1849 he was graduated as Doctor of Medicine at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and April 24th following was appointed to the position of temporary resident physician to the Nursery Hospital, on Randall's Island, taking the place of Dr. Winterbottom, who was obliged to go South because of impaired health. Before receiving this appointment Dr. Dusinberre was compelled to pass examination before the medical board of Blackwell's Island, his commission, upon recommendation of the board, being signed by Mayor W. J. Havemeyer. He continued to occupy that responsible place until the appointment of Dr. Henry M. Whittlesey as the regular incumbent, and on July 1, 1849, responded to the call for assistants at the almshouse on Blackwell's Island, during the terrible cholera scourge of 1849. In December of that year he succeeded his old preceptor, Dr. Blackman, as surgeon on the ship "Constellation," one of the Kermit Line of emigrant vessels, plying between New York and Liverpool. The "Constellation" was at that time the largest packet-ship running between those points. Not finding this position congenial to his tastes and aspirations, he made but one trip, and in March, 1850, located in the practice of his profession at Perth Amboy, New Jersey. Soon after he removed to Rossville, Staten Island, where he practiced for five years. In the fall of 1855 he began the practice of his profession in New York City, and remained there until June, 1857. On March 7, 1856, while in practice in New York, he was appointed by the managers of the Northwestern Dispensary one of the attendant physicians at that institution. In June, 1857, he bought the practice of Dr. N. F. Marsh, of Honesdale, Wayne County, Pa., and removed to that place, where he has continued to enjoy a high reputation as a practitioner of medicine and surgery for more than a quarter of a century, and where he is held in great respect and esteem by a large circle of acquaintances. He has no special theories, aside from the general creeds of his profession, to guide him in his practice, but has always aimed to perform his professional work in a conscientious and unostentatious manner. For many years he has been the surgeon of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, resident at Honesdale, and held the position of pension examiner under the government, from 1865 until displaced by the change of administration, in 1885. For nine years he was a member of the School Board of Honesdale, for six years president of that body. In June, 1852, he married Elizabeth S., daughter of Richard Conner, of Staten Island, an old family there, whose ancestors at one time owned nearly one-third of the island. He has three sons living, viz.: Henry W., editor of a newspaper at Jonesboro, Tenn.; Charles C., residing in Honesdale; and Richard, who is engaged in the cultivation of oranges in Florida.

Consider King, M.D. (1797–1867), came from Greene County, N. Y., about 1856 and settled at Honesdale, where he practiced his profession successfully for some ten years. He was appointed and served as a member of the first board of examiners for examining army recruits at the beginning of the late Civil War at Honesdale, and died some two years after its close.

Dr. William F. Denton, who practiced in Honesdale for many years, was born at Warwick, in Orange County, N. Y., on December 15, 1815. When about twenty-one years of age he received an injury which confined him for some time, made active exercise impracticable and eventually changed the whole course of his life. It was this which led to his studying medicine. He began reading under the direction of Dr. Coe and Dr. Stanley, of Orange County, and commenced practice at Rockaway, L. I., but in December, 1839, he came to Honesdale, where the remainder of his life was spent. His physical constitution was naturally weak, and he obtained so large a practice that it proved a sufficient burden to break down his health, so that he died a young man, in his forty-fourth year, on November 19, 1859. He was the first person buried in Glen Dyberry Cemetery, Honesdale, his remains being interred upon November 21st, two days after his death. Dr. Denton had married, on June 5, 1844, Miss Mary Schofield, of Honesdale, who still survives. They were the parents of four children, of whom Samuel, the eldest, died September 11, 1866, in the United States army; Mary Emma became the wife of William Taylor, of San Francisco; Joseph S., is a druggist of Baltimore; and William F. died in childhood.

A friend who knew him well says of Dr. Denton: "As a physician he studied all systems and followed none, . . . drew his remedies from every source within his reach, irrespective of authority, and applied them with a judgment which constituted the basis of his success. . . . In social life he was genial and companionable, and, when aroused from his habitually meditative mood, exhibited a remarkably fine flow of spirits and manifested a hearty appreciation of congenial qualities in others. Busied as he was in his professional life, he still found time for other pursuits, and his knowledge extended over a wide and varied range of subjects. But it was as a man that he achieved his great success. The nobility of his soul and the greatness of heart he lived out in a life of beautiful symmetry and proportion. It was alike manifest in the good that he loved and the wrong that he hated. . . . No man ever faced death with more calm composure or more quiet resignation."

J. Hawley Olmstead was born in Bethany January, 1823, and was the son of Deacon Osborn Olmstead. In his youth he is remembered as a bright, witty, intelligent, athletic boy, the admiration of his fellows. From 1832 to 1844 he had the advantages of an education afforded by the Beech Woods Academy, of his native borough, under such instructors as Edmund L. Reed, Benjamin Dimock, Rev. H. C. Nash, Morley, Wood et al., and completed his literary studies at the High School of Rev. Willard Richardson, commencing the study of medicine at the end of this year in the office of Dr. Edwin Graves. He had early in life acquired a musical education, both vocal and instrumental, and up to this time such was his social connection in his native place that at all such gatherings his presence was necessary.

In the autumn of 1846 he matriculated at the Medical Department of the University of the City of New York, attended two full courses of medical lectures there, and received the degree of M.D. in March, 1848. He commenced practice immediately with his former preceptor in Honesdale, and married Miss Mary, daughter of E. Patmor, Esq., in 1852.

In 1856 he was appointed post surgeon in the United States Army; was stationed in Texas three years, and upon being relieved, entered into co-partnership with his brother, Dr. J. C. Olmstead, of Dundaff, Pa. His health failing, he returned to the old family homestead at Bethany, where he died of consumption in June, 1861. His wife survived him but one year. Their only child and daughter, Mary, married James Babson.

Dr. George B. Curtis was born in Bethany February 4, 1835, and died in Hawley June 9, 1884. He was the son of Rev. H. Curtis, a clergyman of the Baptist Church of that place, and had three brothers and two sisters. On arriving at proper age he was sent to the schools of the different grades in his native village, completing his literary course at the University of Northern Pennsylvania.

Having decided to become a medical man, he commenced his studies with Dr. King, of Honesdale, and after complying with the requisitions of the University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia, graduated at that institution in March, 1858. The same year he formed a partnership with an old and respectable practitioner of Hawley, Dr. H. L. Stearns, with whom he practiced three years, then followed his profession alone until the time of his death.

Dr. Curtis in 1862 married Miss Augusta Cook, daughter of John A. Cook, of Ledgedale. They had three sons and four daughters, viz.: John H., Augustus C., Eugene, Nellie, Harriet, Margaret, Julia. The eldest, Dr. John H., is a graduate of the New York City University, and promises to become a worthy successor of his father.

Dr. Curtis was truly one of the respectable of the profession. His religious faith was that of his esteemed father, and of his character, virtue was the foundation and ethics the test. Guilty of no vicious habit, he was always reliable, always found in the same place, gradually rising in the estimation of his professional confrères, the respect of his patients and confidence of the people. In the practice of medicine he was faithful, and in the department of surgery he performed some of the capital operations successfully. When unemployed he was economical of his time, his leisure hours being spent in the perusal of medical journals, and he often furnished articles for them. He was a respected member of the "Tri-States Medical Society," of Port Jervis, N. Y., and at his death that body selected Dr. Dingman, of Hawley, his colleague and fellow-townsman to deliver a memorial address, in which Dr. Curtis is described as "considerably above the medium height, of rather a large frame, light features, light hair and a fair complexion. His countenance wore a serious and thoughtful expression, but was often lighted up with smiles during social and friendly intercourse. His manner was composed and quiet, but always courteous, and his whole deportment that of a refined gentleman."

Abram Coolbaugh Dingman, M.D., was born at Dingman's Ferry, on the Delaware, in Pike County, Pa., September 18, 1843. His early life was spent on the home farm, where he had the usual opportunity of attending the district school, but later was a close student at the Deckertown Academy, N. J. Inclining to the profession of medicine rather than a business life, in 1862 he borrowed some medical works from Dr. Gratton, of Monroe County, and during his leisure hours from other duties applied himself to study and reading, which he continued more or less without a tutor for over two years.

In 1865 he began reading medicine in the office of Dr. P. F. Fulmer, of Dingman's Ferry, took two regular courses of lectures at the University of Pennsylvania, and was graduated at that institution in the class of 1867. In August following, Dr. Dingman settled at Hawley, Wayne County, where his success in the diagnosis and treatment of disease was soon fully established, and where his field of practice rapidly widened. He has continued the duties of his profession at Hawley since, a period of nearly twenty years, and enjoys the confidence of a large circle of the most intelligent and thoughtful people in the community. He established a drug-store at Hawley upon settling there, which he has conducted in connection with his other business and general practice of medicine. He has been a member of the board of pension examiners for Wayne County since July, 1885, and of the Tri-States Medical Society, of which he was a charter member, since 1872.

Since his residence at Hawley Dr. Dingman has taken a zealous interest in all local matters tending to the growth and proper development of the place, in its educational work and civil government. For several years he has been an influential factor in the political field of Wayne; held the office of treasurer of Palmyra township in 1881 and 1882, and was elected burgess of Hawley in February, 1885. He married, in 1876, Josephine, daughter of Joseph A. Dow, a locomotive engineer, and Mary (Homans) Dow, of Windsor, Broome County, N. Y. They have one child, Nellie Dingman, and Mrs. Dingman has an only sister, Annie Dow. Her paternal grandfather was Rev. Joseph Dow, who settled at Mount Pleasant, Wayne County, from New England, and who died in Susquehanna County, Pa. Her maternal grandfather was John Homans, a lumberman, of Windsor, and her great-grandfather was the progenitor of the family in this country from Holland.

Andrew Dingman, the progenitor of the Dingmans in Pike County, was born at Kinderhook, on the Hudson, in 1711, and came to "Dingman's choice" in 1735, where he was the pioneer settler. His son Andrew resided on the Jersey side of the Delaware, but subsequently removed to Dingman's Ferry, where his father had made a beginning. He was captain of a company and served in the struggle for the independence of the colonies, and after living to see the country again engaged in a war with England in 1812, he survived many years thereafter, and died in 1839, at the age of eighty-three years.

His wife was Jane Westbrook, who bore him two children,—Daniel W. Dingman and Cornelia, who became the wife of Daniel Van Etten, who resided at Connashaw, where the Van Etten family homestead was. Daniel W. Dingman (1775–1862), only son of Andrew, inherited his father's estate at the "Ferry," and carried on the lumber business and merchandising there during a large part of his active life. He was a leading and influential man socially and politically, and a Democrat of the Andrew Jackson type.

He was the first elected sheriff of Wayne County, in 1801, and the second holding the office, and served in the State Legislature from 1808 to 1814, during which time Pike County was taken from Wayne, and he gave the new county its name, from General Pike, a hero of the War of 1812, and he also gave Dingman township its name. He was associate judge of Pike County for twenty-six years in succession, and was chosen one of the electors in the election of President Monroe.

His wife, Mary Westbrook (1777–1852), a daughter of Benjamin Westbrook, of Sussex County, N. J., bore him children as follows:

Martin W.; Andrew; Daniel W., Jr., the first Whig prothonotary of Pike County, appointed by Governor Joseph Ritner; Cornelia, wife of Garret Brodhead, of Dingman's Ferry; Margaret, wife of Abram Coolbaugh, of Shawnee, Monroe County; and Jane, wife of Franklin Brodhead. Of these children, only Andrew and Margaret survive in 1886, the latter being eighty-five years of age. Andrew, son of Daniel W. Dingman, was born on the homestead, on Christmas day, 1804, where he has followed farming and lumbering most of his active life. He now, at the age of eighty-one years, is hale and hearty, and his correct habits through life, his even temperament and quiet ways, together with his integrity in all the relations of life's work, have gained the esteem of all who know him.

His wife, Caroline (1804–85), was a daughter of Jedediah Sayre, a large real estate owner of Deckertown, N. J., and her mother was Elizabeth Reifsnyder, of the same place. Their children are: Mary, wife of John W. Kilsby, a farmer at Dingman's Ferry; Susan, wife of John W. McInnis, of Columbus, Ohio; E. Sayre, of Scranton; Jane resides with her brother at Hawley; Margaret, wife of John Lattimore, of Dingman's Ferry; Daniel W., of Flatbrookville, Sussex County, N. J.; Alfred S., of Milford; William H., of Columbus, Ohio; Dr. A. C., subject of this sketch; and Isaac, of Dingman's Ferry.

Robert W. Brady, M.D., physician and surgeon, was born in New York City, May 30, 1842. He obtained his early education from books in the schools at Honesdale, and at the Bethany Academy. Preparatory to the study of medicine, at the age of fifteen, he entered the drug store of Reed Brothers, at Honesdale, as a clerk, where he remained one year, and after a short residence in Scranton, to which place his parents removed, he returned and served as a drug clerk for one year more in the same store, with the firm of Gilbert, Palmer & Reed. At about the age of nineteen he began the study of medicine with the late eminent physician, Dr. Adonijah Strong, of Honesdale, attended two courses of lectures at the Albany Medical College, from which institution he was graduated in the spring of 1863. The late Civil War being then in progress, and the necessities of the hospitals and field service requiring all the medical aid at the command of the government, Dr. Brady accepted the appointment of assistant surgeon One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers, Eighteenth Army Corps, under General Smith, and at once reported to Fortress Monroe for duty.

He followed the fortunes of war as a field surgeon with his army corps until May, 1864, when he was taken prisoner at Drury's Bluff, at the time General Butler was making an attempt to capture Richmond.

As a prisoner he served at Castle Thunder, a rebel prison at Richmond for Yankee prisoners, for a few weeks, and was transferred to the famous "Libby Prison," where he remained, in common with others enduring everything incident to that horribly and inhumanly kept rebel prison, for three months. Fortunately for him, he was exchanged at Aiken's Landing, went to Annapolis, and was given a furlough of twenty days, which he spent at home in recruiting his strength and with his friends. He returned to duty with his old regiment, in September, in front of Petersburg, Va., where he remained all winter, and until the surrender of General Lee and the fall of Richmond, and he recites marching into the latter city on the morning of April 3, 1865, when a part of the city and its three bridges crossing the James River were all on fire. After the fall of Richmond, General Gibbons assigned Dr. Brady to duty on his staff as medical purveyor of the Twenty-fourth Army Corps, which had been formed from the depleted troops of the Eighteenth and Tenth Army Corps. After a short service in this position he was mustered out of his regiment, and commissioned a surgeon of the Ninety-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, with the rank of major, and served the regiment in this capacity, doing provost duty through Virginia and Tennessee, until February 1866, when he was mustered out of the service and returned to Honesdale. In January, prior to the close of his services, Dr. Brady had obtained a furlough, and at Honesdale married Miss Esther, a daughter of William (1815– 78), and Amelia (1802–83) (Schoonover) Coon, of Honesdale. His large and varied experience in the army in surgery had given Dr. Brady valuable practical ideas of that branch of his profession, as well as having made him skilled in the diagnosis and proper treatment of disease, and for several years after his return he gave special attention to surgery. In connection with his professional duties he has carried on a drug business in Honesdale, to which he gave considerable attention, until his disposal of it to his brother, John Brady, in 1885.

Dr. R. W. Brady.

Dr. Brady, for the purpose of further prosecuting his medical education, and of visiting the country of his ancestors, in 1878 visited the Paris Exposition, and extended his tour to Vienna, where he attended the lectures for several months of the eminent physicians Billroth, Hebra and Sigismund, at the "Allgemeine Krankenhaus," said to be the largest universal sick-house in the world. He lends his aid to the various local institutions of the vicinity needing support, and, still loyal to the "boys in blue," and the cause for which they fought, is a member and Past Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, Post No. 198.

In 1868, Dr. Brady bought the north one-half of the R. F. Lord property on Main Street, Honesdale, opposite the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's office, upon which, after the destruction by fire of the buildings thereon, a few years later, he, in 1872, erected a three-story brick block, "Brady's Block," for the accommodation of three stores.

Mrs. Brady's mother, Amelia, was one of the seventeen children of William Schoonover (1764–1828), whose wife, Susannah (1772–1844), was a daughter of Thomas Spangenberg, Esq., who settled at Bethany in 1798. William Schoonover came from New Jersey and settled on the creek just out of Honesdale, a notice of which is given elsewhere in this history. Julia, widow of the late William Sherwood, of Clinton township, is the youngest of these children, who grew to mature years, and is the only one living.

Mrs. Brady's only sister, Susan (1842–82), was the wife of J. O. Terrel, a merchant of Honesdale.

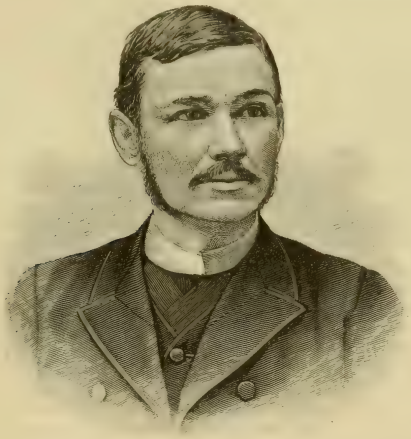
Dr. Brady's father, William Brady, was born in Tyrol, Austria, November 12, 1811, came to New York about 1838, and married Elizabeth Krähling, (1817–82) of that city. They removed to Cochecton about 1846, and the year after settled in Honesdale, where he has continuously followed his profession as a music-teacher and pianist, with the exception of a short residence in Scranton. The other children of William and Elizabeth Brady are Andrew, died at the age of twelve; William, died at the age of eighteen; Charles R. Brady, D.D.S., studied dental surgery with Dr. Otis Avery, of Honesdale, was graduated at the Philadelphia Dental College, and is practicing his profession successfully at Honesdale; George, is a hotel-keeper in Oregon; and John Brady, succeeded to the drug business herein mentioned; and a daughter died in infancy.

Dr. Reed Burns was born in Clifford township, Susquehanna County, Pa., November 11, 1845. Both his paternal and maternal grandfathers were early settlers in that county and identified with its pioneer history and development. His parents were Jonathan (1809–81) and Eliza (Reed) Burns (1811–79), the former an industrious and successful farmer. The children were Alsina, who became the wife of Henry Hadsall, of Clifford; Byington T., who resides in the same township; Granville A., who lives at Towanda, Pa.; Reed; Jayman A., residing near Montrose, Susquehanna County; and Edwin W., engaged in farming the old homestead.

Reed Burns was reared upon the paternal farm in Clifford, and experienced the usual incidents of hard work and limited educational opportunities peculiar to the life of a farmer's son. At the age of sixteen he commenced teaching school near Carbondale, Lackawanna County, and engaged in that vocation, at intervals, for three years. In the mean time he spent a term in attendance at Lyman Richardson's school in Harford, Susquehanna County. At the age of nineteen he entered upon the study of medicine in the office of Dr. Anthony Dimmick, at Audenreid, Carbon County, near which place he had been teaching, and remained with him during the greater part of the three following years. During the winters of 1865 and

'66 and 1866 and '67 he attended two courses of lectures in the Medical Department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, and in the summer of 1867 located in the practice of his profession at Bethany, Wayne County, Pa. After six years of successful practice at that place he removed to Honesdale, the county-seat, where he has since enjoyed a large and remunerative professional career.

Doctor Burns has aimed to keep himself thoroughly informed upon the changes and discoveries which are constantly occurring in his profession, and familiar with the various therapeutic and curative agencies that are being introduced. He has devoted special study in New York to several important distinctive branches of medical science, including the treatment of the eye and ear, in which he has met with peculiar success. He is considered by his professional associates to be especially apt in diagnosing the pathology of a case, which may be termed the most important feature of medical practice, inasmuch as it is highly necessary to know what is the disease that affects a patient before applying the necessary therapeutic treatment. Aside from his large and successful practice he finds leisure to further continue his personal education, aiming to supply by later industry and study the deficiency in early opportunities and early means. He has recently acquired a speaking knowledge of the German language by private study and practice and is directing his attention to the acquisition of other useful forms of knowledge.



Reed Burns

He is held in general respect in the community in which he dwells, is a member of the School Board of Honesdale and lately officiated as chief burgess of that borough. He is also one of the three examiners of applicants for pensions in behalf of the government in Wayne County. He married, March 31, 1869, Mary E., daughter of Rev. Elias O. Ward, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Bethany, and has had three children, namely : Edward W., Emma and Alice Reed Burns.

Dr. Sanford A. Kelly was born at Herrick, Susquehanna County, Pa., June 14, 1854. His parents are Thomas and Susan (Berry) Kelly, the former a practicing physician at Dunning, Lackawanna County. His maternal grandfather, Dr. Berry, practiced his profession at South Point, New York and Carbondale, Pa., for over forty years. His four brothers are also members of the medical profession, and engaged in active practice,—Leonard at Olyphant, Pa., Darwin at Mill City, Pa., William at Deposit, New York, and Carl at Lake Como, Wayne County, Pa.

The early life of Dr. Sanford A. Kelly was passed chiefly at Olyphant, Lackawanna County, where he obtained an excellent education at the graded school of that place. At the early age of fourteen years he began the study of medicine in the office of his brother Leonard, at Olyphant, and also assisted him in the drug store which he owned at that place. In 1875 and 1876, and 1876 and 1877, he attended two courses of lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, in Baltimore, Md., and in 1876 located in the practice of his profession at Rileyville, Wayne County, Pa., and in the spring of 1877 located at West Nicholson, Wyoming County, where he remained for two years. He then moved to Hot Bottom, Susquehanna County, where he practiced until 1880, when he again established himself at Rileyville and has since pursued the practice of his profession there. He erected his substantial store and residence at Rileyville in 1883.

Dr. Kelly enjoys a large and extensive practice in the northern part of Wayne County, and his ride covers a large area of country. Coming from a family of physicians on both sides, as he does, he has inherited a certain genius and aptitude for his profession which few possess. This, supplemented by a thorough training, and the facility that follows from constant practice, make him thoroughly qualified to cope with the problems of disease successfully. He has paid special attention to the diseases of women, and has been compelled, in order to accommodate his patients, to receive many of them as inmates of his hospitable home. In addition to his other professional qualifications it may be stated that he is a regular graduate of the College of Pharmacy, Philadelphia.

He married, April 4, 1878, Ada Shibley, daughter of Jerome and Amanda Shibley, of Wyoming County, and has two children, viz.: Carroll and Clyde Kelly.

Dr. J. M. Bates, who was a son of J. M. Bates, studied medicine with Dr. Strong in 1868, and shortly thereafter graduated from the Bellevue Hospital Medical College of New York. Subsequently he located in South Canaan, where he entered upon the practice of his profession. From there he removed to Waymart, and thence, in 1878, to Wauseon, Ohio, where he died in the summer of 1882.

Dr. Daniel W. Perham, who was a native of Mount Pleasant, a son of Sylvius G. and Lucinda H. Perham, immediate descendants of very early settlers, practiced in that place for a short time. He was born in 1852, began the study of medicine in the office of his uncle, Dr. Warren Schoonover, of New York City, in the spring of 1874, entered Bellevue Medical College in the autumn of the same year and graduated in the spring of 1877. On receiving his degree he returned to his native place and followed the practice of medicine for a few months, but returned to New York, and in June, 1877, was appointed district physician in the Northeastern Dispensary. August, 1878, he became associated with Dr. Alexander Hadden, of New York City, as assistant in general practice, a position which he held at the time of his death, April, 1882. He was a man of character and physician of marked ability—altogether one of the most promising of the many young men who have gone out into the world from Wayne County, and he doubtless would have achieved high position had his life been spared.

DENTISTRY.

Probably no profession in the world has made such rapid strides during the last half-century as has that of dentistry. Prior to that period the study and care of the teeth was limited to those who made the study of anatomy and physiology a specialty, and to the members of the medical profession, very much as blood-letting and tooth-drawing were once included among the functions of a barber. Many persons are still living who can distinctly remember when the scalpel and forceps were as necessary instruments in a barber-shop as a pair of shears or a razor. The first dental college in the world was established at Baltimore in the year 1839. Since that time the science of dentistry has developed until it now ranks among the most useful and artistic of the professions, and includes among its representatives men of education, culture and high social standing. The development of the science has been rapid, and a profession that is the offspring of the nineteenth century has not proven tenacious of old ideas nor unfitted itself for growth and improvement by a blind devotion to the errors of the past, so that the science of dentistry as it exists to-day is the exact antipodes of that which received the attention of its professors but a few years ago. The most rapid improvement has been made in operative dentistry, in which there has been almost an entire revolution. The highest point at first attainable was to fill such teeth as were slightly decayed, whereas, by the aid of the various improved dental instruments, together with medicinal treatment of the teeth, the profession is not only enabled to preserve teeth slightly decayed, but to restore and preserve them for many years. The early practice advocated smooth-pointed instruments for introducing the filling, and non-cohesive gold, whereas serrated instruments and cohesive gold are now recognized as the proper thing.

Artificial teeth were in use as early as Washington's time, and he himself is alleged to have worn them; but at that early day they were either carved out of solid pieces of ivory, which involved great labor and expense, or were human teeth attached to gold plates. Aaron Burr is said to have worn such teeth. The later improvements made in this direction, and their introduction into general use, have added largely to both the attractions and difficulties of the profession, and drawn to it many possessed of superior mechanical skill. Formerly the plates in which the teeth are set were made only of gold and silver or carved out of ivory, which necessarily made them both heavy and costly, whereas now plates are made not only of gold and silver, but also of platinum, rubber and celluloid. Rubber plates were not introduced until about 1854, and celluloid much more recently. The filling of artificial teeth is also a leading branch of the science, requiring both skill, judgment and delicacy when properly done.

The county of Wayne has a number of representative dentists, who attend assiduously to their profession and reflect credit upon it. Prominent among them is Dr. Avery.

DR. OTIS AVERY, of Honesdale, was born in Bridgewater, Oneida County, N. Y., August 19, 1808. The family of which he is a member is of English descent, and the old manor-house of the Avery family is still owned by its representatives in Devonshire, of whom some emigrated to this country among the earliest of the Puritans.

John Avery, the paternal grandfather of our subject, was born at Groton, Conn. He early manifested the martial spirit of his ancestors, served for a time in the French and Indian War, all through the Revolutionary War, engaged in the occupation of a teacher after the close of that struggle, and lived to be nearly one hundred years of age. John, his son, was also born at Groton. He was a silversmith and watchmaker by trade and followed that occupation at New London, Conn. Thence he emigrated to Oneida County, N. Y., where he was identified with the earliest settlement and development of that now prosperous section of country. He married Roxyhanna, daughter of William Humphrey, who also served in the Revolutionary War as a captain.

Dr. Otis Avery

Dr. Avery enjoyed the benefits of only a common English education, and when he had reached sufficient age became apprentice to the trade of a watchmaker in his father's shop; when fifteen years of age he left the paternal roof and worked as a journeyman at his trade in Waterville, N. Y., for a short time, when he again worked for his father at home. At the age of eighteen he removed to Cochecton, N. Y., where he served as a clerk in the store of his brother John for a time, and then opened a watch-repairing establishment of his own. About 1827 he removed to Bethany, Wayne County, Pa., at that time the county-seat, where he also established a shop. From there he went to New Berlin, N. Y., where he located and pursued his usual vocation. At this time the desire seized him to adopt the profession of dentistry as his life-work, and he went to New York City and for two years received theoretical and practical instruction in that profession in the office of Dr. D. C. Ambler, a prominent dentist at No. 10 Barclay Street. On December 6, 1833, he received a certificate of qualification from Dr. Ambler, the only mode of graduation in those days, and at once entered upon the practice of his profession. For the first three or four years Dr. Avery pursued his calling over the large extent of country lying between Utica, N. Y., and Honesdale, Pa., there being but one dentist (at Binghamton) in all that section, meeting his patients by appointment at various places. In 1839 he located at Bethany, Wayne County, where he practiced his profession in the summer-time, but, through the solicitation of his old preceptor, Dr. Ambler, he practiced in the winter season at Columbia, South Carolina. This plan was followed for about ten years. Subsequently he opened an office in New York City also, but his Wayne County practice demanding so much of his time, he gave up his New York business and in 1850 established his office at Honesdale, where he has continued since to enjoy a large and remunerative practice. It will thus be seen that Dr. Avery is one of the pioneer dentists of the country. The skill and prominence in his profession which he has acquired have been entirely the result of self-education and patient investigation and research. The dentists of his time had no dental college to go to, no journals issued in the interest of their profession, were even obliged to manufacture their own instruments and to improve themselves by correspondence with each other. Besides pursuing his profession closely, Dr. Avery has also interested himself largely in mechanical invention and research. About 1850 he invented a sewing-machine, which he had patented and sold to a company. As the agent of this company he afterwards visited Europe and sold his patent to parties in London and to the Emperor Louis Napoleon in behalf of the French government.

Aside from his profession, Dr. Avery has occupied a prominent place among the citizens of Wayne County, and has held various offices of trust and responsibility. In 1855 he was elected on an independent ticket to represent Wayne County in the State Legislature and served acceptably for one term. He was appointed by Governor Geary, November 20, 1871, associate judge of the county, to fill the vacancy caused by the declination of F. B. Moss, who had been elected on the Republican ticket in October, 1871. Under this appointment he served for a year, commencing with the first Monday of December, 1871. When the Democratic County Convention met, in September, 1872, it nominated Judge Avery for the seat he then occupied, and two days later the Republican Convention followed by nominating him for the same position. The Hon. Phineas Arnold, senior associate judge, having died early in the year, the Republicans also nominated the Hon. Frederick W. Farnham, who had been appointed to fill the vacancy, and John O'Neill was nominated by the Democrats. The contest was thus triangular, to be won by the best two out of three candidates; though, as both parties had nominated Judge Avery, his election was assured, and the real struggle was between Farnham and O'Neill. The Greeley movement carried some hundreds of Republicans into the Democratic lines, and O'Neill was elected. Judge Avery being duly elected, his commission, signed by Governor Geary, was issued November 6, 1872, for five years. In 1877 another issue arose in the county, in relation to a new court-house, which for the time obliterrated party lines. Judge Avery took a position hostile to the measures proposed by the county commissioners who had commenced the erection of the building. An Anti-Court-House party was organized, which nominated Judge Avery for another term on the bench. The attitude of the two political parties toward him had become directly the reverse of that held in 1872. Then both parties had united in his support; in this campaign both sought his defeat. Each party nominated a candidate, and again the contest was triangular. The anti-court house movement, however, had reduced both political organizations to skeletons, and Judge Avery was elected, his majority over both opponents being larger than his majority over either of his competitors in 1872. This is perhaps the only instance on record in which a candidate has received a greater majority when opposed by both parties than when supported by both.

He was duly commissioned by Governor Hartranft January 1, 1878. Notwithstanding the substantial proofs of popular regard which he had received, Judge Avery was unwilling to become a candidate for a third term, but determined on retiring from the bench, and Lorenzo Grambs was chosen his successor. He has always been conspicuous for independent thought, positive convictions, unflinching courage and spotless integrity; and these characteristics were abundantly displayed in the discharge of his official duties. He was not content to accept the current tradition relative to the position of a lay judge, and to pose as a mere judicial figure-head. On the contrary, his official career was marked by the active, intelligent and conscientious discharge of its duties, and his influence was largely felt in the administration of justice. In religious affairs he was formerly identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, but is now a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Honesdale. He has been twice married,—first, April 19, 1829, to Louisa, daughter of Charles and Abigail Hoel, of Bethany, the former an early settler of Wayne County She died in 1853. Of the six children resulting from the marriage, four are now living, viz.: Charles, who resides in Wayne County; Louisa, wife of John F. Brodhead, of Idaho; Eliza, who married William Brodhead, and also resides in Idaho; and Otis E., an assayer and mining expert, operating in Mexico. His present wife, whom he married in 1855, was Mary Agnes, widow of the late John Addoms, of New York, and a daughter of Richard Clark, a former merchant of that city, and a descendant of the Swiss Moravians, who left their country to avoid religious persecution. She had three children,—Mortimer C. Addoms, a lawyer in New York; Frederick E. Addoms, owner of a large cattle-ranch at Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory; and Agnes C., wife of George S. Purdy, a lawyer in Honesdale.

CHAPTER IV.

Internal Improvements—The First Roads in the County—Turnpikes—Post-Offices and Mail Routes—The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company—The "Gravity" Railroad—First Locomotive in America—The Pennsylvania Coal Company—Outline History of the Erie Railroad and "Jefferson" Branch.

EARLY ROADS.—The first passable road, by which emigrants from the Eastern States, or the valley of the Hudson, could travel to what first formed the territory of Wayne County extended from the Hudson, near Esopus, along the valley west of the Shawangunk Mountain to the Delaware at Port Jervis, and down that river to the "Old Mine Holes," below Bushkill Creek.[1]

The first road opened through Wayne County was cut out in 1762 by the Connecticut settlers going to Wyoming. It left the Minisink road at Milford and thence passed considerably south of the Milford and Owego turnpike, by Lord's Valley, Blooming Grove Farm and Bingham's, in Pike, and Salem, in Wayne, through Cobb's Gap to Wyoming.

After the erection of Wayne it was laid out as a public road and so used until superseded by turnpikes. West of Bingham's it nearly followed the Indian path leading from Cochecton to Wyoming.

The next important road was what was called The North and South road, extending from near Pocono Point, in Monroe County (now Tannersville), northward through the western tier of townships to the north line of the State. It also had a branch road extending from it westward to Tioga Point. In March, 1788, one thousand pounds was appropriated by the State to aid in opening these roads.

The North and South road was opened by John, Joseph and William Hilborn in 1788 and 1789, and the branch road by Andrew Ellicott in 1788, and called Ellicott's road.

In 1789 Samuel Preston, of Stockport, began opening a road from Stockport to Harmony, on the Susquehanna, as a portage road. In 1791 the State appropriated four hundred pounds towards the expense of opening such Portage road. A road was opened at private expense in 1791 from Bingham's, by Purdy's and Schenck's, to the North and South road, near Asa Stanton's; also a road extending from the North and South road, near Belmont, westward to Great Bend. About this date Samuel Preston opened a branch from his portage road to Mount Pleasant settlement, near the route of the present Stockport road from Mount Pleasant.

That same act of 1791 appropriated four hundred pounds to open a road from near Stroudsburg north to the Portage road, but the route was so erroneously specified, nothing was done that year upon it. In the following year the route was more carefully stated, and the road located to run from Stroudsburg northward across Middle Smithfield and Delaware townships, along the line between Palmyra and Lackawaxen townships, and through Damascus, crossing the Cochecton turnpike about five and a half miles west of Cochecton bridge, and continuing through Union settlement, by Equinunk, to intersect the portage road at Stockport. It was mostly cut out in 1792 by the Hilborn brothers, and was called the Hilborn road. In April, 1793, four hundred dollars more was appropriated to improve this road, which was expended that year.

Very soon after the opening of the Hilborn road another road was opened from the mouth of the Lackawaxen to Mast Hope; thence over the hills to Milanville, and up the Delaware to Rock Run; thence over the hills to intersect the Hilborn road near the Union Farm.

This was evidently opened (at least partly) at State expense, but the appropriation act is not found. However, in April, 1838, an appropriation was made of four thousand dollars, as for the State road, for the part of it north of the Narrowsburg turnpike, and for extending it along the Delaware Valley to the State line. Moses Thomas, George Bush, William H. Dimmick, Jacob Killam and W. M. Preston were made commissioners to expend the money. They opened the road from Little Equinunk to Equinunk, and from Stockport to the State line, besides improving other parts of it.

In May, 1797, the people of Mount Pleasant settlement decided to try to raise funds by subscription to open a road from their settlement to Minisink (Milford). The road was surveyed on a route crossing Johnson Creek below the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's "Miller reservoir," and thence passing a little east of Bethany to the Dyberry Valley, near the fair-grounds, and by Indian Orchard, the Narrows and Shohola Falls to Milford. It was opened that year. After Bethany was laid out its route was so altered as to pass through that town, as the road is now open towards Mount Pleasant.

It was afterwards, with some changes of route, made a public road, and as such was the principal road to Milford until superseded by turnpikes.

In 1800 a public road was laid out from the Delaware, at Cochecton, to the Mount Pleasant settlement, following near the present line of the old Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike. It was superseded by that turnpike in 1811.

Public roads were also early laid out and opened from Bethany, by Cherry Ridge, to Salem; from Bethany, by Brink's Mill and Keen's Pond, to Canaan; besides various other short roads in different settlements in the county.

They were nearly all superseded by the various turnpikes afterwards constructed.

Turnpikes and Plank-Roads.—The Cochecton and Great Bend Turnpike Company was incorporated by an act of Assembly dated March 29, 1804, the commissioners being Henry Drinker, Edward Tilghman, Thomas Harrison and William Poyntell, of the city of Philadelphia; John Conklin, Jason Torrey and Samuel Stanton, of Wayne County; and Asahel Gregory, John Tyler and Menna Dubois, of Luzerne County. The shares were ten dollars each, and the act provided that four hundred shares should be subscribed in Philadelphia, three hundred in Cochecton and three hundred at Great Bend. The act stipulated that the company "shall cause a road to be laid out from Damascus Mills to the top of Moosic Mountain aforesaid, to or near the twenty mile-stone in the north line of the State. Unless such places where the nature of the ground render greater width expedient," the width was to be twenty feet. The turnpike was finished in 1811. The travel upon it was very great, as, with its connections, it was the principal route from Newburg to Western New York. Daily mail coaches, drawn by four horses, were run upon the road for years. Numerous taverns were built along the line. The construction of the Erie Canal lessened the travel upon this turnpike, but it was a much-used thoroughfare until the Erie Railroad was built. Then through travel was almost wholly suspended.

The Bethany and Dingman's Choice Turnpike Company was incorporated in April, 1811, the commissioners named in the act being Edward Tilghman, Thos. Stewardson and Wm. Drinker, of Philadelphia; Daniel W. Dingman, Dan Dimmick, Matthew Ridgway, Abisha Woodward, Jason Torrey, Oliver Granger and the Wayne County commissioners. Two hundred shares were to be subscribed for in Philadelphia, three hundred at Dingman's and three hundred at Bethany. The State contributed ten thousand dollars towards opening the road. This turnpike was much traveled until superseded by other roads. Daily mail-coaches were run upon it and it afforded a convenient route for the people of the southern part of the county to travel upon to the county-seat.

The Belmont and Easton Turnpike Company was chartered in 1812 to make a road "from the village of Belmont in a southerly direction along the route of the North and South state road until it shall intersect Easton and Wilkes-Barre turnpike in Northampton County." The commissioners were Myers Fisher, John Reed, Peter S. Duponceau, Stephen Girard, Benj. Tilghman, of Philadelphia; Conrad Kreider, John Ross, George Keller, Samuel Reese, Adam Heckman, Northampton County; Samuel Stanton, Thomas Meredith, Asa Stanton, Joseph Woodbridge, Wayne. Shares were fifty dollars each. Four hundred were to be taken in Philadelphia and the same number in Easton and Belmont. Like the other early turnpikes, this had for a number of years an immense travel, but it was after a time diverted to other roads and to railroads.

The Belmont and Oghquagah Turnpike Company was chartered February 26, 1817. The commissioners were Thomas Meredith, Ira Mumford, Jr., Sanford Clark, Joseph Tanner, Benj. King, Asa Stanton, Thomas Spangenberg and Walter Lyon. The road was built chiefly through the exertions of T. Meredith, Esq.

On February 24, 1820, the Luzerne and Wayne Turnpike Company was organized, with Benj. Slocum, Philip Swartz, Comer Philips and John Cobb, of Luzerne; Seth Goodrich, Amos Polly, Reuben Purdy, William Woodbridge, Peter Purdy and Simeon Ansley, of Wayne County, as commissioners. "The company built by the shortest and most practicable route from near the house of Philip Swartz, in Providence township, Luzerne County, to intersect the Milford and Owego turnpike where it crosses Wallenpaupack Creek in Wayne County, passing through the townships of Blakeley, Salem and Palmyra."

The Honesdale and Clarksville Turnpike Company was organized April 2, 1830, with Jason Torrey, Benj. Jenkins, Thomas Clark, Leonard Starkwether, Sr., and Nathaniel Eldred as commissioners. The road was built from Honesdale to the Belmont and Easton, or Milford and Owego, turnpike within two miles of Clarksville, Wayne County. Eight hundred shares at twenty dollars each were subscribed for.

On March 25, 1831, the Bethany and Honesdale Turnpike Company was organized, with Nathaniel B. Eldred, James Manning, Thomas Spangenburg, Randolph Wilmot, Charles Forbes and Paul S. Preston as commissioners.

The Honesdale and Big Eddy Turnpike Company was organized in 1831 to build a road "from nearest eligible place on Bethany and Dingman's Choice turnpike, not to exceed 4 miles from H'dale to the Narrows of Delaware River at Big Eddy." Moses Thomas, Nathan Skinner, Lot Jackson, Charles Forbes and John Torrey were the commissioners.

On March 17, 1840, the Honesdale and Cherry Ridge Turnpike Company was chartered, with Wm. R. McLaury, Thomas H. R. Tracy, Lucius Collins, Aaron Writer and Thomas J. Hubbell as commissioners.

The Cherry Ridge and East Sterling Turnpike Company was chartered May 7, 1841, with Wm. R. McLaury, Richard Lancaster, Lucius Collins, Reuben R. Purdy and William Bortree as commissioners.

April 30, 1850, the Honesdale and Masthope Plank-Road Company was chartered, with Earl Wheeler, Amory Prescott, Wm. H. Dimmick, William Turner, John F. Roe, James M. Blackington, Ephraim W. Hamlin, Oliver D. Dunhane, Phineas G. Goodrich, Allis Whitney, Charles P. Waller, Elkanah Patmore, Thomas Hubbell, Thomas H. R. Tracy, Russel F. Lord, Henry W. Stone, Wm. R. McLaury, Benj. F. Kimble, Bulkley Beardslee, Cornelius Coryell, Peter Smith, Benjamin Holbert, Samuel Kimble, John Kelly and John A. Patmore, of Wayne and Pike Counties, as commissioners.

They were authorized to construct a plank-road from the borough of Honesdale down Lackawaxen River to Indian Orchard settlement; thence by nearest and best route to the New York and Erie Railroad, at or near the mouth of Mast Hope Creek, in Pike County. Sixteen hundred shares at twenty-five dollars each were subscribed for.

The Honesdale and Delaware Plank-Road Company was chartered May 3, 1850, with William R. McLaury, Amory Prescott, David Abel, Cornelius Coryell, Charles White, C. P. Waller, Peter Smith, W. H. Dimmick, T. H. R. Tracy, E. W. Hamlin and Bulkley Beardslee as commissioners. They organized the Honesdale and Delaware Plank-Road Company, which built a road from Honesdale to Narrowsburg. This, prior to the building of the branch railroad to Honesdale, was one of the most largely traveled roads in the country, and was a great stage route.

The formal opening of this road occurred on Friday, September 19, 1851. In the morning the directors and a number of other citizens of Honesdale drove over to Narrowsburg to meet the delegations from that place and New York. A large party, headed by the German band, started thence for Honesdale, which they reached in an hour and forty minutes, including stoppages. On reaching Honesdale the party was saluted by the firing of cannon, which was kept up most of the day. A great number of citizens were assembled in front of the Mansion House to greet the party, and they had a joyous meeting. In a few minutes a large number of boat-builders from the yards of Barnes & Harlan, fresh from their work, and equipped with saws, planes, chisels, hammers, etc., each with some badge or token of his occupation, marching to the sound of martial music, appeared before the house and gave three cheers for the Honesdale and Delaware Plank-road, which were responded to by the crowd with three cheers for the boat-builders of Honesdale.

At three o'clock about one hundred and fifty persons sat down to a fine dinner served by Landlord Sherwood. C. C. Murray, president of the company, presided. S. G. Throop, Esq., addressed the assemblage, contrasting the time with a period fifty years prior, and made what the newspaper—the Democrat—characterized as "an exceedingly happy speech." S. E. Dimmick, Esq., gave as a toast, "The health of the New York stockholders," to which Mr. Van Dyke, of New York, responded and proposed the sentiment, "The projectors and artificers of the Honesdale and Delaware Plank-road; the perseverance and energy which they have displayed in the enterprise entitle them to the gratitude of the whole community, for they have proved themselves public benefactors."

C. P. Waller, Esq., secretary of the company, being called, responded to this sentiment in behalf of the board of directors. He concluded with the playful toast: "Our New York stockholders, may they continue Stillwell and their Flowers never be less.

Rev. H. A. Rowland, John Shouse, Esq., of Pike County, George G. Waller, Esq., and others then made brief remarks, appropriate to the occasion, and alluding to the satisfactory finishing of the work.

In the fall of 1845 Paul S. Preston, Asa Kimble, Alexander Calder, E. W. Hamlin, T. H. R. Tracy, Z. H. Russell, Amory Prescott, Israel Chapman, R. L. Seeley and Edward Murray gave notice in the Democrat that books would be opened at the house of A. Calder, in Equinunk, and A. Field, in Honesdale, for the purpose of receiving subscriptions to the stock of the company for constructing a turnpike from Honesdale to Equinunk. The measure was practically realized.

Early Mail Arrangements and First Post-Offices.—There were no post-offices in the vicinity of Wayne County when the county was erected, and none in what is now Wayne County earlier than 1811. The early settlers sent and received most of their letters by acquaintances traveling to where the letters were desired to go.

In 1797 and 1798 residents of Mt. Pleasant directed their correspondents to address their letters to Beech Woods, Northampton County, to remain in Wilkes-Barre post-office until called for.

In 1802 a mail-route was established from Lancaster, by Reading, Bethlehem and Stroudsburg, to Milford, and in December, 1803, arrangements were entered upon to have a "post-carrier," at private expense, to convey mail matter from Stroudsburg to Bethany and return once in two weeks. This arrangement went into effect early in 1804, Jesse Walker being engaged for the service.

After the removal of the courts to Bethany, as there had previously been a post-office established at Milford, mails for Bethany were sent to Milford "to be called for."

In June, 1808, an agreement was entered into by some of the principal business men of Bethany and Milford to take turns in carrying mail matter both ways between those towns once in two weeks, gratuitously, and the days were designated when each was to perform the service.

Much pains have been taken to obtain accurate information about the first post-offices and mail accommodations in Wayne County, and it is believed the following statement is correct, unless in the matter of the month in which some post-offices were established.

The first post-office established in Wayne County (then including Pike) was Milford, established about January 1, 1803.

In 1810, as the turnpikes from Newburgh to Great Bend were being completed, a mail-route was established "from Danbury, Conn., by Fishkill Landing and New Burgh, to Chenango Point." This was designed to follow the turnpikes named.

In February, 1811, post-offices were established on this route, at Cochecton, on the New York side of the Delaware, and at Mt. Pleasant, in Wayne County. John Granger was the first postmaster at Mt. Pleasant.

The transportation of the mails on that route began early in 1811. Very soon after this an application was made for a post-office at Bethany, and mail service from Mt. Pleasant by Bethany to Milford, returning by Salem and Providence.

Post-offices were established in May, 1811, at Bethany, with Solomon Moore, postmaster; Lackawack (Paupuck settlement) John Ansley, postmaster; Salem, Theodore Woodbridge, postmaster.

In 1813 a post-office was established at the Narrows of Lackawaxen, with Wm. Kimble postmaster.

The succeeding offices in Wayne County were:

Sterling, 1819, Phineas Howe, postmaster.
Mount Republic, 1819, Alva W. Morton, postmaster.
Canaan, 1819, Horace Lee, postmaster (afterwards changed to Clarksville, and later to Waymart).
Cherry Ridge, 1824, Thomas Lindsay, postmaster.
Palmyra, 1824, Royal Taft, postmaster.
Damascus, 1824, William H. Clark, postmaster.
Indian Orchard, 1828, Cornelius Coryell, postmaster.
Honesdale, 1828, Charles Forbes, postmaster.
Scott, 1829, G. Williams, postmaster.
South Canaan, about 1829, John H. Beden, postmaster.
Starrucca, about 1830, David Spoor, postmaster.

Tallmanville, about 1830, Elihu Tallman, postmaster.
Rileyville, 1832, John C. Riley, postmaster.
East Sterling, 1833, William Bortree, postmaster.
Brompton, 1834, Edward Jenkins, postmaster.
Priceville, 1837, Stephen Price, postmaster.
Big Equinunk, 1837, Francis Walker, postmaster.
Eldred, 1837, James Smith, postmaster.
Paupack Eddy (now Hawley), 1837, James S. Bassett, postmaster.

After the construction of the leading turnpike roads the mails and passengers were principally transported by post-coaches, until the construction of the railroads in the vicinity of Wayne County, when they were very generally transported on such railroads to the offices near them.

Such offices as were not convenient to railroad routes have been supplied by short cross routes either in wagons or on horseback, some daily and others varying in frequency down to weekly mails.

THE DELAWARE AND HUDSON CANAL COMPANY.—The value of anthracite as a heating agent was first successfully demonstrated by Judge Jesse Fell, of Wilkes-Barre, in 1808, but his experiments produced not the wild excitement they would had the future of anthracite been foreseen, and awakened only a mild interest throughout the valley and induced a few individuals to look with more favor than they had previously upon the "black stuff" that cropped out along the streams and littered the soil. No coal was sold in the country for a number of years, for although the blacksmiths learned to use it, they went to the places where it was exposed, gathered all they wanted and carried it away with as little concern as one now might appropriate dry leaves from the forest. Use of anthracite was stimulated by the scarcity of charcoal during and after the War of 1812.

Colonel Hollenback, of Wilkesbarre, sent two wagon-loads of "stone coal," as it was called, to Philadelphia, a portion of which was bought by William Wurts, a merchant of that city, who, with his elder brother, Maurice, was quite favorably impressed with the novel fuel. The Wurts brothers seem to have very early realized that anthracite must in time become an important article of commerce and determined to place themselves in a position to profit by it, for as early as 1812 we find these city-born and city-bred merchants toilingly and patiently exploring the mountain wilderness of Pennsylvania in a practical, painstaking search for the true philosopher's stone. Following the Lehigh from Mauch Chunk far up into the forest to its very head-waters in the Pocono marsh, only to be baffled in their search for a new and unclaimed coal-field, they struck at length into the almost equally wild and sparsely settled valley in which the Lackawanna runs, and without any previous knowledge of the region, traversed it for months, seeking everywhere for traces of the buried treasure. If, with clear, prophetic vision, those men toiling through heat and cold in the dreary forest that clothed mountain and valley, braving danger and privation, could have seen the busy, bustling city of Scranton and all the thriving villages of the valley, and over in the valley of the Lackawaxen another as fair as the land can boast, all to be created by the mighty and good genii they were to liberate, they could not have labored more zealously and effectively than they did.

Somewhere along the Lackawanna one of the Wurtses fell in with a nomadic hunter, David Nobles, who, to avoid imprisonment for debt, had fled from Wayne County and taken refuge in the woods, where he gained a precarious living with dog and rifle. Mr. Wurts aided him with money, employed him to hunt for him and to bring knapsacks of provisions from Canaan township, in Wayne County, and took upon a debt a small tract of wild land which he had owned. Apropos of this transaction, Hon. Paul S. Preston, of Stockport, wrote as follows in a letter to the Auburn (N. Y.) Daily Advertiser of January 19, 1849:

"In the year 1814 I heard my father tell Maurice Wurts, in Market Street, Philadelphia, 'Maurice, thee must hold on to that lot on the Lackawanna that you took for a debt of David Nobles; it will be very valuable some day, as it has stone-coal on it and under it.'"

After buying and obtaining the refusal of several tracts of land on which they found "black stones," the Wurtses began looking about for a route by which they could carry anthracite to the market. By measuring the distances and observing the depth and current of the streams flowing eastward from the Moosic Mountains, they found the Wallenpaupack and the Lackawaxen offered the best encouragement to the plan of reaching New York. It was the intention of the explorers to make the greater part of their purchases in the vicinity of Providence and Capoose, but the lands there were more fertile and better cultivated than those farther up in the valley, and their owners were unwilling to part with them for less than five dollars per acre. Hence they sought the region of the Ragged Islands and studied upon passing the mountains by Rixe's rather than Cobb's Gap, and thus it became possible for Honesdale to be developed upon the hazel and hemlock-covered ground at Dyberry Forks. Otherwise that locality might have remained a pathless thicket until cleared for simple agricultural purposes.

Another reason which influenced the projectors of this coal enterprise to choose the more northern outlet was the superior advantage that it possessed over the southern or Cobb's Gap route.

By 1816 a small quantity of anthracite had been mined, a portion of which the Wurts brothers attempted to place in a reluctant market. Their friend, David Nobles, was engaged through the whole summer of that year in clearing Jones' Creek, a small westerly affluent of the Wallenpaupack, heading about eight miles from the mines, from logs and driftwood. When this had been done two sled-loads of coal, which had been drawn over the mountains, was loaded upon a raft and with much difficulty floated down the stream a short distance, when the frail craft was caught upon a projecting rock, whirled round in the rapid current and its precious cargo wrecked. It had been the purpose of the proprietor to steer the raft down the Wallenpaupack and the Lackawaxen to the Delaware and thence to Philadelphia. A somewhat different and more successful attempt was made a little later. This time the coal was drawn on sledges over the old Connecticut road, a distance of twenty miles, to the Wallenpaupack, shipped on rafts to Wilsonville, thence conveyed in wagons to Paupack Eddy, and there, being transferred to arks, floated to Philadelphia. This mode of transportation, however, was altogether too laborious and expensive to be practicable. Hence the efforts of the indomitable pioneers in the grand drama of progress were directed solely to Rixe's Gap and the Lackawaxen. The following letter to Col. Sylvanus Seely, of Seely's Mills, fixes the date when the final direction of the great scheme was determined:

"PHILADELPHIA, April 29, 1818.

"COL. S. SEELY:

"Dear Sir: Feeling interested in the road contemplated to be cut from the Luzerne and Wayne County line near Rixe's Gap to Kimball's Eddy[1] (which is three miles below your mill), for which an unsuccessful application was made to the court, perhaps a year ago, and was to be renewed last Fall, we would take it a particular favor if you would inform us, per return of mail, whether the court has granted a road to be opened on that route, and if so, say whether it is already cut or not; if not cut out, when it will be, or if it is not granted, should like to know when the next court will set, and your opinion of the prospects of obtaining a grant.

"Also what sum you suppose would be sufficient to open it so as to make it a good sled road. If my impression is correct, yourself and others computed the distance from Kimball's Eddy to Rixe's Gap at six or seven miles, as the road would run. Please say whether this is correct.

"Please also to inform us what extent of time the sledding in your neighborhood and towards Rixe's lasted for the three last winters, and what sum you should suppose it would cost per ton to cart the distance of twelve miles on such a road as that would be in sledding time.

"Please also to state how the freshes have been on the Lackawaxen for the last three years; how many days in the year you suppose the water would do to run, and how many inches deep you usually run lumber down that stream, and also what length and width.

"M. AND W. WURTS.

"P. S.—We would thank you to state what length, width and depth can run the Delaware, and what it usually costs to navigate a large raft from Paupack Eddy to Philadelphia.

"Your immediate answer to this will confer a very particular favor on your assured friends.

"M. AND W. W."

The Wurtses began operations with a view to using this Rixe's Gap road, and by the autumn of 1822, in spite of almost insurmountable obstacles, had mined nearly a thousand tons of coal; but the winter was mild, the snow fall light, and they succeeded in sledding only about one hundred tons over the mountains. The road lay through Cherry Ridge township, and the coal being brought over it to White Mills, was there loaded on pine rafts and floated to Philadelphia. That city, however, was more readily accessible by the coal companies which had been fostered into some degree of strength in the Lehigh and Schuylkill regions, and the market was abandoned by the Lackawanna mine-owners, who now saw that they must reach New York if they would profitably dispose of their commodity, and thus arose the idea which a few years later had tangible form in the Delaware and Hudson Canal.

In the mean time, in 1822, it is interesting to note that Carbondale had received its name from the Wurtses, before the spot so designated upbore upon its rocky soil a single house or cabin. The name was compounded by these gentlemen in Philadelphia, who marked upon a two-horse lumber-wagon in which they sent to the scene of their mining operations a load of tools, powder and camp paraphernalia, the legend "Carbondale, one hundred and forty-three miles from Philadelphia, on the Lackawanock River, Luzerne County, Penna." The driver was directed to the site of the future town by D. Yarrington, who was staying at the Mountain House, an obscure inn on the Moosic, in Rixe's Gap, and happened to remember that he had seen some strange fellows, accredited with vague notions about stone coal, digging in the woods down by the Lackawanna, and surmised that the supplies and camp equipage were designed for them.

In pursuance of their scheme of ultimately reaching the New York market, and in recognition of the necessity, as a preliminary step, of lessening the danger and uncertainty of sending coal to the Delaware, these gentlemen interested themselves in procuring the passage of an act by the Pennsylvania Legislature "authorizing Maurice Wurts to improve the navigation of the river Lackawaxen." The act was duly approved on the 13th of March, 1823.

Benjamin Wright, chief engineer of the Erie Canal, was engaged by Maurice and William

[1] At the southern end of the borough of Honesdale.

Wurts, in May, 1823, to take measures to have a proper survey or running level carried over the country from "tide-water of the Hudson River, at the mouth of the Wallkill, up the valley of the Rondout and thence over to the Delaware River, and thence up the same to the confluence of the Lackawaxen to a point as near to the coal mine as possible," in order to ascertain the practicability of constructing a canal along the route or providing a system of slack-water navigation, and for the purpose of securing a basis for an estimation of the cost of such work. As Mr. Wright could not well disengage himself from his duties in connection with Governor Clinton's favorite enterprise, he deputized Colonel J. L. Sullivan and John B. Mills, two experienced civil engineers, to make the survey. During the summer and fall of 1823 the surveys were made under the immediate supervision of the coal-mine proprietors, and a map of the region and the route was shortly afterwards produced to assist in awakening the interest of Philadelphia and New York capitalists, who had no other knowledge of the obscure coal-fields than they could gain from it.

This old map exhibited the main coal opening or mine as being one hundred and twenty-one miles from the Hudson, near the river Lackawaxen, and four or five miles from Keen's Pond, in the State of Pennsylvania, where were sundry tracts of land containing inexhaustible quantities of the best quality of stone coal. Seven localities were designated where coal had been discovered, five of them being around the log cabin in Carbondale, one below the falls, near Wagner's Gap (Archbald), and the remaining one on the farm of James Anderson, in Providence township, twelve miles below Carbondale. The main or northern mine was within the present limits of Carbondale, on the eastern bank of the Lackawanna. Honesdale was unmapped because not in existence, and the site of the flourishing city of Scranton was designated simply as "Slocum's." On the map Rixe's Gap opened immediately east of Carbondale, and through it flowed the waters of one of the feeders of Keen's Pond, "lying but four or five miles from the northern mine," and the report of Messrs. Wright and Sullivan continued:

"The distance is capable of a good road or railway and probably a canal. The waters of the Lackawanock (led from some distance above the valley) may possibly feed such a one; not only connecting the mines of these proprietors but to a greater extent of navigation, as may be apparent on the map." Four ponds with an aggregate area of six hundred acres, lying east of Rixe's Gap, in Wayne County, were indicated upon the map as Savanna, Keen's, Stanton's and Hoadley's. It was the original plan of the Messrs. Wurts to run the west branch of the Lackawaxen section of the canal as far up as Captain Keen's pond, and farther still if it was found that the Lackawanock could be used as a feeder. It was even originally proposed by these gentlemen to make Cobb's Pond (Paupack Pond upon their map) the western terminus of the canal. This body of water, fed so copiously by unseen springs as to give an outlet equal to the canal requirements of that day, lies upon the summit of the Moosic Mountain, seven miles, in a direct line, from Scranton (Slocum's of that day), and was about five miles distant from the Providence mine. The plan of utilizing it was abandoned because the coal nearest that point was considered less valuable than that at Carbondale, and because the proprietors could devise no feasible way of ascending and descending the steep mountain with canal-boats—that is, no way which would not have incurred an expense fatal to their project. Railroads were then unknown in America, and the Wurtses gave consideration only to the canal system of communication.

The quantity of water held in the other ponds named was calculated as sufficient "to fill a lock one hundred and eleven times a day for two hundred days." The report says, that while "the head-waters of the Vanorca Branch of the Lackawaxen all concentrate at Captain Keen's pond, the middle creek which heads even nearer the coal mine than this pond, may possibly afford a shorter and better route than the West Branch. This will be a matter of inquiry before the work commences."

Whether to ascend the Lackawaxen or the Wallenpaupack was a seriously and long-considered problem. "The Wallenpaupack," continues the report, "at the distance of three miles has high falls and noble water privileges. Above Wilsonville the stream is gentle and deep for fourteen miles, through a rich and well-cultivated country. Its course is parallel to the range of mountains, on the opposite or west side of which the coal district lies—the survey was carried through a gap to the southernmost or third mine, but is a point yet to be settled, whether this route or Rixe's Gap will best command this part of the coal range. It appears to me very probable that, on an instrumental examination, it will be found that the Lackawanock may be led to feed a short canal, from the mine to Keen's, and there would be water enough for any quantity of business, using the lift." This lift, the use of which was contemplated, was invented by Benjamin Dearborn, of Boston, and had never been built upon a large scale, but was intended to operate on the principle of a huge elevator, with weights and pulleys, to move canal-boats up or down the sides of hills or mountains where water was very scarce, or the height to be overcome so great as to make lockage impracticable. Engineer Sullivan was the agent of the inventor, and strongly urged the adoption of the lift on the ground of its time and water-saving advantages. The proprietors thought seriously of adopting this plan for the conveyance of boats over the mountain, between Carbondale and the Lackawaxen or Wallenpaupack, before a railroad was deemed feasible, or even, so far as is now known, seriously considered.

Another measure, which the indefatigable pioneers of the Lackawanna coal region adopted to further their great project was the publication of detailed estimates of the cost of producing anthracite coal, and placing it in the New York market. They undertook to prove to capitalists that coal could be delivered in New York at $3.84½ per ton. Following is their presentation of the matter:

"Quarrying, now 25 cents per ton, but as the excavation will become deeper assume	.37½
Hauling, the distance from four to five miles; on a turnpike road a five-horse team will perform two trips with a load of 3 tons (according to experience in Pennsylvania). The daily expense of the team will be as follows:
Five bushels of oats, usual price 25 cents—say 37½ cents	$1.87½
Sixteen pounds hay for each horse is 80 pounds per day for team; the usual price, $5 to $7 per ton—say $10	.36
Shoeing, $1.00 per month, each horse is for the team, $60 per annum, per day	.20
Driver, per day	.75
Loading	.50
The team will labor but 300 days and the keeping for 65 days must be assesssed on the working days—each day	.48
Thus the hauling of 6 tons will be	4.16½
Per ton	.69½
The use of a railway will diminish the expenses probably one half.
Loading coal into canal boats	.10
The length of the canal is 117 miles; a boat carrying 30 tons will go to the Hudson and return to the mines in 10 days; her expenses will be as follows:
3 men, 10 days, at 75 cts	22.50
2 horses, 10 days, at 50 cts	10.00
Expense of keeping horses 65 days, to be assessed on the working days is 22 cents per day or per trip	2.20
Shoeing, $1.00 per month, each horse is 8 cents per day	.80
For 30 tons	$35.00
Per ton	$1.18
"The canal-boats may navigate the Hudson. A steamboat of 50 horse-power will tow 10 of them, and if double-manned, will perform the trip to New York and back in two days; the distance 100 miles.

Estimate of her Expenses.

1 captain, $30 per mo., $1.16 per day	$2.32
1 mate, $25 per mo., 96 cts. per day	1.92
2 pilots, $30 each, $1.16 per day	4.64
2 engineers, $30 each, $1.16 per day	4.64
2 firemen, $25 each, 96 cts. per day	3.84
6 ord. hands, $12 each, 47 cts. per day	5.64
1 steward, $15 each, 58 cts. per day	1.16
1 cook, $12 47 cts. per day	.94
Provisions, 2 days, at $6.00 per day	12.00
Coal, 6 tons per trip, $3.60	21.00
For 300 tons	$58.70
Per ton	.19½
Discharging the boats per ton	.10
Cost of coal delivered in New York, exclusive of tolls, is or less than 9½ cents per bushel.	$2.64½

Should the canal be made upon the Kingston route it would cost $1,300,000, the interest on which is	$78,000
Boats.—The working days on the canal may be estimated at 200 in a year; to deliver 100,000 tons, 220 boats would be necessary, allowing 5 days to the Hudson, 1 day to New York, 1 day to discharge and 6 days to return. They would cost $300 each		66,000
4 steamboats of 50 horse-power for towing on the Hudson at $25,000 each		100,000
Teams.—For hauling coal there would be 300 working days; the 340 canal horses would be employed 200 days in hauling, in addition to which 33 five-horse teams would be necessary to deliver 100,000 tons of coal at the landing.
The cost would be 305 horses at $50 to $70, say $100	$50,500
101 wagons at $60 to $70, say 100	10,000
101 sets of harness at $40	4,040
Tools for the mines	2,500
		$67,140
		$233,140
Interest on this sum	$13,988
To renew and repair this stock, an annual fund of 10 per cent. should be allowed	23,314
Coal yard, and expense of management	3,000
Agent at the mine and his assistant	2,000
		$122,302

Thus to pay interest on the canal and the capital employed in bringing one hundred thousand tons to market and to apply an annual fund for keeping up the stock of boats, horses and wagons, and to defray the expense of coal yard, &c., &c., an income would be required in lieu of tolls of $122,302 or $1.20 per ton, which added to $2.64½ will make the coal cost, in New York, $3.84½ per ton, less than 14 cents per bushel.

As most of the inhabitants of New York burned wood, it was calculated that fifty-eight thousand tons of coal would supply the city for a year, but the mine proprietors entertained a hope that cities and towns along the Hudson and elsewhere might make the annual demand as high as one hundred and fifty thousand tons. The Lehigh region was supplying Philadelphia with anthracite at eight dollars per ton, but it was thought that the proposed canal would give the Lackawanna a great advantage over the Lehigh region, shipment from which by the river, by means of arks which could not be returned to the mines, was both uncertain and costly.

The Wurts brothers also gave the public, in pamphlet form, estimates of the cost of constructing the canal by sections. The Lackawaxen section of the canal, owing to the narrowness of the valley and the height of the river banks, it was thought, would be the most expensive of all, and it was estimated to cost $316,380. The cost of the whole canal was estimated at $1,300,000. The quantity and quality of the coal in the mines was favorably exhibited as being "worthy of the company proposed to be formed." It was about this time that Professor Griscom, of New York, was engaged to visit the Lackawanna mines, and he made a very laudatory report upon them.

Maurice and William Wurts had toiled as intelligently and as indefatigably as ever did pioneers in an enterprise ahead of its age. They had spent ten of the best years of their lives, expended a vast amount of energy and the greater part of their private fortunes, and they saw that after all they had done there was no hope of final success, except through the co-operation of a larger capital and influence than they had thus far been able to command. Hence came the suggestion of forming what is now the mighty corporation known as the "Delaware and Hudson Canal Company." This company received the initial impetus of its life through official action, when the New York Legislature passed the incorporating act, April 23, 1823, but it did not come into fully organized being until two years later. The commissioners appointed by the act to incorporate the "Delaware and Hudson Canal Company" were G. B. Vroom, Philip Hone, Lynde Catlin, Jonathan Thompson, Garret B. Abeel, George Janeway and Elisha Tibbits, of the city of New York; George D. Wickham and Hector Craig, of Orange County; Abraham Hasbrouck and John C. Broadhead, of Ulster County.

The Messrs. Wurts wrote to the commissioners,—"The object of the proprietors of the mines is to consolidate the whole concern in one company, to be formed and organized under the New York Act, and to transfer to that company, upon such terms as may be mutually agreed upon, the rights, privileges and immunities granted by the Pennsylvania Legislature to Maurice Wurts, his heirs or assigns, and the bodies of coal belonging to the company."

The original act incorporating the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company authorized the company "to make a canal between tide-water, on the Hudson, and the mouth of the Lackawaxen, the dividing line between the States of New York and Pennsylvania," and fixed eight cents per ton per mile as the maximum toll for transporting stone-coal by it. Maurice Wurts, by the Pennsylvania act of March 13, 1823, which had authorized him to improve the navigation of the river Lackawaxen, had been granted the privilege "to levy a toll on all commodities passing down that river, if improved by slack-water navigation, of twelve and a half cents per ton per lock."

The act incorporating the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company further provided, "That the company by this name may sue and be sued, defend and be defended, in law and equity, in all courts whatsoever, may have and use a common seal, such as they shall devise, and the same may alter and change at pleasure, and may make and establish such by-laws, rules and regulations as shall from time to time appear necessary and convenient for the good government of said corporation and the due management of their property and affairs."

A supplemental act, passed by the New York Legislature April 7, 1824, enlarged the capital of the corporation from five hundred thousand dollars to fifteen hundred thousand dollars; and a second supplement, obtained in November of the same year, permitted the company "to employ five hundred thousand dollars in the business of banking and to establish a banking-house in the State of New York."

The projectors of the canal scheme had now a strong case with which to go into the money market. They boldly displayed their magnificent scheme. They offered rich and inexhaustible mines, the exclusive command of the coal trade in the direction of New York, and a bank charter. The profits on coal, they argued, would be immense if it could be delivered in New York for less than four dollars per ton after paying all charges. It was then selling for ten or twelve dollars per chaldron. In Europe, as they represented, every canal supported by the coal trade had yielded an abundant revenue, and their stock had risen a hundred, and in some cases a thousand per cent. The canal would be able to transport three hundred thousand tons per annum to market when in complete operation, and the profits of a few years would replace the capital expended. Besides, it would be in the power of the company to monopolize the lumber trade of the Delaware and Lackawaxen and their tributaries. They would, while diverting from Philadelphia a rich trade, augment the tolls of the canal, and at the same time aid in the commercial aggrandizement of New York. Such were, in brief, the arguments sounded persistently and earnestly before the capitalists of the metropolis, and backed by figures and practical explanations.

In the charter of the company it had been provided that "when two thousand shares of stock were subscribed and five dollars per share of one hundred dollars paid in to the commissioners for incidental expenses, then such persons subscribing and those who may thereafter subscribe to the stock of the company. . . shall be and they hereby are made and constituted a body politic and corporate by the name, style and title of 'The President, Managers and Company of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company.'"

The most sanguine anticipations of the projectors were soon realized. The way had been carefully prepared and so great a furore created in favor of the scheme that capital came to its assistance finally with a rush. The whole capital stock of one million five hundred thousand dollars was quickly subscribed after the books were opened, in January, 1825, and the company soon afterward became legally organized.

The date which is memorable as that of the complete organization of the company was March 8, 1825. The stockholders then held in New York their first meeting and elected the following officers and managers:

President, Philip Hone; Treasurer, Samuel Flewelling; Managers, John Bolton, Philip Hone, Garret B. Abeel, Samuel Whittemore, Hezekiah B. Pierpont, Rufus L. Lord, Benjamin W. Rogers, John Hunter, Thomas Tileston, William W. Russell, William Calder, Henry Thomas, William H. Ireland.

Pennsylvania jealousy of foreign individuals and corporations, more than once exhibited towards this company, officially and unofficially, manifested itself even before the organization was perfected. On the 4th of February, 1825, Mr. Duncan, chairman of the committee of the Senate of Pennsylvania, to whom was referred the resolutions relative to foreign corporations, made his report, which attracted much attention abroad. He argued "that a corporation of this State has not the power to hold lands in mortmain without the license of this commonwealth, and that lands conveyed to trustees named in the deeds of conveyance in trust, and for the uses of the company as declared in the deeds, are subject to forfeiture."

This report was significant in relation to the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, and it was thought advisable to procure the passage of a declaratory special act in their favor. This work was placed in the hands of a new character in the drama of progress. John Wurts, was sent to Harrisburg and secured the passage of a bill making it lawful for "the President, Managers and Company of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, by and with the consent of Maurice Wurts, his heirs or assigns, to improve the navigation of the river Lackawaxen, and of any one of its branches, in the same manner authorized and provided by an act entitled 'an act to improve the navigation of the river Lackawaxen,' passed the 13th day of March, 1823, and that the said company shall hold and enjoy the same, as fully and effectually as the said Maurice Wurts, his heirs or assigns, might or could do, &c., &c., and it shall be lawful for the said company to purchase and hold any quantity of lands, situate within ten miles of the river Lackawanna, not exceeding five thousand acres."

Thus the company came into being with an unclouded prospect of successorship to the privileges that had been bestowed upon the pioneer projector of the mighty work.

Up to this time not a shovelful of earth had been turned toward making the canal and no definite mode of crossing the mountain barrier to the coal-mines had been decided upon. The proposed enterprise, however, had become something more than a fruitful theme for discussion.

After organizing, the first act of the board of managers was "to engage the services of that able and experienced engineer, Benjamin Wright, Esq., and as his assistant, J. B. Jervis, Esq., who had been trained to the profession under Judge Wright, and whose ample knowledge of its duties do equal credit to his tutor and to his own talents."

To these engineers the managers submitted the report of Colonel Sullivan, founded upon the survey of Mr. Mills, requesting them to examine the several routes prepared for the canal, and in due time the engineers recommended the construction of an independent canal, instead of a canal in part and a slack-water navigation in the Rondout, Delaware and Lackawaxen. They advised that the locks should be constructed of stone instead of wood, as had been previously suggested. The managers in their first annual report (for the year 1825) said, "This more perfect navigation affording greater facilities and less liability to interruption than the original plan, together with the cost of the more permanent locks, was estimated at about one million six hundred thousand dollars." They decided on prosecuting the work according to the recommendations of the engineers, and adopted the valley of the Rondout in which to locate the canal. They also "concluded a bargain with the members of the Lackawaxen Company for the purchase of their coal-mines in Pennsylvania, and the rights and privileges in that State for the sum of forty thousand dollars in cash and a deferred stock amounting to two hundred thousand dollars," and thus the individual interests of Maurice, William and John Wurts were merged into the common one of the company.

Thirty-four sections of the canal were advertised to be let on the 13th of July, 1825. On that day the president, Philip Hone, attended by a large concourse of citizens, delivered an appropriate address and performed the ceremony of opening the ground on the summit level, forty miles from the Hudson River. Contracts were at the same time made for all the sections prepared for letting, and while the contractors were preparing their tools and collecting their laborers, the engineers continued their work of locating the remainder of the line. At several subsequent periods portions of the work were let between the summit and the Hudson River, and on the 6th of December, 1825, the remainder of the line was placed under contract. So the great work was begun and fairly under way as the first quarter of the century came to a close. No company or corporation on the continent had, under similar circumstances, ever entered upon a task of such magnitude, or one requiring so much capital, deliberation and good management to insure its successful completion.

The heavy expenditures for cutting the canal had well-nigh exhausted the funds of the company, but the State of New York, guided by the wise policy of Governor De Witt Clinton, passed a bill giving a loan of the credit of the State for five hundred thousand dollars. This was granted on the ground of public utility and in recognition of the simple merits of the company and was a very encouraging assurance of the faith of the public in the vast enterprise. The board of managers, being thus relieved from financial embarrassment, put forth their best efforts in pushing the work towards completion, and under these auspicious conditions the canal from the narrows of the Lackawaxen to the forks of the Dyberry—the site of Honesdale—was placed under contract.

Instead of extending the canal up the Lackawaxen about seven miles towards the base of the Moosic Mountain and using the neighboring ponds for feeders, as had been proposed by Wurts after the preliminary surveys, it was decided, upon the fuller knowledge now obtained of the highlands, to make the forks the western terminus of the canal and to unite that point with the mines by a railroad about fifteen miles in length.

"The construction and use of railroads was new in our country. Only one, of a few miles' length, near Boston, had been tested by a winter's cold and another was a temporary and imperfect work."[1]

In England, however, a railroad, almost exactly similar to that first constructed over the Moosic Mountains from Honesdale to Carbondale, had been built, and was in practically successful operation before the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company fully decided upon the mode of crossing the highland barrier. This was the Hetton Railroad, extending from the town of Sunderland, on the river Weir, to the Hetton collieries, in length seven miles and five furlongs. It overcame an elevation of eight hundred and twelve feet, or almost exactly the same that the Delaware and Hudson "gravity" does at present, and was operated by fixed engines upon planes and also by means, on the levels, of locomotives, a single one of which had drawn "a train of twenty-four chalder wagons containing ninety tons of coal" and in a day six hundred tons, "going nine gaits, equal to thirty-five miles, forwards and returning." The force of gravity was also taken advantage of. A profile of the Hetton Railroad bears a striking resemblance to that of the Honesdale and Carbondale Railroad. It was published in the Franklin Journal late in 1825 and in a Philadelphia daily newspaper in January, 1826, together with a view of the locomotive and "train of chalder wagons." Did it not suggest to the managers of the Delaware and Hudson Company the railroad with which they surmounted the Moosic, or did it not serve to decide in their minds the adoption of a similar device?

However this may have been, the managers did decide definitely upon building a railroad in the summer of 1826, and J. B. Jervis, a trusted engineer, made a survey for it, which, after being closely examined by civil engineers—Benjamin Wright and Professor Renwick—late in October was accepted by the company.

The canal was completed in October, 1828, and the first small canal-boat made its slow way to the Hudson with a cargo of ten tons of inferior coal in that month. In the month following a fleet of ten boats similarly laden passed in solemn procession as the pioneers of a mighty traffic.

The railroad was planned to transport five hundred and forty tons of coal per day, or one hundred and eight thousand tons per year, of two hundred working days, and it was expected that the new mode of shipment would surpass any sledge or wagon method upon a turnpike, however good. Prior to the building of the railroad twenty or thirty teams were engaged in conveying coal from the mines to the canal in loads of from one to two tons each. The cost was $2.20 per ton when sledges were used upon the snow and $2.75 when wagons were employed. This slow and tedious means of transportation made the coal cost the company a total of $5.25 at tide water. Only seven thousand tons found its way to market during the year 1829—considerably less than is now carried over the same route in a single day.

The railroad, which was commenced in 1827, was completed in the summer of 1829. Over its imperfect track, constructed of hemlock stringers and laid with strap-rails (soon to be fully described), the first load of coal passed on October 9, 1829, to the amazement and delight of the people along the line. It was drawn on the levels by horses and moved on the planes by gravity and the power of stationary engines. This was just two months and a day after the trial trip at Honesdale of the "Stourbridge Lion," the first locomotive that ever turned a wheel in America (of which an account appears later).

Even with the aid of the railroad worked to its utmost capacity the company was, in the second year of its operation (1830), only able to carry forty-three thousand two hundred tons of anthracite over the mountain. In other words, the entire amount of coal transported during the year 1830 was less than can now be moved in four days, for a shipment of twelve thousand tons in twenty-four hours is not beyond the present capacity of the road.

The railroad, as originally constructed, was very different from the present gravity road, and, although it connected the same terminal points, much of the old track was located on lines quite widely removed from the line now and for many years past used. As a matter of gratification to those most intimately interested in the history and workings of the road, and to those who live along its line, as well as for the benefit of the antiquarian, we preserve a minutely circumstantial account of the road as first built.

Starting from the mouth of the mine at Carbondale, the railroad commenced with a short inclined plane 300 feet long, ascending 30 feet (or one foot in 10), which was operated by horsepower. From the head of this plane the grade was near the natural surface of the ground a distance of 2000 feet to the foot of Steam Plane No. 1, ascending in that distance 45 feet (or 1 foot in 44). This grade was so heavy that it required one horse to each car carrying three tons of coal. The foot of Plane No. 1 was where passengers by the gravity road take the cars in Carbondale, and was at an elevation of 87 feet above the canal in Honesdale, and 1057 above the tide level.

In ascending Plane No. 1, a distance of 2000 feet, the grade was about 1 foot in 12, overcoming an elevation of 170 feet. This plane was located parallel to and along the northwestern side of the turnpike to Honesdale.

From the head of Plane No. 1 the track was nearly level for 600 feet to the foot of the next plane. Plane No. 2 was 2600 feet long, ascending 130 feet (or 1 foot in 20). This also was parallel to and along the western side of the turnpike. From the head of No. 2 the track was nearly level 2600 feet. This level part of the track crossed the turnpike, reaching the foot of Plane No. 3, on the southeast side of the turnpike, at the foot of the hill called "No. 3 Hill," about 1½ miles from the foot of No. 1.

Plane No. 3 was 2550 feet long, ascending 210 feet (or 1 foot in 12); then the track was near level 400 feet to the foot of Plane No. 4, which was 1800 feet long and ascended 150 feet (or 1 foot in 12).

From the head of No. 4 the track was nearly level 2000 feet to the foot of No. 5, at Racket Brook, some fifty rods below the company's reservoir dam. Planes 3 and 4, and the level between 4 and 5, were located along the southeastern side of the turnpike, and as nearly parallel thereto as the meanderings of the turnpike would admit of.

Plane No. 5 was 2500 feet long, ascending 208 feet to a point on the mountain, about a half-mile from the turnpike and within Wayne County. The head of this plane was the highest point reached, being 1915 feet above tide, and 945 above the canal in Honesdale.

From the head of No. 6 was the level called "Summit Level," 9250 feet long (or $1\frac{3}{4}$ miles), extending to the head of Plane No. 6 on a descending grade of 8 feet to a mile; and crossing the turnpike about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile west of the present "light track" summit.

When Horatio Allen ordered for the Delaware and Hudson Company the first three locomotives ever brought to America, it was expected that one of them would be used on this summit level.

"Plane No. 6" was 4300 feet long, descending on the eastern side of the mountain 349 feet (or 1 in $12\frac{1}{2}$). A few hundred feet from the head of this plane the track crossed the Honesdale turnpike.

From the foot of No. 6 was 400 feet of track, nearly level, to the head of Plane No. 7. This plane was 1500 feet long, and descended 120 feet (or 1 in $11\frac{1}{2}$) to the level at Waymart. This point is 452 feet higher than the canal in Honesdale, and 1422 feet above tide level.

From the foot of No. 7 was the long or "Six-mile Level," descending 264 feet (or 44 feet in a mile) to the head of Plane No. 8, at Prompton.

The route of the present track for loaded cars, from the middle of Plane No. 6 to the head of No. 8, at Prompton, is very nearly on the same ground as the original road, and, with the exception of the part between the D. Blandin place and the canal basin, is the only part which is on the original route.

The head of Plane No. 8 was at the point where passengers going toward Honesdale take or leave the cars, on the hill in Prompton.

From this point the plane extended 1444 feet, and descended 70 feet (or 1 in $20\frac{1}{2}$) to the west branch of the Lackawaxen, at the lower end of the Prompton flat.

From the foot of Plane 8 was the "Four-mile Level," extending to the canal basin in Honesdale, and descending 106 feet (or $26\frac{1}{2}$ feet per mile).

The track was constructed along, and near to, the northern (or left) bank of the west branch of the Lackawaxen, passing through what is now the Seelyville mill pond, along the northern side of and very near to Seely's saw-mill, and the Foster's tannery buildings—and close along the river side of the turnpike across the Blandin flat, and from there to the basin near the site of the present track.

The entire length of the railroad from the mines at Carbondale to the basin in Honesdale was sixteen and seven-eighths miles. At the time the road was built it was calculated to afford ample facilities for transporting one hundred thousand tons of coal per year, that quantity being deemed as great as it was needful to provide for.

A plan of construction was adopted, designed to accomplish the object sought, with as little outlay as practicable. As at least nine-tenths of the entire distance was through unbroken forests, where timber could be very cheaply obtained, all heavy embankments for grade were dispensed with, and as far as practicable, without too short curves, heavy excavations were avoided. When the grade was more than four feet above the natural surface, trestle work of timber was generally used, and in some parts where the grade was still nearer the surface, wooden posts were placed upright in holes dug in the earth three feet or more in depth, and broken stones filled in around the posts—the tops of the posts being sawn off at the proper height to receive the cross-ties upon which the rails were to rest. In other cases where the grade was near the surface, the cross-ties, which were usually ten feet distant from each other, were supported by stone piers under each end.

Upon these cross-ties were placed wooden rails of hemlock timber, generally six inches in thickness and twelve inches in height, and either twenty or thirty feet long, so as to extend across two or three of the spaces between the cross-ties. These rails were made fast to the cross-ties by wooden keys, or wedges, and in such position that the space between the rails should be just the width of the gauge adopted, which was about four feet three inches. Upon the top and at the inner edges of these rails, flat bars of iron, two and a half inches wide and half an inch thick, were laid and made fast by large screws through holes for that purpose in the iron bars. After a little experience the hemlock rail was found to be too soft for a firm bed for the iron bars, and strips of beech two inches thick and three to four inches wide were spiked to the top of the hemlock rail, and the iron bars fastened upon those beech strips. After a very little time the use of screws to fasten the iron bars was discontinued, and iron spikes used instead.

A stationary steam-engine was used for a motive-power at each of the five long planes on the western side of the mountains, which, by means of a long chain extending the entire length of the plane, drew up three to five loaded cars, and at the same time let down a like number of empty cars.

The three planes descending toward Honesdale were worked by gravitation, without the use of steam,—by having the descending loaded cars draw up the ascending empty cars attached to the other end of the chain, and the velocity of their motion was controlled by the use of friction brakes upon the shaft of a large upright fan-wheel.

It was originally expected to make use of locomotive power on the three long levels, known as "Summit Level," "Six-mile Level" and "Four-mile Level," and to use horses on the other levels between the planes.

Three locomotives were made for the company in England under directions of Horatio Allen, and brought to New York to be so used, but on the trial of one of them, the track was found too weak to admit of their use with safety; and the use of horses was thus made necessary on those levels also.

On the Summit Level one horse could not draw more than two loaded cars at a time.

On the Six-mile Level (between Waymart and Prompton) the grade was such that loaded cars descended by gravity, and cars were provided for a sufficient number of horses to ride, with each train, to draw the empty cars back—one horse being thus able to return four empty cars. These horses became so accustomed to riding down the grade that when, by reason of ice on the rails, the cars required force to propel them, some of the horses clearly showed an unwillingness to go upon the track and draw the cars in that direction.

On the Four-mile Level (between Prompton and the canal basin) the grade was such that one horse could draw five loaded cars down, and the same number of empty cars back.

The Four-mile and the Six-mile Levels had such a branch or side-track for a short distance near the centre, so that cars moving in one direction could pass those going in the opposite direction, and at these branches were the boarding-houses for the car-runners. One of these boarding-houses was near the present residence of Jacob L. Keen, and was kept by Warren Dimock, and the other was opposite the present residence of Henry L. Phillips, and was kept by George M. Keen.

A very few years' experience with the use of chains for conveying the loaded cars upon the planes convinced the managers of the road that some material, less liable to break than the chains then in use, must be substituted for them. Each train of loaded cars passing over the road was liable to be wrecked by the failure of any one of some one hundred and fifty thousand links composing the chains upon the several planes, and many such accidents occurred. To remedy this, heavy hemp ropes, the strands of which had been saturated with tar, were introduced, instead of the chains, and thereafter such accidents were very infrequent. This short experience also demonstrated that the use of horses to draw loaded cars up so heavy a grade as that of the short section extending from the mine to "Plane No. 1" was unnecessarily expensive.

To remedy this, a plane to be operated by water-power was constructed in 1837, fourteen hundred feet long, and ascending from the mouth of the mine nearly eighty feet, and from the head of this plane a new track fifteen hundred feet in length, to the foot of Plane No. 1, was laid on a grade descending one foot in two hundred and fifty. This improvement reduced the cost of transportation on that short section at least two cents per ton.

THE "STOURBRIDGE LION"—THE FIRST LOCOMOTIVE IN AMERICA.—The first locomotive that ever turned a wheel in America was placed upon this railroad and made its trial trip on August 8, 1829 (as heretofore mentioned). Horatio Allen (still living—1886—and a resident of South Orange, New Jersey, aged eighty-six years) was directly instrumental in causing the locomotive to be built and brought to the railroad of the Delaware and Hudson Company, and he was its engineer on the occasion of its trial trip.

Numerous accounts have been written of this locomotive and its initial trip, all differing in some minor detail, but agreeing in essentials. The one which we here present is founded in the main upon an article which appeared in the Honesdale Citizen in 1881, and was written upon information received from Mr. Allen, and authoritatively indorsed by him when completed. The article alluded to states that Mr. Allen "was a civil engineer by profession, and had been engaged in the survey of the Delaware and Hudson Canal—first on the 'summit' division, and afterward between the Delaware River and Honesdale. Having completed his duties, he resigned his position and quitted the theatre of the company's operations. He had heard of the success of George Stephenson with the locomotive, and was convinced that the transportation lines of the future would be operated with the new motor. He accordingly decided to visit England and master the methods there employed in constructing and operating railways. John B. Jervis, chief engineer of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, learning of his purpose, commissioned him to purchase in England the iron for the railroad between Honesdale and Carbondale, the chains to be used on the inclined planes, and three locomotives to be run on the railroad levels. The rails were to be flat, with oblong, countersunk spike-holes. Their manufacture was a new industry. Mr. Allen devised a mode of making the rails, but most, if not all, of the iron-workers in this country to whom he submitted his plan pronounced it impossible of execution. In England, fourteen of seventeen iron-masters also declared it impracticable. He finally contracted for the manufacture of the rails at Merthyr-Tydvil, in South Wales. When offered for delivery, however, they were in an unfinished condition, and so ill adapted to the purpose that he refused to receive them, maintaining that they were not in conformity with the contract. The manufacturers, on the other hand, contended for a different construction of the contract, and declined to do anything further to them. Mr. Allen thereupon went to Wolverhampton, in England, and made a new contract with a manufacturer at that place. Here he presented his plan of manufacture; it was approved and adopted, and in a short time the rails were finished, complete in every particular. In due time they were shipped, and formed the first track of the Delaware and Hudson Railroad. The English manufacturers continued to use Mr. Allen's method of manufacture; and though the inventor might have secured all its advantages by taking out a patent, he was content to give it to the world without any reward. The chains for the railroad planes were made in Liverpool, and after being tested under Mr. Allen's supervision were sent to Honesdale and put into use. They failed, however, to answer the purpose satisfactorily, giving way so often as to cause considerable damage, and making it necessary to keep portable forges passing along the line of the road to repair the broken links. They were finally superseded by Manilla ropes, and the latter in turn gave place to the wire cables now in use.

"It was in the autumn of 1827 that Mr. Allen went to England. The leading purpose of his visit was the investigation of the railway system and the locomotive. Various experiments had been made during the previous quarter of a century, resulting in the gradual improvement of the locomotive and track. In 1804 a steam carriage, designed by Richard Trevethick, was tried on the tramway at the Merthyr-Tydvil iron-works, five miles in length. It was found incapable, however, of ascending anything beyond a very moderate inclination. In 1811 a locomotive was placed on the Wylam colliery tramway, near Newcastle, which succeeded in overcoming a somewhat heavier grade. Up to this time it was considered necessary, in ascending an inclination, to employ a cog-wheel on the locomotive, working in a toothed rail on the road-bed, to secure the necessary hold and prevent the driving-wheels from slipping on the track; but the increased friction counterbalanced all the supposed advantages of this method. The experiment of constructing an engine with levers projecting behind, and striking the ground alternately, like a pair of legs, was then tried, but proved unsuccessful. In 1814 George Stephenson, who was then employed at Killingworth Colliery, built a locomotive which ran successfully with smooth tires; and the next year he built another, to which he added the steam blast, thereby greatly increasing its steam-making power. Other improvements were devised, and the working parts materially simplified during the year following. A few years later he constructed a railway, eight miles long, for the Hetton Colliery, which was opened in 1822, stationary engines being employed at the heavy grades, and locomotives on the remainder of the road. Immediately afterward, Stephenson commenced the construction of a railway for the transportation of coal from Darlington, in Durham, to the shipping port of Stockton-upon-Tees, a distance of sixteen miles. So slight was public confidence in the capabilities of the locomotive at this time that it was with great difficulty that the act of Parliament authorizing this road was so modified as to permit the use of locomotives throughout its whole length, instead of stationary engines, as at first contemplated. The road was opened September 25, 1825, and Stephenson's locomotives were found to surpass all expectations.

"Mr. Allen spent several weeks on the Stockton and Darlington Railway, examining every point, and becoming thoroughly acquainted with the construction of the locomotive. The engines there used, though in advance of anything previously built, were still very imperfect. The fire-box consisted of a cylinder inside the boiler, with a flue passing through to the smoke-stack. Nothwithstanding Stephenson's success, the battle in behalf of the steam carriage was by no means won. While Mr. Allen was in England, the Liverpool and Manchester Railway was in process of construction, and whether it should be operated by locomotives or stationary engines was a question still hotly debated. The most eminent engineers pronounced against the locomotive, and a committee appointed to consider the subject reported in favor of stationary engines. It was resolved, however, to make a practical test, and a reward was offered for a steam carriage that should meet the requirements of the road. Pending this controversy, Mr. Allen decided on locomotives for the Delaware and Hudson road, and three were built under his direction, with some improvements on existing engines, among which was the removal of the fire box from the boiler, and its location underneath.

"In the autumn of 1828 Mr. Allen returned to America. Shortly afterward one of the locomotives arrived. This was set up in New York, its body resting on blocks and its wheels clear; and in this position its working was exhibited to the directors of the company, by E. Dunscomb, on Water Street.[1] In due time the others arrived. In the following summer, the canal being opened, and the railroad to Carbondale in operation, one of the locomotives built at Stourbridge, England, by Foster, Rastrick & Co., and named the "Lion," was forwarded by boat to Honesdale. On its arrival it was placed on the railroad track alongside the canal, and prepared for running, under the direction of Mr. Allen. It was a large and cumbrous affair, compared with the engines of the present day of the same power. The locomotive and tender were both four-wheeled, with spokes and felloes of wood, and iron tires and wheel centres. The locomotive was without a cab, the cylinders were upright, and a walking-beam on each side applied the motive-power to the wheels. The first trip was made August 8, 1829, in presence of a large crowd, which had assembled to witness the novel spectacle. Predictions of failure were not wanting; the breaking down of the track, which was built largely on trestles or piles, was especially apprehended; and there was little inclination on the part of those present to trust themselves on the new vehicle. Mr. Allen, declaring that if there was any danger he was ready to meet it, and that it was not necessary to sacrifice any other life than his own, took his place alone, and set in motion the first locomotive ever run in the western hemisphere. The point of departure, as testified to by eye-witnesses of the trial trip, who have since resided in Honesdale and maintained an acquaintance with the place through all its changes, was at a point opposite the old Methodist Episcopal Church building, and near the 'Beers' house. The track consisted of large hemlock timbers, laid on crossties, and with flat iron bars—subsequently known as the 'strap rail'—spiked next the inner edge. The reason which has for many years been accepted for the subsequent abandonment of the locomotive is that this track was found too light for it to run with safety. At the time of the trial trip, the timbers and ties, though securely connected, had become warped, and in some places raised from the ground, by exposure to the sun, and the track presented a surface somewhat irregular. As the 'Lion' passed over it, the weight pressed everything underneath firmly down to its place on the roadbed, with no little creaking and groaning. Beyond this, however, Mr. Allen saw nothing to indicate that the track was unequal to the requirements of the locomotive. The 'Lion' proved to be all that the engineer had expected. After running at a fair rate of speed as far as Seelyville—the greater portion of the track then being on the northern bank of the Lackawaxen—the engine was reversed, and the 'Lion' returned to the dock at Honesdale, having met with no accident and encountered no difficulty. The trial trip was thus completed, and the locomotive was pronounced a success.[1] imported by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, to be used upon their railway. On Wednesday the engine just imported was placed upon exhibition, and was unanimously attended by gentlemen of science and particular intelligence. The steam was raised by the Lackawaxen (Lackawanna) coal, and sustained (although there was no friction) at between forty and fifty pounds to the inch. Pleased as we were, however, with the engine, we were much more pleased with the practical demonstration offered of the importance and usefulness of the coal which the company propose to bring to market. It is now reduced to a certainty that the Lackawaxen (Lackawanna) coal will generate steam in sufficient quantity to answer all the purposes to which it is applied, and this fact is not only of great importance to the company, but it is worth millions to our State."

[1] The arrival and exhibition of the locomotive in New York was thus commented upon by the Morning Courier and New York Enquirer: . . . "We yesterday attended the first exhibition of a locomotive engine called 'The Lion,'

The Dundaff Republican, on July 23, 1829, announced the arrival in Honesdale of "The Lion" in an enthusiastic editorial, saying among other things that the locomotive "would run four miles an hour" and that "in a few days the whole would be set in motion."

[1] "On the 6th of October, 1829—less than sixty days after the trial of the 'Stourbridge Lion'—the competitive test of locomotives at Liverpool took place, four locomotives being entered for trial. On this occasion, the 'Rocket' built by George Stephenson and his son, won the prize; attaining an average speed of fourteen miles an hour, and a maximum speed of twenty-nine miles under the most favorable conditions. Less than a year later—Sept. 15, 1830—the Liverpool and Manchester Railway was opened; and on this occasion Stephenson's 'Rocket' ran fifteen miles at the rate of thirty-six miles an hour. This settled the railway question. Notwithstanding the cold shoulder given to the 'Stourbridge Lion,' it was obvious that the locomotive was to become, as Mr. Allen had foreseen, the railroad motor of the future. Experiments in this country rapidly followed. Mr. Allen, after leaving Honesdale, took charge of the construction of the South Carolina Railroad, connecting Charleston, S. C., and Augusta, Ga. Under his direction a locomotive was built at West Point, N. Y., named the 'Best Friend of Charleston,' and placed on the road Nov. 2, 1830. This was the first one built, and the second

"Mr. Allen remained in Honesdale for three weeks after this experimental trip, during which time he made some improvements in the locomotive, and tested them on the track. After his departure, however, the 'Lion' was for some reason abandoned. Subsequently, the change in the road, by which the cars were made to run by gravity, rendered the locomotive no longer necessary; and in the course of time the 'Lion' was dismantled and reduced to the state of scrap iron."

During the trial, or just after it had been made, a small cannon, a six-pounder, which had been captured from the British, was used to voice the enthusiasm of the crowd more emphatically than was possible by other means. Upon its second discharge it shattered the arm of Alvah Adams, who was one of the gunners. This accident, so far as is now known, was the only one of the day.[1]

Some details of the construction of the "Lion" are given, not as of any particular value, but as information that may be of interest to the curious.

The boiler of the locomotive is at an iron shop in Carbondale, and the tires of the wheels and the circles for stiffening and strengthening the spokes are in the office of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, in Honesdale. The tires are four feet in diameter, exclusive of the flanges, which project three-quarters of an inch on all sides. The breadth of the tire on the inner side, next to the felloes, is four inches, and on the other side (or tread) three and one-quarter inches, exclusive of the flange, which is three-quarters of an inch. The tire is formed of two plates or bands of wrought iron, welded together, the inner one being one-half inch thick, the outer one three-quarters of an inch, making the entire thickness of the tire, exclusive of the flange, one and one-quarter inches. The tread of the tire is flat, not conical or tapering, as now usually made. The thickness of the felloes was not more than three and one-half inches, nor less than three inches. Each wheel had an iron circular plate surrounding the hub, placed on each side of the spokes,—the outer diameter of which was about twenty-six inches, the breadth of each plate generally two and one-quarter inches, but wider on one side, to receive the crank pin. These plates were connected by cross-plates five inches long, placed on each side of each spoke. The wooden spokes (twelve in each wheel) were, where passing through that circle, five inches wide lengthwise of the hub, and two and one-eighth inches in thickness. An iron half-inch bolt passed through each spoke and both plates of the circle.

The crank pin, or journal, was attached to this stiffening circle, the centre of such crank pin being twelve and one-quarter inches from the centre of the hub, making the sweep of the crank twenty-four and one-half inches in diameter. The hubs, felloes, spokes and filling between the spokes, in the space where the crank pin was attached, were all of oak timber of best quality, and were painted a bright red.

The felloes were about four inches wide, and from three to three and one-half inches in thickness or depth, and the spokes were two and one-eighth inches thick, and five inches wide where the driving power was applied. The diameter of the hub was about ten inches, and the spokes about fifteen inches in length.

When the canal and railroad were both in perfect working condition the company had by no means overcome all obstacles. In 1829 they had to encounter an adverse feeling caused by the acknowledged inferior quality of the surface coal they had sent to market. This brought the Lackawanna anthracite into ill repute, and rival operators were not slow to take advantage one placed on the track, on this continent. The South Carolina Railroad, one hundred and thirty-five miles in length, was opened in 1833. It was then the longest continuous railroad line in the world; and it is described by Mr. Allen as the first one ever constructed primarily for passenger travel—the pre-existing roads having been built mainly for the transportation of coal and merchandise. Railroads were at the same time projected and pushed forward in other portions of the country. On the 4th of July, 1828, the construction of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was commenced at Baltimore. In May, 1830, fifteen miles of the road were opened; but it was nearly a year before the locomotive superseded horse-power in its operation."

of the situation and endeavor to crush the new rival by circulating stories that the whole deposit in the Delaware and Hudson Company's lands was useless as a fuel. Much was said, too, of the perishable character of the road and canal, and the early bankruptcy of the corporation was predicted. The company, under the pressure of these combined disadvantages, did, in fact, become seriously embarrassed, and all hopes of declaring dividends were abandoned for a time. "More than this, the cry of monopoly was arrayed against the corporation at a time when the shares, first costing one hundred dollars each, had been six or seven years on the hands of the stockholders without yielding a single dividend, and had therefore in effect cost about one hundred and forty dollars per share, could actually be bought in the market at the time for about forty-eight to fifty dollars per share, or half what it had originally cost." For a time apprehension was rife, and the dissolution of the company was only averted through the action of Philip Hone. With Messrs. Wurts, Holmes, Talbot, Tileston, Post, Halstead, Calder, Bryan, Chancellor Kent and other managers, he was called to attend an urgent meeting, to be held one Sunday, at the Old City Hotel, in New York, to determine whether the company should be dissolved or continue in its career. After mature deliberation it was decided that on the following morning, no matter what the results might be, the company must close its doors. Mr. Hone, after the adjournment of the meeting, reflected upon the distress which the failure would bring, resolved, if possible, to avert it, and the next morning before ten o'clock raised the whole sum necessary to save the company and handed it to the president without security.

The year 1831 did not open very auspiciously. The credit of the company was still depressed and the sale of coal was insufficient to advance its credit or sustain its expenses. John Bolton had succeeded Philip Hone as president and in 1831 he gave place at the annual election to John Wurts, a prominent lawyer of Philadelphia and member of Congress. The other officers chosen at that time were: Treasurer, John H. Williams; Managers, Philip Hone, James Bryan, William Calder, Thomas Tileston, William M. Halsted, John Hitchcock, Samuel Reynolds, William Wheelwright, William Worrell, John Wurts, Allison Post, William Bradford, James Ruthven. The new board set about the work of restoring the credit of the company and rectifying the wrong impression that had gone abroad about its coal. The stockholders, at a meeting March 23, 1831, authorized them to borrow on the credit of the company and a pledge of its property a sufficient sum to discharge its debts and prosecute its business. A loan of three hundred thousand dollars was effected from the State of New York, which, when it matured, in 1849, was promptly paid, and this freed the company, for the time being, of embarrassment. The company now began in a systematic way to educate the public in the matter of using anthracite, and their efforts were well repaid, for they succeeded in introducing it in a very large number of manufactories. Its use in generating steam on land preceded, by several years, its general introduction in steamboats, and it was not until 1835 that its merits were fully demonstrated as an agent in the production of steam for navigation purposes. In that year a new steam ferry-boat, built for the purpose and fitted up with Dr. Nott's patent tubular boilers, using Lackawanna coal, made a trip of fifty miles up the Hudson with a party of gentlemen on board, and showed speed equal to that of any boat on the river. Dr. Nott had been engaged for several years, under the direction of Maurice Wurts, in carrying on experiments to bring about this result. Messrs. H. Nott & Co. subsequently made a contract with the Delaware and Hudson Company to run a passenger steamer upon the North River with no fuel but Lackawanna coal, and they were, in consideration for the benefits so accruing to the company, made the owners of one thousand shares of its stock at par. The large amount of coal sold and distributed gratuitously by the company in 1832 developed the fact that there were not enough miners in the country to mine the coal demanded, and many were brought from abroad. But still, "in 1835 miners were so scarce in Carbondale that they were able to make their own terms." "In 1836," says the managers' report, "to guard against a short supply of coal and other evils consequent upon a general want of miners, . . . the company sent out an agent to secure additional ones," but owing to the great demand in England, only a few could be induced to come to this country.

For fifteen years the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company struggled against almost all conceivable adverse circumstances and did not obtain a financial success until 1840. Interest had to be paid upon the debt, mine roads opened and repaired, the railroad, with its cumbersome machinery and antiquated engines kept in working order, and the damage which floods wrought in the canal made good.

But three great causes were now working in favor of the company, viz.: the introduction of coal upon steamboats, the demonstration of its practical usefulness in the manufacture of iron, and the diminution of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company's supply to the market, through the partial obliteration of their slack-water navigation by floods.

James Archbald figures as an important character in the history of the company's progress. He came into the service of the company very soon after the railroad over the mountain was begun, and in 1829 he was made superintendent and resident engineer by J. B. Jervis. He was destined to work very material changes and improvements in the road and to place it practically in its present condition. In 1836–37 he constructed new planes at Carbondale, greatly facilitating the movement of coal-cars. Prior to that time the track between the planes had been level and the cars had been drawn upon it by horses, but Mr. Archbald devised the plan of giving it a slight descent and taking advantage of the force of gravity to run the cars from one plane to another.

In 1841 one hundred and ninety-two thousand two hundred and seven tons of anthracite was transported over the company's lines, but that amount being far beyond the ordinary working capacity of either the canal or railroad, the managers adopted a plan for enlarging the former and making important improvements in the latter. Instead of the single track, with turnouts, by which the cars could pass at certain points, a "loaded" and a "light," or return track, entirely independent of each other, were constructed, the location, as well as the entire arrangement of the road, was changed and water-power and machinery took the place of horses, which were found too slow and expensive. Engineer Archbald, in his report to John Wurts in 1847, says: "After careful consideration and examination of the ground over which we had to go, in order to be fully satisfied of its fitness for what would be required, I proposed the present plan of road; which, though entirely novel in its arrangement for the return of empty cars, received the sanction of the Board and was adopted." These improvements were begun in 1842 and for the most part completed in 1844, though minor ones have been made since, altogether increasing the carrying capacity of the road over thirty-fold. The improvements made between the years specified cost $328,890.46. Simultaneously with the remodeling of the road, the canal was deepened one foot, so that boats of forty or fifty tons could as readily pass through it as twenty-five-ton boats could in the original channel. In 1852 the second enlargement was completed and in 1866 it was again enlarged for boats of one hundred and fifty tons.

It was while the work upon the railroad alluded to was in progress that the company decided to extend the line to White Oak Run (now Archbald), and this was the signal for the outbreak of a most unreasonable and virulent hostility. The opposition to the extension of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's railroad into the central part of the valley was originally based largely upon an unreasonable fear of monopoly, but the war which ensued and raged with the utmost fury eventually drew into and entangled with the issue the conflicting interests of several rival corporations and ambitious individuals, and involved also the vexed and rancorous strife for the carving of a new county from the northern part of Luzerne. Of this contest it is beyond our province to treat, for it belongs rather to the history of Luzerne and Lackawanna Counties than that of Wayne. Suffice it to say that the asperities of that long and bitter feud have been softened by the lapse of years, and that whatever its abiding results, they have not materially affected the condition of the great corporation whose history is here outlined.

In the mean time the practical work of the company was carried calmly and successfully on. Improvements were made from time to time, as they were demanded, and in the years 1847–49 especial preparations were made to accommodate the increased traffic caused by the construction of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's gravity railroad from the mines to Hawley, by which coal was first shipped in 1850.

In 1846, to avoid the delay formerly experienced in crossing the Delaware River by means of a dam, the company commenced the erection of two wire suspension aqueducts, which were completed in 1849, and opened for navigation in May. They were constructed on the plan of the Pittsburgh suspension aqueduct, the first of the kind in the world, and were designed by Mr. John A. Roebling, the engineer of the former, acting with Mr. R. F. Lord, chief engineer of the Delaware and Hudson.

The trunks which held the water were composed of timber and plank, well joined and caulked, and suspended from two wire cables, one on each side. The cables rested in heavy cast-iron saddles surmounting stone towers four by six feet square, and rising four feet above the tow-path. The trunks were wide enough for two boats to pass, and on each side of the channel was a tow-path. The masonry was of the most durable and compact graywacke, which constitutes the principal formation of the valley of the Upper Delaware, and was so constructed as to insure it from damage by the heavy floods and ice that so often prove destructive at this point in the river.

The cables were each made in one length from abutment to abutment, and were protected by close wire wrapping heavily coated with paint and varnish. The anchorage of each was by heavy chains secured to plates of cast-iron six feet square. The following table, exhibiting the principal dimensions at the Delaware aqueduct, will be of interest :

Length of aqueduct with extensions	600 feet.
Number of spans	4
Length of span varies from 131 to..	142 feet.
Width of trunk at water-line	19 feet.
Depth of water	6 feet 6 in.
Weight of water between abutments	1950 tons.
Weight of water in one span	487½ tons.
Diameter of wire cables	8½ inches.
Number of wires in each cable	2150
Total weight of cables and anchorage	190,000 pounds.
Ultimate strength of each cable	1900 tons.
Hydraulic cement masonry in abutment, piers and anchorage.	7688 cubic yds.

During the winter the general enlargement of the canal was also vigorously prosecuted. Fifty-seven of the enlarged locks were made one hundred feet long between quoins and given fifteen feet width of chamber, while during the succeeding winter the remaining locks were improved, so that in 1880 the canal was adequate for the passage of boats loaded with one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty tons of coal.

By the provisions of the act incorporating the company, passed March 13, 1823, the State of Pennsylvania reserved the right after the expiration of thirty years to resume the rights, liberties and franchises, on certain terms and conditions specified in the eighteenth section. The subject became one of considerable discussion in the Legislature as the expiration of the period, on March 13, 1853, approached, and on the 8th of January, 1852, the committee of the House to whom the matter had been referred reported that if the State did exercise its right of resumption, it must pay the company for the Pennsylvania section of the canal the sum of $1,246,437.63, that being the difference between the amount of tolls received and the cost of construction and repairs. In this conclusion the board of managers did not concur, but on the contrary they argued that even if the right of resumption, by the State, did exist, the amount paid must be much larger. Finally, on the 30th of April, 1852, a bill was passed which was in effect a total and unconditional surrender by the State of its right of resumption, if any such she had, and a perpetual extension of the franchises of the company.

In 1854 the company was deprived of the valuable services, of Maurice Wurts, who died on the 29th of December in that year, at Philadelphia. He had been identified with the company for more than thirty years, and with the great project from its inception, and to him more than to any other one man its wonderful success was due. Wm. Musgrave, another efficient officer, the vice-president of the company, died in April, 1856.

John Wurts, after twenty-seven years of devoted service, resigned his office as president on March 15, 1858, and his resignation was accepted by the board with the greatest reluctance. Thus the pioneers and projectors, those who had borne the brunt of the struggle and finally brought the company to a solidly established prosperity, passed from the field of action, and the work was taken up by others. Thus far the company had had but three presidents,—Philip Hone, from 1825 to 1826; John Bolton, from 1826 to 1832; and John Wurts, from 1832 to 1858. George T. Olyphant was elected as Mr. Wurts' successor and the latter gentleman retained a position in the board of managers until 1861. He died in Rome, Italy, on the 23d of April in that year. The other officers elected for the year 1858 were,—Vice-President, Robert Soutter, previously chosen in 1856; Treasurer, Isaac N. Seymour; Secretary, James C. Hartt; Managers, John Wurts, Silas Holmes, Wm. S. Herriman, Chas. N. Talbot, Lora Nash, Edward J. Woolsey, George T. Olyphant, Robert Ray, Daniel Parish, Samuel B. Schieffelin, Abiel A. Low, Robert L. Kennedy, John David Wolfe. During this year the company's railroad was extended from Archbald, seven miles down the valley, at an expense of three hundred thousand dollars, and within the next two years was extended to Scranton.

A great lawsuit between the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company and the Pennsylvania Coal Company, which had been several years in progress, and in which the former sued for additional tolls, was concluded in 1863. The decision rendered awarded the Delaware and Hudson Company five cents additional toll for every ton of coal transported on the canal since July 28, 1853, the aggregate of the amount, with interest, being about three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

R. F. Lord, of Honesdale, resigned his position as chief engineer of the company's canal on the 1st of January, 1864. He had entered the service of the company in 1826, and the managers felt it to be a pleasant duty to bear testimony to the zeal, ability and faithfulness with which he had for a period of nearly forty years discharged every trust committed to him.

Thomas Dickson, who entered the employ of the company as superintendent of the coal department in 1860, was made general superintendent in 1864, vice-president in 1865 and president in 1869. In 1866, R. Manville, who had for a long period been a trusted employé of the company, was made superintendent of the railroad department, a position which he still fills, and Coe F. Young was appointed to the position of canal superintendent, to which Asher M. Atkinson succeeded when Mr. Young was meritoriously advanced to the office of general manager in 1869. With these and other efficient officers in the managing and executive departments, the company not only sustained its past prosperity, but entered successfully upon new and broader fields of action.

The Albany and Susquehanna Railroad was acquired by perpetual lease of the property and franchises at an annual rental of four hundred and ninety thousand dollars, on the 24th of February, 1870, and the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad, with its branches, on the 1st of May, 1871, while the New York and Canada Railroad was built soon after. President Dickson, on the opening of that great branch of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's Railroad, in November, 1875, thus summarized the progress of the company's business:

". . . In 1830 the total product (of the mines) was forty-three thousand tons, and in 1860, the year of my entering the service of the company, the product had reached five hundred and forty-one thousand tons; the present year it will be three millions; in 1860 the company had a productive capacity of not to exceed six hundred thousand tons per annum, had one hundred and eight miles of canal and twenty-three of railroad; its productive capacity is now four millions of tons per annum, and in addition to the canal, it owns and operates seven hundred miles of railway, besides some two hundred miles of underground railway in their mines, and while the capital stock has been increased from time to time, until now it reaches twenty millions, the increase of product and of the business has been much larger in proportion."

The fiftieth anniversary of the company was marked by the erection, in New York City, of a massive and magnificent fire-proof building, situated on the southeast corner of Cortlandt and New Church Streets. The foundation was laid in 1874, and the edifice known as the "Coal and Iron Exchange Building" completed and occupied in January, 1876.

The rebuilding of the coal road by James Archbald, which left it substantially in its present condition, with a carrying capacity of three million tons per annum, has heretofore been spoken of. The arrangement of planes and "levels," with the length of each, the height of the former and fall of the latter, with the elevations above tide-water, are as follows:

The total length of the road from Scranton to Honesdale is thirty-one and thirty-two one-hundredths miles, and the total length of the light track from Honesdale to Olyphant (foot of G) twenty-nine and ninety-four one hundredths miles, making the total of the main line sixty-one and twenty-six one-hundredths miles. With branches the total length of track is eighty-seven miles.

The company employ in the operation of its "gravity" railroad, twenty-seven double engines, most of which are either sixteen or eighteen by thirty-six inch cylinders. The number of boilers is one hundred and seventy; of locomotives five.

The shipments of coal from the mines, for each year from the time the canal was opened to 1885, are exhibited in the following table, which is also suggestive of the slow but constant and comparatively uniform development of the company's prosperity :

Chief Engineer Albany and Susquehanna and Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad Department: 1873, C. W. Wentz.

President and Superintendent New York and Canada Railroad Department: 1873, Isaac V. Baker.

On January 1, 1875, the Northern Railroad Department was created, consisting of the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad and branches, Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad and branches, and the completed portion of the New York and Canada Railroad. It was divided into two divisions, viz.: Saratoga Division, embracing the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad and branches, and the New York and Canada Railroad and branches; and the Susquehanna Division, embracing the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad and branches.

The superintendents placed in charge were as follows:

Saratoga Division, Theodore Voorhees, Troy, N. Y.; Susquehanna Division, C. D. Hammond, Albany, N. Y.

November 1, 1885, both divisions were placed under the charge of C. D. Hammond, as superintendent of the Northern Railroad Department.

Chief Engineers Northern Railroad Department: 1875, C. W. Wentz; 1885, A. J. Swift.

The managers and officers of the company at present are as follows:

Board of Managers.—Abiel A. Low, James M. Halsted, Le Grand B. Cannon, James R. Taylor, John Jacob Astor, Thomas Cornell, Robert S. Hone, James Roosevelt, Abraham R. Van Nest, Hugh J. Jewett, David Dows, Robert M. Olyphant, Benjamin H. Bristow.

President, Robert M. Olyphant, New York City; Vice-President, Le Grand B. Cannon, New York City; Treasurer and General Sales Agent, James C. Hartt, New York City; Assistant Treasurer, Charles A. Walker, New York City; Secretary, F. Murray Olyphant, New York City; General Manager,[1] Horace G. Young, Albany, N. Y.; General Agent of Real Estate Department, E. W. Weston, Providence, Pa.; Superintendent of Coal Department, A. H. Vandling, Providence, Pa.; Superintendent of Pennsylvania Division, R. Manville, Carbondale, Pa.; Sales Agent Southern and Western Department, Joseph J. Albright, Scranton, Pa.; Superintendent Canal Department, L. O. Rose, Honesdale, Pa.; Superintendent Rondout Department, S. S. Smith, Rondout, N. Y.; General Sales Agent Western and Southern Sales Department, Joseph J. Albright, Scranton, Pa.; Superintendent Northern Railroad Department, C. D. Hammond, Albany, N. Y.

[1] Coe F. Young, appointed general manager in 1869, held that office until July, 1885, when he resigned, and his son, Horace G. Young, appointed assistant general manager in 1882, was, on the 30th of September, 1885, promoted to fill the vacancy.

COE F. YOUNG, for many years the general manager of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, is a descendant of an old English family, of Scotch extraction, whose representatives emigrated to this country at an early period in its history, and settled in Connecticut, where they became identified with the pioneer development of that State. There was born William Young, his paternal grandfather, who left his native State and early established himself in Orange County, N. Y. His son, Isaac Young, was the father of the subject of this sketch and a farmer by occupation. He was a man of excellent judgment and great force of character, and not only engaged in tilling the soil, but drew contracts and deeds, and acted as the adviser and business confidant of many of his friends. He married Sarah Robbins, a native of Orange County, and had a family of seven children, of whom Coe F. Young was the sixth and only surviving member.

The latter was born near Mount Hope, Orange County, N. Y., May 15, 1824. His early education was obtained at the district schools of his locality, and was completed at the Kingston (N. Y.) Academy, and the seminary at Amenia, Dutchess County, N. Y. When only thirteen years of age he began the performance of the duties of life by driving on the tow-path of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, as so many of our successful and prominent men have done. Before he attained his majority he served as a clerk in the store of Thomas W. Cornell & Co., at Eddyville, Ulster County, N. Y., and subsequently with their successor, Martin J. Merchant. Soon after, the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company began enlarging the canal, and the construction of the Erie Railway was undertaken. With the ambition of youth, and the energy and business sagacity that has since characterized his life, he resolved to profit by the opening trade and removed to Barryville, N. Y., where, in connection with Calvin P. Fuller, he established a store, the firm doing business under the name and style of Fuller & Young. In the spring of 1852 he bought of Major Cornell a half-interest in the canal freight line between New York and Northeastern Pennsylvania. The firm of Thomas Cornell & Co. was organized, and Mr. Young removed to Honesdale, Pa., where he has since resided. After five years he became, by purchase, the sole proprietor of the line, and operated it alone for seven years longer. At that time the transportation facilities of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company included only the canal and gravity railroad, and the mines of the company were only being moderately worked. On January 1, 1864, at the solicitation of George Talbot Olyphant, president of the company, and Thomas Dickson, general superintendent, Mr. Young entered the service of that company as superintendent of the Canal Department; and in 1865 the Rondout and Weehawken Department was placed under his supervision. In 1869 Mr. Olyphant resigned as president of the company and was succeeded by Mr. Dickson. Mr. Young was then made general superintendent, and, after three years, became general manager, a position in which he served until the death of Mr. Dickson, in July, 1884, when he was elected vice-president and general manager of the company, Robert Olyphant being then, as now, the president. This responsible executive position was occupied by him until October 1, 1885, when he resigned, and Le Grand B. Cannon was made vice-president, and his son, Horace G. Young, general manager.

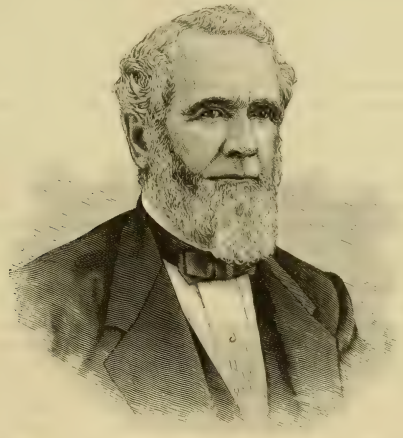
Besides his connection with the affairs of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, Mr. Young has sustained a very intimate relation to the general development and improvement of the locality in which he so early made his home. In 1863 he purchased nearly ten thousand acres of land a few miles north of Honesdale, including the tannery property at Tanner's Falls, which he still owns. He is the president of the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad, having succeeded James H. Ramsay, and vice-president of the Cherry Valley and Susquehanna Railroad, and of the Schenectady and Waynesburg road, both under lease to the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company. He has been president of the Honesdale National Bank for several years past. He is a man of strong convictions, positive in his nature, of rare executive ability and of sterling integrity. It is not improper to say that the rapid development and successful manipulation of the affairs of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, in this section, is due to his broad and comprehensive management, and is the result of his conscientious and intelligent performance of his official duties. During his management the productive coal capacity of the company has been increased from eight hundred thousand tons annually to four and one-half millions, and the railway appendages of the company have all been added. By close and attentive reading and study he has acquired an education far in advance of what his school advantages afforded, and has become a thoroughly self-educated man. He entertains liberal views upon religious subjects, but supports with a free hand the schools, churches and other elevating institutions of his day, and is held in general respect and esteem by a large circle of friends. He married, January 17, 1849, Miss Mary A., daughter of Peter Cornell, of Rondout, New York, and has four children living. Of these, Cornelia Alice is the wife of George W. Barnes, now of Colorado; Horace G., by profession a civil engineer and a graduate of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute of Troy, N. Y., is the general manager of the company, and resides at Albany, N. Y.; Edwin is a graduate of Yale College, and of the Columbia College Law School, New York, and is the attorney of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, living at Albany; and Mary Augusta is the wife of Joseph B. Dickson, of New York, youngest son of the late President Dickson.



Horace G. Young, above mentioned, was appointed general manager of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company on September 30, 1885. The Honesdale Citizen, speaking of this appointment, editorially, says,—

"While there is a cordial recognition of the new official's experience and proved ability as amply vindicating this appointment, it is not without a certain element of unexpectedness, due to the contrast in years between the appointee and his predecessor. To compare a civil with a military career, it is much like the selection of the youthful Bonaparte to command the army of Italy; and it is not too much to predict that a further parallel will be found in successful results. The new general manager was born in Honesdale, January 26, 1854. After due preparation for college, he entered the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, at Troy, N. Y. There he received a thorough scientific course, and was graduated with honor. In 1879 he entered the Delaware and Hudson service as assistant to the general manager. Here, bringing to the task the scientific acquirements gained at the Polytechnic, and with the valuable counsel of the general manager in their application to the work in hand, he rapidly mastered the complicated details of railroad and canal operations. In July, 1882, he was promoted to the position of assistant general manager, and took in special charge the Northern Railroad Department. This embraced the Albany and Susquehanna road, the New York and Canada, the Rensselaer and Saratoga, the Duanesburg and Schenectady, the Utica, Clinton and Binghamton, and the Cherry Valley Branch, with upward of six hundred miles of track; and of these roads he was practically the superintendent. In this position he proved himself a thoroughly practical railroad manager, of unusual energy, judgment and administrative ability. His success in the direction of this department was fully appreciated by the Delaware and Hudson directory, and the most conclusive proof of a practical recognition of his merits is seen in his appointment to the position so long and so ably filled by his father. This confidence in his ability rests on a substantial basis, and in the brilliant career on which he has entered he has the best wishes of a host of friends."

JACOB B. FITCH, of Hawley, is one of the oldest employees of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, having been in its service forty-one years. His father, Benjamin Fitch, a native of Connecticut, served as lieutenant under General Brown, in the War of 1812, and while commanding his company at the battle of Bridgewater, was wounded in the side while bearing aloft the colors of the regiment, which ultimately caused his death in 1832, at the age of forty-five years. After peace was declared, he went to Burlington, Otsego County, N. Y., where he married Content M. Fox, whose parents had removed from the same vicinity in New England in which the Fitches resided. After his marriage he was still officially connected with the army in Connecticut, and he accompanied the army afterwards to Council Bluffs, Mo., with his family, and returned the entire way with a team, a long and tedious journey, requiring many weeks to perform. He returned finally to Sherburne, N.Y., where both himself and wife are buried. She died in 1846, leaving children,—Jacob B., subject of this sketch; Sarah A., wife of Hollis Rowland, of Sherburne; Thaddeus S., resided in Sherburne, and came to Hawley, Pa., in 1843, with his older brother, Jacob B., and now resides in Honesdale; and Sanford C. Fitch, of Rockford, Ill.

At the time of the death of his father, Jacob B. Fitch was only thirteen years of age, having been born November 22, 1818. Being the eldest of the family, and very little means of subsistence being left at his father's death, much devolved upon the mother and himself by way of providing for the support of the family. Although young in years, he possessed a resolute will and knew that industry and economy must be carefully practiced in the management of their affairs. He met the obstacles incident to straitened circumstances and earned by his own labor the money to support the family for many years. On September 23, 1841, he married Lucy (1821–68), a daughter of James and Sibyl (Curtis) Aldrich, of Sherburne, N. Y., and began keeping house, taking his mother to his own home. Jacob had during these years learned the trade of a carpenter and joiner. In 1843 he came to Wayne County, Pa., for the purpose of working at his trade; but finding an opportunity to enter the employ of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, himself and brother engaged with that company and began building locks and doing general carpenter work. After two years he was made foreman of the construction and repair department on a part of the Pennsylvania Division of the canal, and from 1846 to 1849 he was at Lackawaxen, engaged in the construction of the aqueducts at that place, and feeders of the canal. In the latter year he settled with his family at Hawley and continued in charge of the same work for the company until the death of T. H. R. Tracy, the superintendent of the Pennsylvania Division of the canal, in 1856, when Mr. Fitch was selected to fill this vacancy, and until the fall of 1884, the time of his resignation on account of ill health, a period of forty-one years since his first engagement with the company, he has been a trusted and efficient employee and official whose honor and integrity in all his business relations are beyond reproach. He has during this time erected several residences for the company, engaged in lumbering, and he erected his present residence, on the southeastern slope of the Lackawaxen, at Hawley, in 1850.

Mr. Fitch has spent an active life and sought to do his part well. His opportunities when a boy for book knowledge were very limited; yet, in after-years, he largely made up this deficiency by reading. He is a man of practical ideas, good judgment, fine physique and correct habits, and has won his way to a competence by his own personal efforts. While a young man he was fond of military life. He enlisted at the age of sixteen years in an artillery regiment; served as orderly-sergeant, adjutant and subsequently as colonel, commanding his regiment on general training-days during the old militia gatherings in Chenango County, N. Y. He has been a member of the society of the Presbyterian Church and contributed liberally to church and kindred interests.

His children are Lewis B., a member, secretary and treasurer of the Skaneateles Paper Company, at Skaneateles, N. Y.; Sila A., married, first, B. F. Martin, of Livingston County, N. Y., and after his death became the wife of Prof. L. A. Freeman, of Palmyra, N. Y., who is now superintendent of the schools of Shenandoah, Pa.

The Pennsylvania Coal Company's Gravity Railroad from Dunmore, in Lackawanna County, to Hawley, in Wayne (of which town it was the creator, just as the Delaware and Hudson Company was the cause of Honesdale's existence), was built in 1849–50 and has ever since been in active operation until superseded by the Erie and Wyoming Railroad, in the fall of 1885.

The company absorbed the powers and privileges of several other organizations before it secured strength enough to carry out the purpose of its creation and become a powerful agent in the marketing of Lackawanna coal.

Two charters, approved by the Legislature April 16, 1838, granted the authority of the State to the organization of the Washington Coal Company and the Pennsylvania Coal Company. The former was composed of citizens of Honesdale, prominent among them being William H. Dimmick, Esq., had a capital of three hundred thousand dollars and was empowered to hold two thousand acres of land in the coal basin. The other company had authority of similar character and extent, and actually commenced the mining of coal, though on a small scale, in Pittston township, and planned to reach the Delaware and Hudson Canal by a railroad at a point on the Lackawaxen. Nothing of note was accomplished for years, and the charter of the Washington Coal Company, after lying idle for nine years, was sold to William and Charles Wurts and others, of Philadelphia, in 1847.

In 1846 the movement toward connecting the mines in the vicinity of Scranton with the canal, and thus seeking the Eastern market, brought about the incorporation of the Luzerne and Wayne County Railroad Company, vested with power to build a railroad from the Lackawanna to the Lackawaxen. The act of incorporation appointed a large board of commissioners, of whom those residing in Wayne County were Richard Lancaster, Russell F. Lord, Zenas H. Russell and T. H. R. Tracy.

Before this company manifested organic life, however, its charter, as well as that of the Washington Coal Company, obtained from the Wurtses, were, under an act of April 1, 1849, merged in the Pennsylvania Coal Company, which afterwards also absorbed the rights of the Wyoming Coal Association, chartered February 15, 1851.

This company then enlarged its possessions by purchase of large tracts of land in certified Pittston township, on the Susquehanna, and in Providence and Dunmore, on the Lackawanna, and prepared to build a double-track gravity railroad from Pittston to the Lackawaxen, by way of Cobb's Gap, forty-seven miles in length.

Ground was broken for this road in 1847, but not much practical work was done until 1848, and the track was finished in May, 1850, substantially as it has since been operated, the planes and levels remaining unchanged, except in some unimportant particulars.

The mouth of Middle Creek was fixed upon as the place of touching the canal and there the thriving village of Hawley grew up as a result of the opening of this new route from the coal-fields, and in time the same enterprise which gave it origin linked it with the main line of that great trunk railroad, the Erie, and still further fostered its growth.

The railroad traverses the Moosic range at one of its most rugged and picturesque regions, and has been noted as one of the most remarkably attractive passenger routes in Pennsylvania or the Eastern States. Still, it is as a coal-shipping road that ninety-nine one-hundredths of its successfulness has been attained, and as a sufficient proof of that, stands the fact that it has paid for years dividends of twenty per cent. and sometimes even thirty per cent. upon its stock.

In 1850 it was estimated that the road carried 111,119 tons of coal, and in 1879, the amount was computed as 1,372,739 tons. Mr. John B. Smith, of Dunmore, has been engaged as master mechanic and general superintendent of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Railroad for many years, and to him is due in a large measure the practical success which it attained.

The road was abandoned in the fall of 1885, under the provisions of the contract for the building of the Erie and Wyoming Valley Railroad—a locomotive road—now in operation.

The Erie Railroad, although not actually touching with its main line the soil of Wayne County, skirts a long distance its eastern border, separated from it only by the narrow channel of the Delaware, and affords marked advantages of travel and transportation to its people. An outline of its history is therefore here given. It is interesting from the fact of its very early inception, if for no other reason. As early as 1825 (the Erie Canal having been opened in 1824) the New York Legislature directed that a survey for a "State road" should be made at public expense through the southern tier of counties from the Hudson River to Lake Erie. The unfavorable profile exhibited by the survey, which was duly made, the discordant views and interests, resulted in the abandonment of this particular project, but the subject, in a general way, continued to occupy the attention of many public-spirited and enterprising men.

After several ineffective efforts had been made, the New York and Lake Erie Railroad Company was incorporated by the Legislature on the 24th of April, 1832, with power "to construct a railroad from the city of New York, or some point near, to Lake Erie, to transport persons and property thereon and to regulate their own charges for transportation." Up to the time of the incorporation the question as to whether animal or locomotive power should be used on the contemplated railroad was an open question, vigorously argued pro and con. A road for locomotives, it was commonly conceded, must cost from twelve to fourteen thousand dollars per mile, while one for horses could be built for five or six thousand dollars per mile, and as it was a portion of the latter plan to allow individuals to use their private conveyances upon the road, it was argued that the company would be at no expense for engines, carriages, etc., should that project be adopted. Let the reader imagine for himself what the Erie Railroad would be as a toll tramway! By the time that the company was incorporated, however, something approximating to the modern locomotive railroad had been decided upon.

In the summer of 1832 a reconnoisance or preliminary examination of the country through which it was proposed to build the road was conducted under the authority of the government of the United States, by Colonel De Witt Clinton, Jr., and it resulted in presenting strong inducements for obtaining a complete and accurate instrumental survey. In 1833 one million dollars was subscribed to the capital stock, and the company organized in August of that year by the election of officers and directors. A year passed, during which the company did not receive enough from its stockholders and others to make a survey, and in 1834 the aid of the State was invoked and the Legislature passed a bill appropriating fifteen thousand dollars for that purpose. Governor Marcy appointed Benjamin Wright, Esq., to conduct the survey. During the year he and his assistants made a survey of the whole line, four hundred and eighty-three miles, and as the work was done under the authority of the State government, the report, estimates and maps of Judge Wright were deposited by him with the secretary of the commonwealth. Much had been said in the Legislature and many of the public prints to discourage the undertaking; but the results of the State survey were so favorable as to dispel all reasonable doubts as to the feasibility of the improvement, and measures were taken to advance the project. Subscriptions were stimulated to so great an extent that the capital stock of the company was increased to the handsome amount of over two million three hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars.

In 1836 the entire route was re-surveyed, a portion of the road located and work upon it commenced, but the financial stringency which began to be felt in that year, and intensified in the panic of 1837, compelled a suspension of operations until 1838. In that year the Legislature granted to the company, in aid of its construction of the road, a loan of the credit of the State for three million dollars. At the session of the Legislature in 1840 the loan bill was further amplified, and this, together with the collections on the stock subscriptions, enabled the company to vigorously prosecute the work. The first portion, a section of forty-six miles, from Piermont to Goshen, was put in operation on the 23d of September, 1841. But the following year complicated embarrassments, arising from the nature and amount of its indebtedness, made it necessary that the business of the company should be placed in the hands of assignees, and it was not until May 14, 1845, when the Legislature passed an act releasing the State claim, that the outlook again became propitious. Then the directors entered with a new feeling of confidence upon the work of resuscitating the project and presented a plan to the public which placed the work in a position to be successfully completed. In response to their appeal for assistance, the merchants and business men of New York soon subscribed the sum of three millions dollars to the capital stock. Work was recommenced and successive portions of the road were put in operation from time to time. The opening of the main line as far as Binghamton, N. Y., occurred December 27, 1848, and in the spring of 1851 (May 14th), "amid the firing of cannon that reverberated through all of the southern tier of counties, and the shouts of hundreds of thousands of the inhabitants, who lined the road at all stations," the entire route was formally opened to travel and traffic. Two trains of cars passed over the line on that memorable occasion, "bearing the President of the United States, Daniel Webster and a large and noble company of the most distinguished citizens of America as guests of the gratified and justly proud directors of the road, from the Hudson to Lake Erie."[1]

For a short distance along the Delaware, in Pike County, the main line of the Erie is upon Pennsylvania soil. For the right of building and maintaining it there the State has charged the company ten thousand dollars a year.

A trustworthy newspaper writer has given the following interesting account of the manner in which the rails for the Erie Railroad were procured and delivered along the Delaware and a great iron company thereby built up in Scranton.

"When the New York and Erie Railroad was originally built, rails made of English iron, and costing the company eighty dollars a bar, were used from New York to Otisville. In the straitened financial circumstances of the company in that day, the work must have stopped if opportunity had not offered for obtaining iron cheaper. In 1846 the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company, which had been organized at Harrison, now Scranton, in 1843, by the Scrantons, was struggling against great difficulties for success. In the first year named the Erie Company made a contract with the iron company for twelve thousand tons of iron rail for the Delaware and Susquehanna Divisions, to be made and delivered at the mouth of the Lackawaxen River during the years 1847–48. The fulfillment of this contract, against obstacles that ordinary men would have failed to conquer, gave the iron company the first step toward that great eminence and importance it now boasts, and the railroad company was saved from bankruptcy and ruin, as it was enabled to open its road to Binghamton four days ahead of the time required by law. The first fifteen hundred tons of the iron were delivered at Lackawaxen in the early part of 1847. It was carted in wagons to Archbald, Pa., and thence by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's railroad to Honesdale, and from thence to Lackawaxen by canal. The Erie agents there took charge of it and delivered it by canal at Port Jervis, and it was laid from there to Otisville. Owing to the delay the Erie was subjected to in gaining entrance into Pennsylvania at the 'Glass-House Rocks' above Port Jervis, speed in delivery of the iron was required. An arrangement was made with the iron company for the delivery of the balance of the iron at different points along the route. Hundreds of teams were put to work, and the iron was carted over the rough, hilly roads of Luzerne (now Lackawanna) and Wayne Counties to Narrowsburgh, Cochecton, Equinunk, or Lordville, Stockport, Summit, and Lanesboro'. Thus a simultaneous laying of the rails took place along the required distance, and the railroad company was saved and the iron company made."

It is a popular misapprehension that the Erie Company originally contemplated building their road through the valley of the Lackawaxen—that the valley was a part of the route first decided upon, and was abandoned because of the opposition of the people. Such is not the fact. The charter of the road originally provided that the road should be built wholly in New York, and no amendment was made to the charter until it was found necessary to build a portion of the line along the Delaware in Pennsylvania. The company asked permission to come into the State, of the Pennsylvania Legislature, in 1845. But the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company thought it was the purpose of the Erie to run a branch into the Lackawanna Valley and compete with it in the coal trade, and it further thought that the only practicable route then open was through Cobb's Gap. Under inspiration of these views, the Delaware and Hudson company, through William H. Dimmick, one of its attorneys, who was elected to the State Senate in 1844, defeated the railroad company's bill, and the managers of the company organized the Washington Coal Company (now the Pennsylvania Coal Company) and secured the route through Cobb's Gap. In 1846 the Erie renewed its application to the Pennsylvania Legislature. The Delaware and Hudson Company, having secured itself, withdrew opposition and the identical bill defeated the year before was passed.

Much of the lukewarmness of the people of the Lackawaxen, and nearly all of the opposition that was manifested by them at the time the Erie sought to come into Pennsylvania, grew out of the fact that the company did not ask to come their way. They thought that if the application was defeated, the company would be compelled to seek the route by way of the Lackawaxen, and that the Legislature of New York would at length give way on that point rather than defeat the enterprise.

The availability of the route was afterwards thoroughly considered by the Erie managers, and was twice surveyed, but while it was admitted that it would shorten the route by about seventeen miles, the consideration that the road was already built along the Upper Delaware and that it must be maintained, overweighed whatever of advantage was promised by the more direct route by Honesdale and the Lackawaxen or Dyberry. The time may come, however, when the Erie Company may feel constrained to make use of this short cut across the corner of Pennsylvania.

HONESDALE BRANCH OF THE ERIE—THE JEFFERSON RAILROAD.—In 1851 a number of the citizens of Honesdale, being desirous of obtaining railroad communication with the outer world, secured a charter for building what was with a purpose vaguely denominated the Jefferson Railroad. The authorizing act was passed by the Legislature April 28th, and appointed Earl Wheeler, Esq., Charles S. Minor, Esq., Francis B. Penniman and Benjamin B. Smith as commissioners to receive subscriptions and organize a company to be called the Jefferson Railroad Company, under the general railroad law. This chartered organization was to have the right to build a railroad from any point on the Delaware River in Pike County, by the best route through that county and the county of Wayne, and terminating in the county of Susquehanna at the New York State line. An effort to get the Erie Railroad Company to build the whole or a portion of the line failed; the Jefferson Railroad Company remained practically inert, and nothing was accomplished for more than ten years. The commissioners and the Erie Company, however, both had the proposed line surveyed.

In 1862–63 the Pennsylvania Coal Company built along the Lackawaxen from Hawley to the Delaware, connecting with the Erie at Lackawaxen Station, and leased the line to the Erie Company.

On March 18, 1863, a supplement to its charter was passed, giving the Jefferson Company the right to build a "branch"—so-called—from the Moosic summit (in Susquehanna County) to Carbondale. Work upon the line was not begun, however, until 1869, though Charles S. Minor, Esq., had in the mean time secured the right of way. The pseudo-branch was finished in 1870 by the Jefferson Company—the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company furnishing the money—and shortly after its completion the line was leased to the Erie, under a lease which is still in effect.

About 1864 the Jefferson Company raised capital and issued bonds for building along the line which they had originally contemplated, from Honesdale to Hawley, thus, making, with the road built by the Pennsylvania Coal Company, a continuous line from Honesdale to Lackawaxen, and placing the former town in direct connection with the Erie. Members of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, in individual capacity, took much of the stock. Among the people of Honesdale most prominently identified with the project at this period and later, were Judge C. P. Eldred, Samuel E. Dimmick and Zenas H. Russell.

It was not until May 6, 1867, that actual work was begun on the line, but it was then pushed forward with rapidity, and on June 23, 1868, the first locomotive run over the line and steamed proudly into the quiet town, where the first locomotive in America made its trial trip, thirty-nine years before. On July 10th, following, the first passenger train ran into Honesdale. On July 13th passenger trains (mixed with freight) began running regularly, and on November 23, 1868, trains composed entirely of passenger cars began running, and have since continued uninterruptedly, affording the people of Honesdale and the dwellers throughout the valley of the Lackawaxen excellent facilities for travel, and a close connection with the Erie to and from New York and other points.

The road upon its completion was leased to and has since been operated by the Erie Company. E. B. Hardenburgh has been for a long period the efficient conductor upon the Honesdale Branch.

No attempt has ever been made to connect, by an independent line over the Moosic range, the two railroads built under the charter of the Jefferson Company, and it is probable that none ever will be made, for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's Gravity Railroad, from Honesdale to Carbondale, is a sufficient connecting link.

CHAPTER V.

Agricultural Societies—The Farmers' Institute.[1]

THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES OF WAYNE COUNTY.—"Furius Cresinus, an emancipated Roman slave, having obtained from his small estate much larger crops than his more wealthy neighbors from their vast domains, they became so envious that they charged him with employing enchantment to attract to his grounds the products of their fields. Having been summoned by Spurius Albinus, and being fearful of condemnation, he introduced into the Forum, as the tribes prepared to vote, his robust, well-clad family, his agricultural implements, his heavy mattocks, his ingeniously constructed plows, his well-fed oxen, and then exclaimed: 'Behold, Roman citizens, my magic! But I am still unable to show you, or to bring into the market-place, my studies, my constant vigilance and my unceasing labors!' Scarcely had he finished when he was absolved by public acclamation."

Not less true is it now than when the elder Pliny put the foregoing historical incident upon record, in the early days of the Christian era, that only by study, vigilance and incessant labor can the husbandman hope to achieve the highest degree of success in the development and cultivation of the soil. This fact is so patent, and is so often demonstrated, that there is no longer any danger that exceptional prosperity will be attributed to witchcraft, or even luck. The best methods, the best seed, the best blood, the best machinery, the best exercise of brain and muscle—all these, combined with the best conditions of soil and climate, can only be expected to produce the best results and insure to the modern farmer, as to the ancient Roman slave, full granaries, thriving cattle and a well-fed family.

Out of this knowledge was developed the Agricultural Society and its kindred associations. At first they were simple conferences between neighboring tillers of the soil and keepers of flocks and herds, in which, through mutual relations of experience, the acquired knowledge of one became the property of all, whether as to the avoidance of erroneous or the adoption of correct methods. These casual and informal gatherings finally became regular and eventually provided for their perpetuation by organization under forms of written constitutions and by-laws. As the centuries passed, their unquestionable advantage to the State in general became so apparent as to lead to the passage of laws not only encouraging and fostering, but in many cases subsidizing them at the common expense.

Our own county has always pursued a wise and liberal policy in this respect, and the Keystone stands pre-eminent among the States for the intelligent and practical interest she has ever taken in the welfare of the farmer and the promotion of his interests. To what extent her beneficent laws in this direction have affected the material prosperity of Wayne County, and through what agencies they have been brought to bear, the writer has accepted the task of showing in the course of this chapter.

When Wayne County was set off from Northampton, in 1798, it was for the most part a wilderness. The primeval forest covered its hills and lined the streams which flowed through its valleys. Even as late as 1810, when the Legislature was asked to erect from its territory the county of Pike, the prayers of the petitioners cited as a reason for their request "the uninhabitable region over which they were obliged to travel" to reach the county-seat at Bethany. At intervals during the last quarter of the eighteenth century isolated families, and, in rare instances, little colonies, of squatters and settlers had quietly crept in from New England, New Jersey and the southern part of our own State, and located on the Delaware and its tributaries, but the population was still so sparse and scattered as to leave the county in a practically undeveloped state. The opening up of the lands to actual settlement, upon easy terms, through purchases from the State Land Office or large landholders, the location of the seat of justice within four miles of the territorial centre of the new county, and finally the incursion of a band of sturdy, industrious and exceptionally intelligent pioneers, naturally began to bear good and tangible fruit. By 1810 the Great Bend and Cochecton and Bethany and Dingman's Choice turnpikes were built, and in the following year the Belmont and Easton turnpike was chartered. Before that time the road from Mount Pleasant to Stockport was finished, and a few years later the Belmont and Oghquaga put in traveling condition. All of these highways played important parts in the development of the county. Some of them were thoroughfares, not only for the accommodation of local settlers, but for the use of through travelers to and from the lake country and the seaboard cities. They were the veins and arteries of the new country, through which life and business pulsated, and by which energy was taught and ambition stimulated among our people. Along their courses, and upon laterals built to connect with them, immigration settled. Little clearings developed into fine farms, houses clustered into hamlets, villages of considerable pretensions sprang into existence. For many years, however, after the erection of the county its chief industry was not that of farming. Splendid timber of nearly every variety covered its territory, and the Delaware River furnished a natural thoroughfare whereby the product of the forests could be conveniently and profitably floated to market either sawed or in the log. Incidental to the lumbering trade, or perhaps more properly regarded as branches of it, were various manufacturing enterprises. Tanneries were built wherever great bodies of hemlock bark could be easily and cheaply obtained. Pot and pearl-ash factories were started in the hardwood regions. Sugar-making from the maple was extensively carried on. Glass factories created a considerable demand for wood, and at later dates establishments for the manufacture of umbrella and parasol handles, clothespins, bed-frames, etc., have contributed no small share to the extermination of our timber as well as to the employment of our people. It has only been within the past twenty years that our county—as a whole—has made rapid progress in agriculture. During that period her advance has been as phenomenal as her previous progress was slow. There can be little doubt that while the gradual abandonment of the lumbering and tanning branches of business, from exhaustion of raw material, has so released labor and turned it into its natural channel—the cultivation of the broad acres which underlaid the forests—as to contribute largely to this result; the influence of the several agricultural societies which have from time to time existed in the county, has also been potent and beneficent in bringing to our farmers that information as to the proper treatment of lands, culture of fruits, care of stock, etc., which has insured their success and resulted in their present prosperity.

The popular impression that the present Wayne County Agricultural Society is the only organization of its kind which has ever existed within her borders is a very erroneous one. Nearly a hundred years ago a quantity of maple sugar, made in what is now Manchester township, was sent by Samuel Preston and John Hilborn to Henry Drinker, at Philadelphia. He forwarded a box of it to George Washington, and received in reply a letter in which the President wrote: "And being persuaded that considerable benefit may be derived to our country from a due prosecution of this promising object of industry (the manufacture of maple sugar), I wish every success to its cultivation which the persons concerned in it can themselves desire." Mr. Drinker, who was a large land-owner in this county, at once had a little book printed setting forth the pleasures and profits of the sugar industry, and shortly afterward set about organizing a society which was to be called "The Union Society, for promoting the manufacture of sugar from the maple tree and furthering the interests of agriculture in Pennsylvania." The society's attention, it was further set forth, should be "primarily and principally confined to that purpose and to the manufacturing of pot and pearl ashes." This society was organized in Philadelphia in 1792, and had among its trustees and shareholders not only Mr. Drinker and other large land speculators, but some of the most prominent men in the country, including the United States treasurer, two signers of the Declaration of Independence, Dr. Benjamin Rush, judges of the United States Supreme Court and others of equal note. Its capital stock was fifteen hundred dollars, which was expended for three thousand acres of land in Manchester township. Four years later it was disbanded. An inventory of its effects taken at that time will give some idea of the extent of its operations. There were on hand thirty-seven potash kettles and twelve hundred sap troughs. Thirty-eight acres of land had been cleared and three houses and a saw-mill built. The concern was solvent, but had not been sufficiently profitable to warrant its continuance, and its personal property was sold to Mr. Drinker and his agent, Mr. Preston. Notwithstanding the clause in its title pledging the association to a furtherance of the interests of agriculture, its immediate influence upon that industry was, in all probability, not very apparent. Still, as it brought large tracts of land into market, which have since become among our most profitable farms, it doubtless had an indirect bearing upon husbandry sufficient, at least, to warrant its being mentioned as the initial society of its kind in the county.

As has been said, it was along the line of the principal roads constructed through the county that the most rapid advancement in the development of farm lands was made in the first and second decades of the present century. In 1801 there were thirty houses or settlers' cabins, and fifty-four taxables in Mount Pleasant township, which then included parts of Dyberry, Preston and Clinton, which townships have also been more or less sub-divided since their erection. In 1822, owing to the opening of the thoroughfares before referred to, the number of taxables in Mount Pleasant, shorn as it had been in the mean time of more than half of its territory, was two hundred and seventeen. Increase corresponding to these figures, though perhaps not quite so rapid, had occurred in other towns, notably Canaan, Salem, Paupack and Damascus. These inhabitants occupied good farms along the turnpike centering at Mount Pleasant village and Belmont, a short distance west. Bethany, the county-seat, had become quite a thriving place, with five stores, commodious hotels and a printing office. Among the earliest settlers in the village was Solomon Moore, a young man of superior education and exceptional public spirit. He was the first postmaster and one of the first merchants of Bethany. In 1819 he was elected sheriff of the county and in 1827 prothonotary, in which office he died in 1831. While engaged in his store and discharging his duties as sheriff he was brought into contact with most of the farmers of the county, and took every occasion to impress upon them the advisability of organizing an agricultural society. He was seconded in this movement by Jacob S. Davis, then commissioners' clerk and deputy treasurer, and who afterwards became treasurer of the county. Mr. Davis came to Bethany from Paupack settlement in the early part of the century. He was an excellent carpenter and worked at his trade for some time, but the superior education he possessed and his fine social qualities, which included a good knowledge of music, soon began to assert themselves and he rapidly worked into public prominence. In November, 1822, he became the editor and co-publisher of the Republican Advocate, in which connection he remained until January, 1830, when the name of the paper was changed to the Bethany Inquirer, with his former partner, William Sasman, as editor. During Mr. Sasman's management of the Inquirer, Mr. Davis was a voluminous contributor, his writings including an interesting, though somewhat imperfect, "History of Wayne County," which ran through many numbers, and was designed for subsequent publication in book-form. Notwithstanding Mr. Davis' general popularity, he happened to have a wife with Xantippe's personal characteristics, and about 1814 or 1815 she left his bed and board. He tried hard to induce her to return, among other efforts writing her an affectionate letter, in which he promised to overlook the past, and pictured the happiness that might be in store for them. The lady with whom the absconding spouse was living testified during the divorce proceedings which followed, that Mrs. Davis, on receiving the epistle, inquired as to the indorsement placed by the grand jury on rejected bills of indictment. Being told, she simply wrote "ignoramus" on the back of the letter and returned it to her husband, whose experience in the county offices had made him very familiar with technical legal terms, and by whom the hint as to the inadvisability of pressing his suit was taken without the necessity of "a kick" to give it emphasis. Other prominent advocates of the agricultural society scheme were Sheldon Norton, father of E. K. Norton, of Clinton, and his brother, Alvah W., Judge Samuel Preston, Major Jason Torrey and Levi C. Judson, father of the author, E. Z. C. Judson, better known as "Ned Buntline." This agitation for a society was commenced in 1819, but took no practical form until after the passage of an act by the Legislature on the 20th of March, 1820, which provided that "as soon as the board of commissioners and two-thirds of the grand jury of any county in the commonwealth shall agree in writing under their respective hands that a society shall be established within the same, it shall be lawful for twenty or more inhabitants of any such county, fifteen of whom shall be practical and actual farmers, to sign an agreement promising to pay to the treasurer of said society, so long as he shall remain a member thereof, the sum of one dollar each or more, annually, for the purpose of paying rewards for promoting or increasing the culture of sugar from the maple or sugar tree, or any other substances, the extraction of salts from ashes of vegetables, the introduction of any new grain, grass or root into cultivation, the raising the greatest quantity of grain, grass or roots on any given quantity of ground, the invention of any new and useful utensils in husbandry, the raising and manufacturing of wool, hemp and flax in greater quantities or improving the value thereof, the introduction of mineral or other measures, the improvement of the breed of horses, black cattle, sheep or hogs, the making of butter or cheese in any given quantities, or any improvement in all or every of aforesaid articles, and cause such agreement to be filed in the office of the prothonotary, whereupon such society shall become a body politic and corporate in deed and in law, with rights, etc., and be entitled to have from the county treasury annually the sum of fifty dollars for every member which said county is entitled to elect to the House of Representatives."

In compliance with this law the Wayne County Agricultural Society reached the point of actual organization at Bethany, on the 17th of November, 1821. Its original members were,—

Abisha Woodward.	Thomas Schoonover.
John K. Woodward.	Elijah Dix.
Daniel Bunting.	Jason Torrey.
Levi Green.	Solomon Moore.
David Kennedy.	Jonathan Jennings.
John Mumford.	Homer Brooks.
Sheldon Norton.	Samuel Preston.
Alvah W. Norton.	Benjamin Wheeler.
L. C. Judson.	Amos Polly.
Pope Bushnell.	Oliver Hamlin.
Bethuel Jones.	James Manning.
Amzi Fuller.	Isaac Dimmick.
Eliphalet Wood.	Jacob S. Davis.
Thomas Spangenberg.

The first officers of the society were Solomon Moore, president; Jacob S. Davis, secretary; and John K. Woodward, treasurer. All of these were at the time holding important county offices. The first fair was held in Bethany, on the 12th of November, 1822, and proved to be for the times an interesting exhibition. The quaint little county town was full of people, and the taverns, at least, did a thriving business. There was no charge for admission, so there was no prospect of an overflowing treasury, but it is to be presumed that the parties interested in the enterprise cared little for that if the outcome of their movement should be a general improvement in the agricultural status of the county. The total expenditures, including premiums, were one hundred and seventy-two dollars. These were provided for by the regular contributions of members, sixty-four dollars; donations, eight dollars, and county appropriation, one hundred dollars. In order to raise even this sum, it would appear that the society must have construed the law pretty liberally. By the act of March 20, 1822, the House of Representatives was fixed at one hundred members, the ratio of apportionment at twenty-one hundred taxables, and Northampton, Wayne and Pike were to elect three members, the return judges to meet at Easton. As the entire population of Wayne County in 1822 was but little over forty-two hundred, it is clear that she could not fairly be regarded as entitled to more than one of the three members apportioned to the district, and hence to but fifty dollars of the county fund; but from the fact that the society was permitted to draw one hundred dollars annually, it seems evident that population rather than taxable inhabitants must have been made the basis of the demand. When the question of the election of officers came up in 1822, Major Jason Torrey was occupying the present A. B. Gammell property, and having recently fenced in the lot, had planted it with potatoes, which, though themselves growing finely, were badly hampered by a luxurious growth of weeds. His name was suggested for president, but the brusque Quaker, Sam. Preston, the first associate-judge of the county, protested that a man who had developed such a crop of weeds as that ought not to be at the head of an agricultural society, and Mr. Moore was re-elected.

The second fair of the society was, at the urgent request of the Mount Pleasant members, held at the public-house of Enoch C. St. John (now John Reilly's hotel), in that township, on Tuesday, November 4, 1823. The domestic exhibits were made in the school-house. Considering the condition of the county, the premium list was comprehensive and the prizes extremely liberal. Its first item reads:

"For the best stud horse, worth at a fair value not less than $250. $10.00"

From this may be inferred the general range of premiums for live-stock. There was no classification of pure bloods or grades, strains or breeds sixty years ago. There were no prizes for heifers, or lambs or poultry. Encouragement was mainly given to stallions, working oxen and steers, rams and breeding swine. What were then regarded as good yields of cereals and vegetables may readily be gleaned from the premiums offered for exceptional crops. For instance—"For the best crop of Indian corn raised on an acre, not less than 70 bushels, $6;" "For the best crop of hay on an acre, not less than three tons, $7;" "For the best half-acre of potatoes, not less than two hundred bushels, $5;" "For the best quarter acre of turnips, not less than fifty bushels, $4;" "For the best tenth-acre of carrots, not less than fifty bushels, $4;" and so on. Corresponding prizes were offered for the best acres of winter and summer wheat, rye and oats, quarter-acre of barley and half-acre of flax. The list of premiums under the head of "Domestic Manufactures" is decidedly interesting as showing the character of household work the matrons and misses of that day were engaged in. There is a noticeable absence of rewards for crochet work, crazy quilts, embroidery and kindred finery, but there is, instead, a generous recognition of the more substantial and useful products of the dainty fingers of our grandmothers. The following examples are from the list:

For the greatest quantity of grained maple sugar made at one sugar-camp.	$4.00
For the best specimen of cheese, not less than thirty pounds	2.00
For the best and most butter made from one cow in ten successive weeks.	2.00
For the best ten yards of woolen fulled cloth 4–4 wide, manufactured by one family (dressing excepted) from wool raised by the claimant.	5.00
For the best ten yards domestic casimere . . .	4.00
For the best ten yards of flannel 7–8 wide made from claimant's materials.	3.00
For the best ten yards linen sheeting 4–4 wide .	3.00
For the best ten yards of linen diaper.	2.00
For the best two pairs of woolen stockings. . .	1.00
For the best three sides sole and three sides upper leather, each	3.00
For the best pair of boots.	2.00
For the best plow	5.00
For the best machine for the dressing of flax without rotting	5.00

Twenty-five dollars were set apart for premiums for articles of peculiar merit, to be awarded at the discretion of the directors. Animals offered for premiums were required to be owned or raised within the county, and competitors were obliged to make affidavit of their ownership for six months previous to the fair, and produce proof of the ages of their respective animals. No animal having taken one premium was eligible to another at any subsequent exhibition, "except for qualities different from those for which the former prize was awarded." Competitors for premiums on implements of husbandry, and on manufactures, were required to prove, on oath, the facts relating to the fabrication of the articles exhibited, and their property in the same, and all articles of domestic manufacture (excepting the machine for dressing flax), to be entitled to premiums, must have been wholly made within the county. The directors of the society were evidently not wholly devoid of gallantry. The last clause of its rules and regulations runs as follows: "No premium will be awarded for articles that are not above mediocrity, nor to others than members of the society, who shall have paid all arrearages, females excepted."

The Mount Pleasant exhibition was hardly as satisfactory as its predecessor, and it was determined that the next fair should be held at Bethany. In the mean time it appears that the quaint objection to Major Torrey's presidency had lost its force, for the announcement of the "Third Annual Agricultural Fair, Exhibition of Domestic Manufactures and Cattle-Show, to be held in the Borough of Bethany, on Tuesday, the 2d of November, 1824," which appeared in the Republican Advocate, February, 6, 1824, is signed by Jason Torrey, president, and Sheldon Norton, secretary. John K. Woodward was still retained as treasurer.

By this time there began to be mutterings of discontent among certain property-holders at the increased taxation required to maintain the society. The times were hard and every additional mill was regarded as a burden. There were hints that the requirements of the law under which the society took its charter had not been strictly complied with. The commissioners were reluctant to sign checks for the annual grant, and Major Torrey was obliged to advance fifty dollars from his own purse, which amount was not paid him by the county for many months afterward. The remaining fifty dollars for the year 1824 was paid to Treasurer Woodward, on November 2d, the day of the fair, upon his urgent representation that the amount was needed to meet the pledges of the society. The only change made in the officers for 1825 was the election of Amzi Fuller (commissioners' counsel) to the position of treasurer, in place of Mr. Woodward. His duties were not arduous, as during that year the society was disbanded. The payment of fifty dollars to the new treasurer is the last trace of its existence that can be found on the records or evolved from the memory of "the oldest inhabitant." The money was doubtless used to cancel whatever debts the association may have had, and the well-intended scheme was allowed to die and remain buried for nearly a generation. The operation of the act under which it was organized was restricted to a period of eight years, and its provisions were repealed by limitation in 1828.

For the following nineteen years, or at least until the sumer of 1847, there appears to have been no agitation for a revival of an agricultural society within the county limits. Interest in husbandry had not died out, however, with the demise of the old association, and the local papers maintained throughout well-edited farmers' columns, to which Pope Bushnell and other prominent tillers of the soil contributed timely and instructive articles. Meanwhile the county continued to increase in population and its farm lands to augment in acreage and value. The completion of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's works brought with it a large influx of people and a consequent improvement in the market for the products of the soil. A new demand sprung up for better stock, more prolific seed, more scientific modes of culture, and finally this sentiment crystallized into a call for a meeting to consider the propriety of organizing a new society. It was held at the court-house in Honesdale, on Thursday, September 9, 1847. It was court week, and in those days the town was overflowing with people at the quarterly sessions of the County Courts, so that a well-attended meeting was assured. Farmers from all parts of the county were present, and a free interchange of views as to the expediency of forming such an association was had. The result was in favor of the movement, and a committee was appointed, with Hon. E. W. Hamlin, of Bethany, as chairman, to draft a constitution and by-laws for the government of the society, and to present them to an adjourned meeting to be held at the court-house during the December Term. Mr. Hamlin declined the position assigned him, and Pope Bushnell, of Dyberry, was substituted. He called the committee together at the Mansion House on the 6th of December, and submitted the plan for the organization and management of the society, which he had drawn up. It was adopted, and a general meeting of the friends of the scheme was held at the court-house on the following evening (Tuesday, December 7, 1847), when an organization was effected, with the following board of officers: Richard L. Seely, president; James Manning and Moses Tyler, vice-presidents; Charles P. Waller, corresponding secretary; Samuel E. Dimmick, recording secretary; Stephen D. Ward, treasurer; E. W. Hamlin, Richard Lancaster, James Mumford, Paul S. Preston, Daniel Blandin, Lucius Collins, Zenas H. Russell, John McIntosh and James R. Dickson, managers. It is interesting, as showing the exceptionally high standing of the officers thus chosen, to note that Colonel Seely and Mr. Russell were, respectively, for many years presidents of the Honesdale Bank; Messrs. Manning, Tyler, Preston, Mumford and Dickson, associate judges; Mr. Waller, president judge of the Wayne and Pike District; Mr. Dimmick, attorney-general of the State; Messrs. Lancaster, Preston, Collins and McIntosh, sheriffs; Mr. Ward, cashier of the Honesdale Bank; and Mr. Blandin, collector of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company.

The constitution of the society provided that semi-annual meetings should be held on the first Monday in May and the third Wednesday in October, at the last of which dates the annual fair should be held. At a meeting of the executive committee, held on the 9th of February, 1848, an address to the farmers of the county was agreed upon, to be published in connection with the announcement of the first fair, the time for which was fixed for Wednesday, October 18th. It was stated in the advertisement, that on the day of the exhibition the society would meet at the court-house at two P.M., at which time addresses might be expected and the business of the association would be transacted. The objects of the society were set forth in rather high-sounding terms, as follows:

"The advancement of agriculture, the mechanic arts, horticulture and domestic and rural economy in Wayne County." There appears to have been a noticeable backwardness on the part of farmers to take hold of the enterprise with the enthusiasm which the executive committee anticipated, and their disappointment found expression as follows: . . .

"It is not an organization designed for the exclusive benefit of those originally associated with it; the object, far beyond this, is the advancement of the general good of our county. It is for this that the society works, and it is not presumed that any individual who has or who may become a member is prompted in doing so by a desire only to make private gain out of it farther than a realization of a proportion of the benefit accruing to the community of which he is a member. From the apparent backwardness of the great mass of our citizens it is feared mistaken views are entertained in reference to the society. We cannot believe it is from a want of a proper public spirit. It is not the individuals in most cases who obtain the premiums for the best horse, or cow, or crop that receive the greatest benefits from the operations of the society. It is often at great expense that animals of superior blood are introduced, yet the community shares the advantage ultimately. He who produces a superior crop by a successful experiment is not more the gainer for the small premium the society offers than the community around him, who thereby acquire a knowledge of the process without the trouble and risk of making the experiment. Immediate and exclusive personal interest, or dollars and cents considerations, are not in accordance with the spirit and object of the society."

The first semi-annual meeting was held on Monday evening, May 8, 1848. The board of managers then submitted a statement of the affairs of the society, from which it appeared to be in a flourishing condition and with sufficient means provided to insure the financial success of the first exhibition. The precise figures were: Life members, 12; yearly members, 59,—total, 71. Amount paid into the treasury of the society since its organization, $174; disbursements, $18.89; balance in the treasury, $155.11. The cost of membership was one dollar per year. The payment of ten dollars into the treasury secured a life membership, and twenty-five dollars constituted the donor a "patron" of the society. The Hon. William Jessup, who was then the presiding judge of this district, delivered an address to the assembled farmers, urging the practicability and importance of introducing agricultural science into common schools as a regular branch of instruction. He alluded to the wonderful discoveries which had lately been made in other departments of science, and contended that the improvements in agricultural knowledge had been equally surprising. He regarded farming as the most important of all human pursuits, as upon it all other callings, and even the existence of the race, depended. Hence he believed that the youth of the country, the great majority of whom must necessarily be engaged through life in agriculture, should be as thoroughly educated in agricultural as in other sciences.

The efforts and arguments put forth by the executive committee to awaken a general interest in the organization met with a fair degree of success. The first fair was held under somewhat discouraging circumstances, yet it was regarded as an entirely satisfactory exhibit. The day was very stormy and disagreeable, notwithstanding which the attendance of farmers from all parts of the county was quite as large as had been anticipated. Citizens of all pursuits manifested great interest in the proceedings of the day. The meeting at the court-house was highly satisfactory. Rev. Abel Barker, Pope Bushnell and C. S. Minor were the speakers. After the addresses Judge Dickson moved the appointment of a committee to select officers for the ensuing year. The committee reported the following, and their report was adopted: President, Paul S. Preston; Vice-Presidents, James Mumford and Ezekiel G. Wood; Corresponding Secretary, Charles P. Waller; Recording Secretary, Samuel E. Dimmick; Treasurer, S. D. Ward; Managers, Zenas H. Russell, Alexander Calder, George Goodrich, J. P. Darling, Pope Bushnell, Oliver Stevenson and Daniel M. Eno. Among the prize-winners at this fair was Hon. Pope Bushnell, of Dyberry, who took the first premium on spring wheat, his yield being twenty-three and a half bushels to the acre. In his statement as to the cultivation of the crop, Mr. Bushnell gave the following interesting particulars: "The land was originally timbered with beech and maple, which was full of brush. Burnt in the spring of 1818 and corn grown that year among the logs. In the spring of 1819 the ground was cleared of logs and sowed with spring rye. In the fall of the same year it was harrowed and sowed with winter rye. In the spring of 1821 a plough was for the first time used on my farm. The land was ploughed and planted with corn. Since that time it has been every year planted and cropped with wheat and corn, and has never failed of producing a good crop." At a meeting of the society held at the court-house on the 12th of December following, Mr. Bushnell was made its president in place of Mr. Preston, who declined the honor tendered him. Judge Jessup delivered an interesting address, the result of which was the adoption of measures looking to the organization of farmers' clubs throughout the county. The second annual fair, held on the 17th of October, 1849, was well attended, despite the inevitable storm which prevailed. The show-grounds for live-stock, around the court-house, were at an early hour well occupied by a creditable display of animals of improved quality. The court-room gave satisfactory evidence of the interest awakened among the ladies in the success of the exhibition. In the artistic department Judge Seely, then Master Henry M. Seely; chief clerk of the Patent-Office, Colonel F. A. Seely, then Frank Seely, and others who have since filled prominent positions here and elsewhere, were among the successful competitors. The new board of officers elected were E. W. Hamlin, president; Lucius Collins and P. W. Lerch, vice-presidents; Thomas H. R. Tracy, W. R. McLaury, John Torrey, Aaron Loomis, Henry Welch, Amory Prescott, Oliver Stevenson, Sylvester E. North and Thomas Clark, managers. The old secretaries and treasurer were retained. The exercises in the court-room included addresses by Messrs. Bushnell and Welch, which were well written and were listened to with marked attention.

The next meeting of the society was held at the treasurer's office, February 9, 1850. It was addressed by Rev. George D. Miles, of Wilkes-Barre, Judge N. B. Eldred, Alexander Calder and Pope Bushnell. Mr. Miles dwelt upon the moral influence of agriculture on society, and showed that the prosperity of communities was in direct ratio to the advancement of agriculture. Judge Eldred introduced in his remarks comments on the diligence of the agriculturists of Dauphin, Cumberland and other central counties, and expressed the opinion that if the farmers of Wayne would use the same care, their farms would produce equal, if not superior, crops. Mr. Calder drew a comparison between the farmer and the lumberman, showing the superior independence of the former. Mr. Bushnell contrasted the condition of the American farmer with the husbandman of Europe. An executive committee was appointed, with Judge Tracy as chairman. The committee met at the treasurer's office on the 24th of September, and perfected arrangements for the third fair, fixing the time at October 16, 1850. The court-house and adjoining yard was determined upon as the place for the exhibition, and it was decided that an admission fee of "one shilling" should be charged all except members and ladies. A large committee was appointed to solicit subscriptions in aid of the society, and an auctioneer selected to sell all articles exhibited which the owners were willing to dispose of. The fair was held at the appointed time, and was somewhat of an improvement on its predecessors. Among the premiums awarded was one for a set of artificial teeth to Dr. Otis Avery, "having a newly-invented hinge in the room of the awkward fixture heretofore in use, and an air chamber on a new and improved principle, warranted by the depositor." Dr. Avery also received favorable notice for a sample of gold foil manufactured by himself. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Hamlin, the president, and Pope Bushnell, Esq. The following officers were chosen for the ensuing year: President, Hon. N. B. Eldred; Vice-Presidents, Virgil Grenell, Dr. E. T. Losey; Corresponding Secretary, Pope Bushnell; Recording Secretary, Oliver Stevenson; Treasurer, S. D. Ward, with a full board of managers. Mr. Hamlin's address was so eloquent and instructive, it was requested for publication by a committee of the leading citizens of the county, and it appeared in the Wayne County Herald of October 31, 1850.

On the 21st of January, 1851, the Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society was organized at Harrisburg. A convention for the purpose was held in that city, and Hon. George W. Woodward, a native of this county, and one of the most prominent citizens of the State, was made its chairman. Delegates were present from nearly all of the counties of the commonwealth. A constitution was adopted, and a memorial to the Legislature prepared, asking for a charter. On the appointment of the permanent officers of the society, Mr. Woodward was made honorary vice-president. The first member of the organization to represent our present senatorial district was the Hon. William Jessup, of Montrose, formerly our president judge. The next meeting of the Wayne County Society, held May 6, 1851, was an important one. Judge N. B. Eldred occupied the chair and delivered an appropriate address in exposition of the object of the meeting, stating that it was for the purpose of taking steps to secure to the society the benefits of the law passed at the last session of the Legislature relative to County Agricultural Associations. By this law, which is still in force, county societies are authorized to receive annually from the county commissioners a sum equal to the yearly contributions of their members, not to exceed one hundred dollars. Steps were also taken to make the society an auxiliary to the State organization. The president was authorized and directed to appoint a committee of one in each township in the county to induce farmers and others to become members of the local organization, which he proceeded to do forthwith. During the evening Hon. George W. Woodward addressed the meeting. He gave an interesting account of the state of agriculture in Pennsylvania, alluded to the efforts of great minds then being made to strip the science of its drudgery, and spoke of the great good to be derived from the formation of the State Agricultural Society, provided county associations, and farmers generally acted in concert with it. After the address Judges Tracy, McLaury and Mumford were appointed a committee to make arrangements for constituting the Wayne County Agricultural and Mechanic Arts Society an auxiliary to the State Association.

As an experiment, and to satisfy the clamor of a number of farmers who had come to the conclusion that Honesdale was being unwarrantably favored, the next exhibition of the Wayne County Society was held at Waymart, ten miles from the county-seat, October 15, 1851. The usual premiums were awarded. At the meeting of the executive committee the constitution was so amended as to permit the annual fair to be held one week later for the future. The society was addressed by the president, Hon. N. B. Eldred, and Pope Bushnell, Esq. William R. Stone was chosen president for the ensuing year; Gabriel Howell and Henry Welch, vice-presidents; Samuel E. Dimmick, corresponding secretary; and Jackson Woodward, recording secretary. S. D. Ward was retained as treasurer. But little change was made in the board of managers. The attendance at the fair was rather meagre, and the executive board determined upon Honesdale as the place for the next exhibition. At a subsequent meeting the fair was fixed for Wednesday, October 20, 1852. It was largely attended, and the display of stock and other articles was unusually fine. Among the premiums awarded was one for a sewing-machine, invented and exhibited by Dr. Otis Avery, which was described in the report as "very ingenious." It is worthy of remark that the doctor subsequently sold his invention, and on the 12th of May, 1854, sailed for England with the purchaser and his financial agent (a Mr. North), in order to introduce the machine in that country; the impression prevailing then that the extended preparations in progress for a general European war would create a demand for soldiers' clothing and bring the invention into immediate requisition. Under the provisions of the new law, before referred to, the society received this year one hundred and forty-one dollars from the county treasury. The May meetings of the association having been discontinued, the date for the next fair was fixed at this time. The first Wednesday in October, 1853 (the 5th), was decided upon, and a committee was appointed to procure a tent for the use of the society, the accommodations afforded by the court-house being regarded as inadequate. Oliver Stevenson, then sheriff, was chosen president for the ensuing year; Russell F. Lord and Virgil Grenell, vice-presidents; Abraham Swart, corresponding secretary; E. B. Burnham, recording secretary; and S. D. Ward, treasurer. Abiram Winton was continued as general agent. Mr. Swart declined the office tendered him, and Marshal Wheeler was substituted as corresponding secretary. His report of the fair of 1853 was very full and interesting, bristling with practical hints and sensible strictures upon the shortcomings of the judges in the several departments. His report concludes as follows: "All together the last has been the best fair ever held in the County. It is, however, earnestly hoped that next October will beat this. The hints given to certain committees have all been made for the good of the Society, and free from any ill will. Will they be taken and acted upon? If 'yes' be the answer, then we shall soon have fairs in this County not to be equaled in the State."

The officers selected for 1854 were C. P. Waller, president; Z. H. Russell and Virgil Grenell, vice-presidents; Marshall Wheeler, corresponding secretary; and E. O. Hamlin, recording secretary. During the December Term of court, 1853, a large meeting, called under the auspices of the society, was held at the court-house. It was addressed by Judges James M. Porter and William Jessup.

The fair of 1854 was held October 4th. It was a very satisfactory exhibition, and the attendance was unusually large. At one o'clock in the afternoon the regular business meeting of the society was held. It was addressed by E. F. Stewart, Esq., of Easton, Pa., and J. W. Fowler, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Edward O. Hamlin was appointed a committee to draw up and publish an address to the citizens of Wayne County on the importance of the Agricultural Society to them, and William H. Dimmick was invited to deliver the annual address in 1855. The following officers were chosen for the coming year: President, Captain Aaron Flower; Vice-Presidents, Hon. N. B. Eldred and Samuel Allen; Corresponding Secretary, E. O. Hamlin; Treasurer and General Agent, Abiram Winton; Managers, George G. Waller, W. R.

Stone, John Carr, Platt Darling and Gabriel Howell. In submitting his report the secretary, Hon. E. O. Hamlin, took occasion to compliment Miles L. Tracy, Thomas J. Ham, William H. Ham, Jason Torrey, Robert N. Torrey and William Henry Stone for services both on the day of the fair, and also in preparing the proceedings for publication.

The exhibition for 1855 was held on Wednesday, October 17th. The day was unusually fine and the attendance very large. Among the more notable premiums awarded was one to Mrs. Sarah Benjamin, aged one hundred and ten years, for the best specimen of tow cloth and yarn. The president, Captain Flower, was unable to be present, and Samuel Allen, one of the vice-presidents, acted in his place. The following officers were chosen for the ensuing year: President, Thomas H. R. Tracy; Vice-President, C. P. Waller and Gabriel Howell; Corresponding Secretary, Charles Avery; Recording Secretary, Wm. H. Ham; Treasurer, Elkanah Patmor; Managers, G. G. Waller, P. W. Lerch, Henry Bishop, Lucius Collins and Abiram Winton. It was decided that the fair for 1856 should be held two days instead of one; but it so fell out that no exhibition was held at all. One of the provisions of the by-laws of the society was that the sum total of the premiums offered in any one year should not exceed three-fourths of the money in the treasury. When the time arrived for advertising the premium list for 1856 the treasurer reported that he had been unable to secure the balance in the hands of his predecessor, and that hence there was nothing in the exchequer available for the purposes of the society. The new board of officers made several attempts to secure a settlement with the derelict agent, but without success, and they were finally obliged to abandon the idea of a fair. The annual meeting was held, however, on the 17th of October at the office of the president, C. P. Waller, and committees were appointed in every township and borough in the county to secure subscriptions in aid of the society. A new list of officers was elected, as follows: President, L. L. Deming; Vice-Presidents, Myron Jakway and Jacob L. Keen; Corresponding Secretary, Charles Avery; Recording Secretary, William H. Ham; Managers, P. W. Lerch, Henry Bishop, Lucius Collins and Abiram Winton. The date for the next fair was fixed for the first Wednesday and Thursday in October, 1857.

But the society had received its death-blow. When the subscription committee tried to reawaken an interest in the association, with a view to a resumption of the annual fairs, they were met with expressions of distrust in the management and a general fire of adverse criticism which soon drove them from the field. The extreme stringency of the money market also had a depressing effect upon the effort to raise funds by voluntary subscriptions. The panic of 1857 was one of the most disastrous in the history of the country, and Wayne County suffered her full share of the trouble. The reports of the agents of the society were of such a discouraging nature as to completely dishearten the board of managers, and before the time appointed for the eighth exhibition the project had been totally abandoned. While the society was in existence it accomplished much good for the stock-raisers and farmers of Wayne. Its officers, as a rule, were selected from among the very best citizens of the county. It awakened a commendable spirit of competition among our husbandmen, and the strife to obtain the best seeds and the purest bloods became general. Its collapse just in the period of its greatest usefulness was an event to be sincerely deplored.

Of the present Agricultural Society of Wayne County, although it has had an uninterrupted and successful history of a quarter of a century, neither the limits of this article will permit nor do the necessities of the case require so detailed an account as has been given of its predecessors. Its inception may be traced to an editorial article which appeared in the Wayne County Herald of October 31, 1861, in which, after dwelling at considerable length upon the benefits to be derived from such institutions, the writer (who was afterwards for twenty-two years secretary of the society) says,—

"... We suggest that the Agricultural and Mechanic Arts Association of this County, which, for some reason, was allowed to go down some years since, be revived, in order that these evidences of improvement may be brought more plainly into public notice, and our agriculturists stimulated to still greater efforts to make their business profitable. Several leading farmers with whom we have conversed express their readiness to take hold of the matter, and there is no reason why it should not be done at once. Officers might be elected this fall, and all other necessary steps taken to insure a successful, beneficial and creditable fair next year. Let us hear from our farmer friends in the back townships, and if the suggestion meets with general approval, we are ready to lend our influence to get the institution fairly started at the earliest possible day."

The next issue of the paper contained a formal call for a meeting of those favorable to the resuscitation of the Wayne County Agricultural and Mechanic Arts Society, at the court-house in Honesdale, on Monday evening, December 2, 1861, when such measures would be taken to that end as should seem advisable. The call was signed by A. Flower, E. R. Jones, E. H. Clark, Wm. F. Wood, C. P. Haller, H. R. Stone, Wm. Hartwell and Thomas Ham. Of those public-spirited men, only W. F. Wood and E. R. Jones are now living. The meeting was held pursuant to the call and was attended by a large number of the leading farmers of the county. Hon. E. W. Hamlin, of Bethany, was called to the chair. The vice-presidents were E. R. Jones and Chauncey Deming, and C. P. Tallman, now a respected octogenarian, of Preston, was chosen secretary. Its deliberation resulted in a determination to organize a new society rather than to resuscitate the old one, and a committee of five, consisting of Samuel Allen, C. P. Waller, Ephraim Pulis, A. Flower and E. W. Hamlin, was appointed to draw up a constitution and by-laws for the government of the proposed association. An auxiliary committee of one was selected in each township, to cooperate with the central committee in furthering the success of the movement.

On the 1st of January, 1862, the committee (Wm. H. Ham having been added thereto) met at the Allen House, and, after consultation, appointed Mr. Ham a sub-committee to prepare a charter for the society. On the 15th another meeting was held at the Allen House, when the committee reported a constitution drawn up in full and signed by fifty-two of the leading citizens of the county as corporators. It was adopted and ordered to be presented to the court for confirmation. February 24, 1862, the charter having been granted, the corporators met at the Allen House and organized the first board of officers, agreeably to its provisions, as follows: President, Hon. E. W. Hamlin; Vice-President, P. W. Lerch; Secretary, Wm. H. Ham; Treasurer, S. D. Ward. The constitution provided for a managing board of fifteen directors, the terms of five of whom should expire every year, and the vacancies thus created be filled by an annual election. The first board of directors was elected and classified as follows:

For one year—S. K. Vail, E. H. Clark, A. K. Hoxie, E. K. Norton, William Hartwell.

For two years—E. W. Hamlin, Sam'l Allen, E. R. Jones, P. W. Lerch, Orrin Lester.

For three years—A. Flower, C. P. Waller, Ephraim Pulis, W. H. Ham, A. B. Walker.

The stock of the society was placed at five dollars per share, and committees were appointed in the several townships to secure subscriptions for the same. Subsequently Nelson D. Allen was made general agent of the society for the sale of its stock, and a large proportion of the three hundred and fifty shares disposed of during the first six months were sold by him.

March 13, 1862, the board of directors met at the Allen House and adopted by-laws for the government of the society. At this meeting a committee was appointed to locate a favorable site for exhibition grounds, and receive proposals for the sale or rent of same. The work imposed upon this committee proved to be important and arduous. It eventually involved not only the selection of suitable grounds for the annual fairs, but the inclosing of the same, the construction of a half-mile track for trials of speed, the erection of convenient and commodious buildings for exhibition purposes, officers' rooms, etc. They worked with a will, however, and by the time fixed for the first exhibition, had everything fairly in readiness. The grounds selected comprise twenty-two acres and eighteen and one-half perches of level bottom land, situate about midway between Bethany and Honesdale, on the Dingman's Choice turnpike, and a mile and a half from the corporation limits of the county seat. It is a beautiful spot in the summer and autumn. On either side rise high hills covered with dense forests, which, at the usual season for the holding of the exhibitions present a combination of colors of the most charming description. Skirting the grounds on the east is the sparkling Dyberry Creek, which, joining the west branch at Honesdale, forms the Lackawaxen. Looking south, the graceful spires of the Honesdale churches are seen towering toward the sky. On the north the roads branch, one winding up the picturesque valley of the Dyberry, and the other climbing the steep hills to Bethany. At their junction, on an elevated plateau, commanding a full view of the grounds, is situate the hostelry of Martin K. Kimble, which was the lifelong residence of his father, the original owner of the tract, and one of the sturdy pioneers of Wayne.

The society at first leased the grounds for a term of five years, at a rental of seventy-five dollars per year, with the privilege of purchase at any date within that period, at the price of eighty dollars per acre. Having occupied it under the lease from April, 1862, to April, 1867, the society bought it outright on the 17th of April, 1867, paying to Messrs. E. B. and G. W. Kimble, the owners, $1769.25, agreeably to the terms of the contract. The fence inclosing the tract was built under contract by William F. Wood, and cost seven hundred and fifty dollars. The buildings, sheds, stalls, etc., were erected at various times, at an aggregate expense of about three thousand dollars. It was the intention of the directors to procure a tent for use at the first fair, and through the agency of Judge Dickson, then living in Philadelphia, a large second-hand canvas was purchased of the old circus firm of Gardner & Hemmings, for which one hundred and seventy-five dollars was paid, but which, unfortunately, did not reach Honesdale until after the exhibition. It was used at several subsequent fairs, and found very convenient, but finally becoming tattered and dilapidated in appearance, passed into the hands of the junk dealer. The grounds presented an animated appearance during the summer and fall of 1862. There was much to be done to put them in order, and many stockholders of the society and friends of the movement turned in with a will to do it. "Frolics" were frequent, the refreshments for which were generously prepared by the ladies, and the best of spirits constantly prevailed. A grand picnic within the inclosure wound up the series of gatherings which had accomplished so much. It was a most enjoyable party, and was regarded as a happy augury for the future of the society.

The first fair was held on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, October 7, 8 and 9, 1862. The weather throughout was delightful and the attendance quite as large as could have been expected, taking into consideration the state of the country, then in the midst of civil war. The exhibition itself was entirely satisfactory. A notable incident connected with this fair is worthy of record here. As the date fixed for the exhibition approached, it was discovered that, owing to the advance in the market value of gold and silver coin, the great bulk of specie had disappeared from circulation, and that, even if a sufficient amount of it could be obtained for the use of the ticket-agents in making change at the gates, the very considerable premium at which it was held would make its use in exchange for bills an expensive luxury. In this emergency the secretary bethought him of a plan to meet the difficulty. He caused a large number of tickets to be printed "good for 5 cents," "good for 10 cents," and so on. These, signed by the secretary, were used freely during the fair, and found to be a great convenience. These cards were the pioneer "shin-plasters," which subsequently came into such general circulation during and subsequent to the war. After the exhibition the society had several hundreds of dollars, face value, of them printed on bank-note paper, and, until they were finally all redeemed, they passed current among the merchants and tradesmen of this section.

During the first year of the society's existence the extraordinary outlays required for buildings, track, tent, premiums, etc., were so much in excess of the income from sales of stock and receipts at the annual fairs, it was found necessary to provide the needful funds by loans. These were readily obtained from the bank and private individuals at the ordinary rate of interest. One of the first to accommodate the society in this direction was the venerable widow of Judge Nathaniel B. Eldred, of Bethany, who furnished the board of directors with one thousand dollars and allowed it to remain in their hands for several years. The cash required for the purchase of the grounds was mainly raised by subscription at the time. Directors E. W. Hamlin, E. G. Wood, Richard Henwood and C. P. Waller canvassed Honesdale for that purpose and secured eight hundred dollars within two days. Smaller amounts were obtained in the same manner in outlying townships. The soliciting committees were named on the 14th of March, 1867, and by the 1st of April the required cash was in the treasurer's hands. At this time it first appears to have occurred to the managers of the society that they were entitled, under the State law, to an annual appropriation of one hundred dollars from the county treasury. The point being suggested, Mr. Hamlin was appointed a committee to look into the matter. He reported at a subsequent meeting that he had been unable to find any such law in the statutes of Pennsylvania, and that, in answer to a communication from him on the subject, the secretary of the Monroe County Agricultural Society had written that he was not aware of the existence of such a provision in the acts of the commonwealth. The law was afterward found, however, and a formal demand for one hundred dollars per year for the seven years' existence of the society (including 1868) made upon the Board of County Commissioners. By agreement a case stated was submitted to the court as to the county's liability, and a decision rendered, Judge George R. Barrett presiding, in favor of the association. Under it the society received seven hundred dollars from the county treasury in 1868, and has been paid one hundred dollars per year from the same source ever since.

In March, 1867, a movement was inaugurated in the board of directors which finally resulted in securing a handsome yearly addition to the funds of the organization. A committee was appointed to draft an additional section to the act known as the "Susquehanna Dog Law," extending the provisions of the same to the county of Wayne, and providing that the surplus funds accruing from its enforcement should be appropriated for the benefit of the Wayne County Agricultural Society. This amendment, prepared by the late Judge Waller, was, largely through the influence of the Hon. J. Howard Beach, who was then in the legislature, and had been president of the society, passed, and received the Governor's signature. It was not until 1876, however, that the society received any direct benefit from the act. The county declining to pay over the surplus, as required by law, on the 3d of January of that year Messrs. Hamlin, Whitney and Secretary Ham were appointed a committee to look after the interests of the society in the premises. As a result of their investigation of the condition of the "dog fund," made during the annual settlement, five hundred dollars were checked from the surplus to the benefit of the association. July 28, 1877, one hundred and twenty-five dollars were so paid; December 3, 1867, six hundred dollars; January 5, 1878, six hundred dollars, and in January, 1879, three hundred dollars. The law as to the appropriation of the surplus was then changed, the school fund becoming the beneficiary. The tax on dogs was, however, so reduced in the same enactment that sufficient moneys have never since been collected to discharge the claims for sheep damages, to say nothing of the accumulation of a surplus.

In addition to the regular annual fairs of the society, which have been held in every consecutive year since 1862, the society has, from time to time, opened the grounds for trials of speed, stock sales and other purposes of interest to the farming and stock-raising community. Many public meetings have also been held at the courthouse in Honesdale, under its auspices, and farmers' clubs organized in accordance with its suggestions. It was the custom, for several years, to provide for an annual address on some agricultural topic, to be delivered on the fair grounds during the exhibitions, and a great deal of practical information was thus imparted to the thousands in attendance. Among the speakers on these occasions have been Horace Greeley, Bayard Taylor, Hon. George R. Barrett, William L. Headley and others of note. Most of the addresses were subsequently printed, either in the newspapers or in pamphlet-form, and given an extensive circulation throughout the county. In the matter of printing the society has ever pursued a liberal policy, issuing a pamphlet every year, and, by all other available means, seeking to awaken and continue the interest of the people in its success. In 1870 a somewhat extended historical sketch of the county, written by the secretary—Thomas J. Ham—was printed in connection with the society pamphlet and distributed gratuitously to every farmer in Wayne.

The annual fairs have invariably been creditable, so far as the merits of articles on exhibition were considered; but the attendance has fluctuated greatly on account of stormy weather and other unavoidable circumstances. Since its organization the financial transactions of the society have aggregated about one hundred thousand dollars.

The following table shows the officers of the society, chosen at the annual elections, from its organization in 1862 to this date (1886):

1862.—E. W. Hamlin, president; P. W. Lerch, vice-president; W. H. Ham, secretary; S. D. Ward, treasurer.

1863.—E. W. Hamlin, president; P. W. Lerch, vice-president; Isaac F. Ward, secretary; J. McIntosh, treasurer.

1864.—E. W. Hamlin, president; C. P. Waller, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1865.—E. W. Hamlin, president; C. P. Waller, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1866.—C. P. Waller, president; E. R. Jones, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1867.—E. W. Hamlin, president; E. R. Jones, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1868.—E W. Hamlin, president; E. R. Jones, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1869.—E. W. Hamlin, president; E. R. Jones, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1870.—J. H. Beach, president; E. R. Jones, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1871.—J. H. Beach, president; E. R. Jones, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1872.—Dr. Joseph Jones, president; E. W. Hamlin, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; Thos. J. Ham, treasurer.

1873.—E. W. Hamlin, president; W. N. Alberty, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; F. W. Grenell, treasurer.

1874.—E. W. Hamlin, president; W. N. Alberty, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; J. K. Jenkins, treasurer.

1875.—E. W. Hamlin, president; W. N. Alberty, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; J. K. Jenkins, treasurer.

1885.—J. Howard Beach, president; W. N. Alberty, vice-president; Thos. J. Ham, secretary; James B. Eldred, treasurer.

1886.—W. N. Alberty, president; Geo. E. Moase, vice-president; N. F. Underwood, secretary; J. M. Bauman, treasurer.

Many of those who have faithfully served the society in the capacity of directors are now in their graves. The association sustained an irreparable loss in the death of Samuel Allen, whose labors in its behalf were untiring. The minutes of the organization contain many deserved tributes to the memory of Messrs. Allen, Hamlin, Waller and others who were among its founders and active friends.

The society has a present membership of four hundred and fifty, holding eleven hundred and seventeen shares of stock.

In the opinion of the writer, the beneficial influence of this organization cannot be overestimated. It is not too much, at all events, to assume that, to the degree to which Wayne County farms and Wayne County stock are superior to those in localities with equal natural advantages, but remote from the stimulating influence of competitive exhibitions, is the Wayne County Agricultural Society to be credited for the present prosperity of our farmers.

The following statistics, taken from the census reports of 1850 and 1880, tell their own story of Wayne County's advancement during the intervening period of thirty years. We may add, that never during that time was her progress in the agricultural line so great as has been the case since 1880. This assertion will be amply corroborated by the statistics of the enumeration to be taken two years hence,—

Improved land (acres)	59,569	173,285
Number of farms	1,340	3,586
Value of farms	$2,188,166	$8,392,507
Value of farm implements and machinery	$103,046	$332,298
Number of horses	1,603	5,544
Number of mules	2	96
Number of milch cows	3,963	14,199
Number of working oxen	2,276	1,572
Number of other cattle	5,339	19,294
Number of sheep	10,963	19,543
Number of swine	3,535	7,734
Value of live-stock	$381,536	$1,150,097
Wheat raised during year (bush.)	6,177	7,114
Rye raised during year (bush.)	27,285	34,764
Corn raised during year (bush.)	50,577	171,664
Oats raised during year (bush.)	96,094	278,985
Buckwheat raised during year (bush.)	60,786	142,966
Wool (lbs.)	28,928	90,261
Potatoes (bush.)	130,338	310,792
Butter (lbs.)	391,814	1,423,753
Hay (tons)	25,380	64,616

It is estimated that not less than an average of five thousand head of cattle have been driven out of Wayne County yearly for several years past. Correspondingly large shipments are annually made to the city markets of butter, eggs, apples, potatoes, turnips, honey and other farm products.

The present officers of the Wayne County Agricultural Society are: President, W. N. Alberty; Vice-President, George E. Moase; Secretary, Hon. N. F. Underwood; treasurer, J. M. Bauman. Mr. Underwood has also for some years represented the society in the State Board of Agriculture. It is with a degree of, we hope, pardonable pride that we reproduce from the minutes of the last meeting for the election of officers, held February 22, 1886, the following resolutions. Mr. Beach having positively declined a re-election as president, and Mr. Ham having announced a similar determination as to the office of secretary, on motion of Mr. Woodmansee, it was

"Resolved, That in consideration of the efficient and faithful services in the Chair of the retiring President, J. Howard Beach, extending over a period of many years, he is entitled to the sincere thanks of this Board, and they are hereby tendered, and this action ordered to be spread upon the minutes of the Society."

And on motion of Mr. Beach it was unanimously declared that,—

"WHEREAS, Thomas J. Ham has served the Wayne County Agricultural Society as Secretary to the entire satisfaction of the Board of Directors and of all the stockholders for the last twenty-two years, therefore be it

"Resolved, That in view of the eminent fitness and ability displayed by him for the position which he has so long filled, and the faithful manner in which he has performed the duties of his office, we deeply regret that he feels constrained through personal considerations and the press of other duties to decline the re-election unanimously tendered him.

"Resolved, That a vote of thanks be hereby tendered Mr. Ham, and that this action of the Board be spread upon the minutes of this Society and furnished the County papers for publication."

It remains only to be said, in conclusion, that the society is in excellent hands, and only requires the sincere and active support of the farmers of Wayne to insure for it in the future as successful and useful a career as it has had in the past.

WAYNE COUNTY FARMERS' INSTITUTE.—The first County Farmers' Institute ever held in Wayne County, or, as is believed, in Pennsylvania, was held at Honesdale, February 1 and 2, 1883. The subject of holding such institutes had been agitated to some extent in the State Board of Agriculture for a year or two previously, and while some of the members of that body favored the idea, it was not thought best by the majority of them that the board should undertake anything in that line. N. F. Underwood, then representing the Wayne County Agricultural Society in that body, thinking that something of the sort might be done, and some good accomplished for the farming interests of the county, without outside assistance, conferred with a number of the leading and public-spirited farmers of various parts of the county, and found so many ready and willing to give the project their countenance and assistance, that it was agreed that a call should be issued, and an invitation extended to farmers and others who might feel interested, to meet at the date above-named. Among those most active in rendering assistance were E. K. Norton, of Clinton; Hon. A. B. Gammell, of Bethany; T. J. Crocker, of Damascus; J. E. Woodmansee, of Buckingham; C. E. Kilpatrick, of Preston; J. T. Stocker, of Salem; Hon. E. O. Hamlin, of Bethany; and B. B. Smith, of Honesdale. The county papers rendered valuable assistance by printing the call for the meeting gratuitously, calling attention to the same editorially and publishing full reports of the proceedings. Among the papers read were, "Fruit Culture in Wayne County," by E. K. Norton; "Thoroughbred Stock," by J. E. Woodmansee; "Dairy Interests," by C. E. Kilpatrick; "Root Crops," by A. B. Gammell; etc. Spirited discussions followed the reading of the essays, and addresses were also made by Hon. E. O. Hamlin and Professor H. B. Larrabee. County Superintendent Hon. A. B. Gammell was chosen president, and R. M. Stocker, then register and recorder of the county, was elected secretary. The attendance was much better than had been anticipated, numbering on the second day at least one hundred, and all felt that the meeting was an unqualified success.

It was resolved to hold a similar meeting in 1884, and a committee to arrange for the same was elected, as follows: N. F. Underwood, A. B. Gammell, E. K. Norton, J. Howard Beach, J. T. Stocker, P. W. Collins and J. E. Woodmansee.

The institute of 1884 met in Honesdale, in February. E. K. Norton was elected president and B. B. Smith and J. C. Birdsall, vice-presidents. C. E. Kilpatrick was chosen secretary. Essays were read as follows: "Fertilizers and Their Action," by Professor J. M. Dolph, principal of Honesdale schools; "Chemical Constituents of Plants," by Professor Henry A. Smith, of Honesdale; "Best Breeds of Sheep for Wayne County," by J. C. Birdsall, of Seeleyville; "The Grazing Lands of Wayne County," by N. F. Underwood; "Fruit Culture, Planting and Varieties," by T. J. Crocker; "How shall we prevent the ravages of the bot-fly (Estrus Bovis)?" by P. G. Goodrich, of Bethany. These and other subjects were fully discussed, and the question, "Can a farmer run in debt for a farm in Wayne County, and pay for it out of the proceeds of the same?" brought out a great variety of opinions. The attendance at this meeting was good, though not quite equal to that of 1883. Again Wayne County took the lead, by the Farmers' Institute of 1884 naming the first Monday in May, of that year, to be observed as "Arbor Day" in said county. This antedated the proclamation of Governor Pattison, who named April 17, 1885, as Arbor Day for the State, by one year, and we are gratified to be able to state that it was quite generally observed in the county, and that many hundreds of shade and ornamental trees are now growing which were planted on that day.

It was decided to hold another institute in 1885, and a committee was named to arrange for it, consisting mostly of the former committee, with Hon. A. B. Gammell as chairman. An effort was made to secure some outside lecturers. Major Alvord, of Houghton Farm, N. Y., was applied to to assist, and a day was named for the meeting. He could not come on that day, and the meeting was postponed one week, or until February 8th. Again he was unable to come, and by this time the snow had become deep, and the traveling difficult, many of the roads being blockaded with drifts. Quite a goodly number, however, managed to get to the meeting, and as none came merely out of curiosity, the meeting was not second in interest to those previously held. N. F. Underwood was chosen chairman, and D. M. Eno and A. B. Gammell, vice-presidents. Theodore Day, of Dyberry, read an essay on "The Insect Enemies of the Apple-Tree." William Stephens, of Bethany, explained his method of rutabaga culture. The subject of public roads and road-making machinery was considered at some length, and this discussion brought forth practical and profitable fruits during the present season, by leading to the introduction through the county of quite a number of improved road-working machines whereby the roads have been greatly improved, at much less cost than by the old methods. Judge Henry M. Seely, of Honesdale, delivered a very interesting address in the evening. "The Best Breed of Cows for Wayne County" was duly considered, and brought out many points of interest. Other subjects received attention, and again the first Monday in May was appointed as "Arbor Day," the date named by the Governor being too early for this latitude. A committee was again named for an institute in 1886. The Legislature of 1885, upon recommendation of the State Board of Agriculture, appropriated one thousand dollars annually for the next two years to enable the State Board to send competent assistants to these institutes upon application.

CHAPTER VI.

Educational Matters in General—The Law of 1834—Teachers' Institutes—County Superintendents[1]

THE first movement tending to the popularization of the schools was made in 1810, under the school law of the year previous. The school law of 1809 was meagre in its provisions and secured only a slight advance towards the admirable, but by no means perfect, present system of education, though it was the initial step in the direction of making the schools common,—i.e., public, free to all.

Prior to that time but a few schools existed in the county. At the beginning of the century Wayne County consisted of six sub-divisions, or townships; but it was larger then than now, and the whole of one of them (Lackawaxen) and a considerable portion of another (Palmyra) were included in territory now in [1] This chapter is in some measure based on the report of County Superintendent D. G. Allen for 1877, but is materially enlarged by the introduction of matter principally upon the County Teachers' Institutes, obtained from various other sources. For a particular account of the various individual schools the reader is referred to the several local chapters.

Pike County. It is probable that in the four townships which lay wholly within the present limits of Wayne — Buckingham, Canaan, Damascus and Mount Pleasant — and the fifth, Palmyra, largely within those limits, there were not more than five schools, or one to each township, though Canaan is known to have contained more than one in 1802. Mount Pleasant had a school as early as 1794, Damascus probably much earlier, and Salem certainly not long after. John Tyler, who taught in Mount Pleasant in the winter of 1799–1800, is said to have been the first male teacher in the county; and Mr. Woodbridge, author of the old geography, who taught in Salem in 1808 or before, was, perhaps, the first educator in the county who was the possessor of marked scholarship. Schools were opened in the various centres of settlement as fast as the number of families became sufficiently large to give them support, and by 1810 there were not far from a score of very humble places of learning in the county.

The schools were of the most primitive character. Instruction in them was usually limited to "the three R's: Reading, 'Riting and 'Rithmetic," and the latter beyond the "rule of three" was considered a wonderful achievement. The buildings were usually rude log structures, though at least one framed school-house was erected in the county by 1804, in Mount Pleasant. Many years later than that, when considerable progress had been made, the average school-house was still a most dismal and uninviting building. It was "about 16 x 24 feet and seven feet high, without paint or plaster, with clap-boards agape to catch the winds of winter, and the few 7 x 9 panes that were left were rattling from their decayed sash. The desks consisted of boards pegged up against the side of the house and the benches were made of slabs, having the exterior or round portion of the log down, supported by four straddling wooden legs, driven into auger-holes and sticking above the top of the bench like hatchet-teeth. These benches were planed on the top by the tardy process of friction. Their height was apparently determined without any reference to the size of the scholars who were to occupy them. In the majority of cases the scholars reversed the ordinary practice of standing up and sitting down. They literally sat up and stood down, their heads being higher while sitting than standing."

The schools were all supported entirely by private subscription until the law of 1809 became the opening wedge which gradually made a place in them for the poor at public expense, and eventually brought about the system of defraying by taxation the entire expenses of educating all children. The law made it obligatory upon the county commissioners to collect, through the assessors, the names of all the children whose parents were too poor to pay for their schooling. Such children were to be allowed to attend the subscription schools, the teachers were to make out their bills for tuition, stationery, etc., and when the same had been approved by the trustees of the school or three respectable citizens, they were to be presented to the commissioners and sworn to. Orders were then drawn on the county treasurer for the amount of each. Under this law the assessors in Wayne County returned twenty-seven poor children in 1810, twenty-nine in 1811 and two hundred and thirty-five in 1834, which was the last year the law was in force. The first money expended under the law was in 1811, when $34.67 was drawn by Robert Beardslee and Hannah Forbes. The entire amount drawn in the county during the operation of the law—that is about twenty-four years—was not far from two thousand dollars. The law created an unpleasant and unrepublican feeling of caste in the school and community. Many parents kept their children from school rather than to have their names entered upon the "poor list," and many children of the poor refused to go to school because of the taunts which were flung at them on the ground of their being "county scholars."

This condition of things was remedied by the law of 1834, which created the common-school system and made taxation the basis of its support. It was made optional for a township to accept or reject the provisions of this law by a vote at the regular election, and in many portions of the State the law remained therefore inoperative for many years, but to the credit of Wayne County, the law was at once adopted in all of its districts, and it is a significant fact that to-day its educational status is far ahead of that of some counties which tardily adopted the law of 1834.

Under the requirements of the law, a joint convention of the county commissioners and one delegate from each school district was called to meet at Bethany to arrange for the inauguration of the new system. The following delegates responded: Earl Wheeler, J. Monroe, Paul Preston, George Welch, Samuel Hedden, Elisha Lincoln, Truman Wheeler, Rufus Grenell, Andrew Davison, David Kimble, Oliver Hamlin, Edward Bortree, Charles Forbes and John Ball. Among other business, these commissioners and delegates levied a county tax for school purposes of $3000. The State appropriation was $407.09, making a total of $3407.09.

The following inspectors,—two from each township,—whose duty it was to inspect the schools and examine the teachers, were appointed under the provisions of the law, viz.: Rev. Joel Campbell, John Torrey, Henry Bartlett, George Wurts, Rev. Henry Curtiss, Thomas Fuller, Richard L. Seely, John Belknap, James Mumford, Jr., Peter Sherman, Warner M. Preston, Alexander Calder, George Kellam, Jacob W. Welch, Luther Appley, George S. Young, John Lincoln, Joseph Bass, Charles Wheeler, William R. Stone, Sheldon Norton, David S. West, Isaac Brown, Andrew Davison, Enos Woodward, Harvey Purdy, Jonathan Richardson, Phineas Howe, Jr., Erastus Wright, Phineas G. Goodrich, Gershom Williams, Lemuel Mallery.

The term of service of these inspectors expired the following year, and their duties then fell upon the school directors elected in accordance with the law.

In 1836 the delegate meeting was abandoned and the duties of the delegates were thereafter, as now, discharged by the directors, in whom was thus merged the powers originally possessed by commissioners, delegates and inspectors. In 1837 the State appropriation was increased to $1372. Thus gradual improvement was made in the support of the educational forces, and the schools slowly increased in the measure of their effectiveness. There is no record of a building-tax prior to 1854, and we are informed that until then school-houses were erected by private contribution.

THE COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS.—The year 1854 marked the beginning of a notable era of advancement. Not only were taxes then levied for building school-houses, but the county superintendency was created, a system of examining and granting certificates to teachers was founded, and the cause of education was enhanced by making it compulsory that schools should be kept open at least four months before receiving the benefit of the State appropriation. Besides these measures of improvement, Teachers' Institutes, presently to be treated of at length, came into existence and materially stimulated an interest in the best educational methods.

The first person on whom was conferred the honor of the responsible position of county superintendent of instruction was John F. Stoddard, who was chosen to fill the office in 1854. The salary was at that time only five hundred dollars per annum. Professor Stoddard, who was a distinguished educator, and exerted a strong influence for good on the schools of Wayne County, died near Newark, N. J., on August 6, 1873.

The subsequent holders of the office were,— 1859. S. A. Terrell.

1866. E. O. Ward.
1869. J. E. Hawker.
1877. D. G. Allen.
1878. H. B. Larrabee.
1884. J. H. Kennedy.

As soon as teachers were subjected to a uniform examination by the county superintendent, the necessity of training-schools was made evident, and to meet the demand, the Wayne County Normal School was organized in 1855, at Prompton, with L. H. Gibson as principal. This school has since been in operation nearly every year, under Superintendent S. A. Terrell, F. P. Kimble and others. There being no State Normal School in the district including Wayne (No. 4, embracing also the counties of Northampton, Carbon, Monroe, Pike and Luzerne), the community has had to look to the higher schools of the county for its teachers. The Hollisterville Normal School, the High School of Mount Pleasant and the graded schools of Honesdale have performed good service in fitting young men and women for the profession.

INSTITUTES.—Teachers' Institutes had their real inception in Wayne County in a meeting, or "association," held at Bethany, in November, 1853. It was not termed, though it was, in fact, an institute. It was announced, or called, by the following, which appeared in the Honesdale Democrat, under the heading of "Education," upon October 5, 1853:

"The Trustees of the University of Northern Pennsylvania, feeling deeply interested in the advancement of Common School as well as Academic education, and believing one of the most effectual means of securing proper attention to this subject is the establishment of Teachers' Associations for the mutual benefit and encouragement of Teachers themselves, as well as for awakening in the minds of the people generally a deeper interest in respect to the improvement of common schools and a higher respect for the teacher's profession, propose to hold such an association in the village of Bethany, to commence on the 1st of November next and continue three days. To this association they would invite all the teachers of the County and of the adjacent counties, together with all others who may feel an interest in its proceedings. . . .

"Lectures will be delivered on various literary and scientific subjects, among which we may mention the following:

"Dr. John B. McMunn, of Middletown, N. Y., on English Grammar.

"Charles W. Sanders, A.M., of New York, on Reading and Elocution.

"Mr. Edward Brooks, on Botany and Vocal Music.

"D. Jerome Jones, A.B., on History.

"Prof. Justin R. Loomis, formerly of Waterville College, on Geology and Philosophy. . . .

"There will also be lectures on Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and the Art of Teaching. Prof. J. F. Stoddard will devote his attention to the interests of the Association, and will lecture on such subjects as circumstances may require. During the Session there will be a discussion on the defects of the present System of Education and the best means of improving it. The establishment of a County Teachers' Association will also come up for consideration.

"P. G. GOODRICH, Secretary.

"N. B. ELDRED, Chairman.

"Bethany, Oct. 5th, 1853."

The convention was carried out practically upon the programme announced, Professor G. Stœubly and Pope Bushnell, Esq., delivering addresses in addition to those who were named in advance.

The first County Teachers' Institute, denominated as such, was held in Honesdale in October, 1854, by County Superintendent John F. Stoddard, who was assisted in making preparations for it by a committee consisting of William H. Ham, G. A. Fuller and Miles L. Tracy. Interest in the proposed meeting was awakened by the following announcement published several weeks in advance in the local newspapers:

"In view of advancing the cause of education, the teachers, school directors and friends of education of Wayne and the surrounding counties are cordially invited to attend a Teachers' Institute to be held at the court-house in the village of Honesdale, commencing on Monday at ten o'clock A.M., October 23d, and to continue until Friday afternoon of that week.

"The object of the institute is to bring the teachers together for mutual improvement and to create a regularly organized Teachers' Association which shall enkindle more of a spirit of brotherhood among the teachers themselves and tend to their advancement in science, literature and the art of teaching. Efforts will be made during the meeting to give such instruction in the branches of study usually taught in our schools as is calculated to render teachers worthy of a certificate, and to prepare them to enter the school-room with the prospect of doing their patrons more efficient service as instructors.

"A general demand is made for qualified teachers. Several applications have already been made by directors of the county for teachers whose services are worth from twenty-five to thirty dollars per month. Many of the school directors have assured me that they will be present during the latter part of the week for the purpose of engaging teachers for their winter schools. . . . and that they will permit all teachers whose schools are in session during the week of the institute to dismiss them to attend it, without loss of time.

"The recently enacted school law, which imposes many duties upon teachers, directors, etc., will receive such attention as will prove advantageous to patrons and taught.

"The gentlemen who will lecture to or address the institute, so far as we are able to announce at present, are as follows:

"Rev. E. O. Ward, F. B. Penniman, Dr. C. Cutter is expected to be present, E. Brooks, C. S. Minor, Esq.

"Lectures will be given on reading, arithmetic, geography, grammar, the art of teaching, etc. Topics pertaining to school government, school-houses, boarding round, etc., may come up for discussion, in which it is hoped all members of the Institute will participate.

"Teachers will be subject to no expense, the people of Honesdale having generously tendered their hospitality to the teachers of the county, pleased to assist in elevating the standard of education. Ladies will be accommodated with board in private families in preference to gentlemen; still we hope to be able to accommodate all, as the provision already made appears ample. . .

"WM. H. HAM, "G. A. FULLER, "M. L TRACY, } Committee of Arrangements.

"It is hoped that every individual designing to teach either in the winter or summer will not fail to attend this Institute. . .

"Your Obedient Servant,
"J. F. STODDARD,
"County Supt."

The programme was carried out substantially as announced, and the institute was generally regarded as an agreeable success, the attendance of teachers and others interested in education being very large. The secretary, William H. Ham, reported that eighty-two teachers were present. As these instructors of thirty-odd years ago were the representative ones of the county, and those from whom many of the men and women now in middle life obtained the rudiments of their education, we present the entire list, together with the location of each individual,—

Adelia Justin, Rileyville; Mary Beadle, Mary H. Robinson, Joanna C. Palmer, Maria Henshaw, Bethany; Fannie Blois, Mary J. Swartz, Olive Power, Mary H. Schoonover, Isabel Brown, Clara Hubbell, Honesdale; Charlotte Ellis, Herrick; Ellen E. Bush, Margaret Baxter, Ann C. Monroe, Mary A. Brooking, Jane T. Brooking, H. Sulina Bush, Mary Harrison, Ann E. McDermott, Lucy M. Gates, Mount Pleasant; Ann M. Dibble, Texas; Alice Morgan, Rebecca Clement, Fannie James, Sarah Jones, Salem; Delphine Adams, Lebanon; Mary M. Keen, Mary E. Rogers, Martha Munson, Waymart; Geo. B. Curtis, Edeuvale; Charles Torrey, James Reed, Bethany; W. Van Sickle, Jeremiah Regan, South Canaan; William Brown, William Orchard, William Schoonover, Honesdale; P. F. Dix, John F. Hyer, George W. Hyer, Rockdale; Rebecca L. Writer, Cherry Ridge; Eliza Surrene, Scott; Caroline Brisack, Manchester; Caroline Knight, Mary E. Knight, E. P. Knight, A. Gardner, Stockport; Sylvina Fletcher, Margaret J. Tobin, Emily V. Starbird, D. Crosby, Adeline G. Laking, Preston; Augusta Cook, Ledgedale; Ruth E. Terril, Hill Top; Mary A. Lord, Susan H. Longstreet, Hawley; Sarah J. Lee, Martha Catterson, Francis A. Bortree, Mary E. Catterson, Sterling; Julia Curtis, Edenvale; Sarah Collins, Jonesville; Harriet Sterling, Lauretta Stearns, Harriet Stearns, Irene J. Stearns, Eldred; Lucy Phelps, Dyberry; Angeline Swingle, Canaan; Martha A. Writer, Cherry Ridge; Jeremiah Rogers, Canaan; Oliver M. Fleming, Paupack; William C. Knight, Stockport; Darwin C. Cook, George T. Cook, Ledgedale; Nelson J. Gates, Mount Pleasant; Giles H. Lyon, Herrick; Maurice Bortree, East Sterling; J. K. Hotchkiss, Susquehanna Depot; Paul McAvoy, Jr., Henry Connelly, Samuel Stanton, Rockdale.

In 1855 three institutes were held, one beginning March 7th at Pleasant Mount, one March 12th at Salem, and the third September 11th at Waymart. The latter appears to have been the regular County Institute.

There was a Wayne County Teachers' Association in 1861, and a meeting of that body was held in the academy at Prompton on October 29th, remaining in session three days. There were sixty teachers present. The officers elected for the year were: President, Rev. E. O. Ward; Vice-President, Rev. D. Brundage; Secretary, W. H. Schoonover; Treasurer, James B. Torrey; Executive Committee, Charles L. Wheeler, C. W. Torrey, J. E. Hawker, Thomas Hawkey, Stephen Brundage, Ellen Tomlinson, H. Moriah Schoon, Harriet Stearns, Harriet E. Burns. In 1862 the session of this association was held at the Methodist Episcopal Church in Hawley. In 1866, upon November 12th, what was denominated as the "First Annual Institute" convened at the Presbyterian Church at Waymart. It remained in session four days, and before adjournment a "Teachers' Association" was formed, of which J. E. Hawker was elected president; William H. Lee, secretary; and A. W. Sinnock, treasurer.

All of these institutes were held without the aid of any State appropriation, but on April 19, 1867, the value of the annual meetings of teachers having become generally recognized, a legislative act was passed compelling the county school superintendent to hold one each year and providing for the appropriation of from sixty dollars to two hundred dollars for the support of each one. Under this law the institutes have flourished and become from year to year a more and more potent factor in the advancement of the common schools. The institutes of 1867, 1868 and 1869 were held respectively at Waymart, Hawley and Honesdale, with increasing interest and attendance. Each year the instruction by lectures and other means has been made more ample and practically valuable, until at present the institute is in effect an excellent normal school.

The teachers of the county in 1874, as represented at the institute of November 16th–20th, of that year, were the following:

L. A. Barnum, Honesdale; Sheldon Norton, Aldenville; E. C. Foster, Honesdale; F. A. Whitlock, Honesdale; C. M. Bushnell, Bethany; North F. Oris, Beech Pond; W. H. Dee, Honesdale; F. D. CHAPTER VII.

War of the Rebellion—Wayne County Troops—Incidents of a Local Nature.

THE first great popular demonstration in Honesdale, after the firing upon Fort Sumter, was upon April 20th, in a mass-meeting held at Liberty Hall, in pursuance of a call signed by over four hundred citizens and addressed to "all Union and Constitution-loving men, without regard to party," asking them to take action and make expression upon the existing state of affairs in the country.

F. M. Crane, Esq., was president of the meeting, R. L. Seely, W. R. McLaury, Wm. Wefferling and E. H. Clark, vice-presidents; and E. A. Ludwig and E. A. Penniman, editor of the Democrat, secretaries. Messrs. Francis B. Penniman, C. S. Minor, Esq., F. M. Crane, Esq., S. E. Dimmick, Esq., and others made short patriotic speeches. On motion of Francis B. Penniman, the chair appointed Messrs. S. E. Dimmick, A. Strong, Henry Peet, Henry Winter, William Turner, John Hennegan, John Kelly, John J. Schenck, E. E. Gilbert and G. G. Spettigue a committee to report resolutions and business for the consideration of the meeting. Following is a portion of the preamble and resolves which were returned by them and warmly indorsed by the assemblage:

"Whereas, several of the States of this confederacy have professed to Secede from the Union, and actuated by a bitter and determined hostility to the Federal Government, are seeking to destroy the same, and by a recent and unprovoked attack upon Fort Sumter have insulted our glorious flag, and involved the country in war;

"Therefore Resolved, That the people of the loyal county of Wayne, 'without distinction of party and laying aside all party ties and obligations,' are ready to stand by the Union, the Constitution and the enforcement of the Laws.

"Resolved, That in the present extraordinary emergency, which threatens the very existence of the government, it is the imperative duty of every citizen, without hesitation, to decide in favor of the Federal Government and to sustain it by his words, his example and action.

"Resolved, That as several of the citizens of Wayne County are forming themselves into military companies in response to the call of the President of the United States for volunteers, and may be called upon to do actual service in behalf of the country, and as many of them, in such case, will leave families without a protector or provider, we pledge ourselves to contribute liberally to the support of their wives and children."

* * * * * *

The remaining resolutions appointed two committees to carry out certain purposes agreed upon, as the encouragement of the military and volunteer movements and the care of enlisted men's families. These were constituted as follows:

Military Committee.—Coe F. Young, James Brown, William Wefferling, John Gerry, Jr., Samuel Allen and Henry Peet.

Finance (or Family Aid) Committee.—Z. H. Russell, William Turner, R. Henwood, J. Hennegan and Henry Winter.

This committee was instructed to solicit subscriptions to be used for the benefit of the families "of such citizens of Wayne County as should organize into volunteer companies and march to the defense of the country." S. D. Ward, cashier of the Honesdale Bank, was appointed treasurer of the military fund. Over seventeen hundred dollars was immediately subscribed. At a subsequent meeting the finance committee decided to give to each married man who should volunteer the sum of three dollars per week, for the support of their families, during the periods of their enlistment.

Upon the 25th of April the following editorial appeared in the Democrat (now the Citizen), and did much toward stirring the people to action in organizing troops:

"VOLUNTEERS.

"Our country demands that at least one volunteer company should be formed in every township and borough of this county, who are ready to march to the defense of its constitution, capitol and flag in this hour of peril.

"Fellow-citizens, will you pardon us for urging upon you immediate action? Our government must be protected—our constitution maintained—our flag defended.

"The citizens of other counties of our good old commonwealth are marching by hundreds and thousands to their country's defense. Shall old Wayne be behind? Never! Delay not! Act! Organize! Be ready, so that when old Wayne is called she will be ready to respond, as we all shall wish she had when the peril shall be over and the victory won.

"Fellow-citizens, we are contending for the Union our fathers gave, for the constitution they framed, and for the flag they bequeathed to us. Shall we permit traitor hands to destroy the one and traitor feet to trample upon the other? That question we shall have to answer, and we must answer. Shall we answer it as the men of the Revolution did? Shall we be true to the past, the present and the future? God forbid we should be otherwise. What the fathers of our land gave us, let us transmit to all who shall come after us. Right proved to be might when the foundations of our government were laid, and it will so prove in this, the hour of her peril, if we but do our duty.

"And what man will not do it? Has Wayne County one that will not? God forbid that a traitor should be found in her borders. Again permit us to press on your attention the urgent necessity of immediate action. No time is to be lost. The hour is upon us. Shall traitor hands seize our capitol, and as the chief of them, Davis, declared, carry their war and impose their government upon the States of the North?

"A large subscription of money has been made to assist and provide for the families of those who may volunteer and go from Wayne County. We ask all to contribute to it, as we know all will desire to. We ask you to do so liberally. Ask yourselves what value do you put upon your country, her government and her glorious Flag, and then give to support the families of those who are fighting for them all. Let no man withhold from volunteering for fear his family may suffer. They will be taken care of. To this we feel we can safely pledge every man in Wayne County.

"To those desiring to volunteer residing out of the borough of Honesdale, in sections where companies may not be forming, we say come here—enroll and help organize companies and drill.

"Fellow-citizens, we know you will cordially respond to the call of your country. Let every man remember it is his business to act. Act now; act promptly. Let every man but say 'The Union—it must and shall be preserved,' and it will be."

Other great meetings followed that of April 20th. One was announced to be held in the public square on May 6th, but rain prevented an out-door convocation, and the gathering was held at Liberty Hall, to which but comparatively few of the great number who had came to town, from all parts of the county, could find admittance. The hall was packed. F. M. Crane, Esq., presided, and the vice-presidents were E. W. Hamlin, of Bethany; R. R. Purdy, of Paupack; J. R. Dickson, of Clinton; W. Starbird, of Buckingham; C. Freeman, of Mount Pleasant; R. L. Seely, W. R. McLaury, William Wefferling, of Honesdale; and E. H. Clark, of Cherry Ridge. The principal speaker on this occasion was Hon. Hendrick B. Wright, of Wilkes-Barre, who was received with tremendous enthusiasm, and made a strong speech glowing with patriotic fervor.

The ladies here, as elsewhere throughout the North, took early steps toward rendering such aid as was within their power to the soldiers who had gone and were about to go to the field. The Ladies' Aid Society was organized at a meeting held at the Allen House on May 6, 1861. At that time the following officers were elected, viz.:

Moderatress, Mrs. C. S. Minor; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. D. P. Kirtland; Recording Secretary and Treasurer, Miss Caroline Torrey. Managers: Mrs. W. T. Estabrook, Mrs. J. N. Foster, Presbyterian; Mrs. R. F. Lord, Miss Russell and Miss McIntosh, Episcopal; Mrs. A. Flower, Mrs. M. B. Bennett, Methodist; Rev. Mrs. Grenell, Mrs. G. Knapp, Miss Leonard, Baptist; Mrs. Charles Petersen, Mrs. F. Schuler, Lutheran; Mrs. J. M. Brown, Miss Murray, Catholic.

A few days later the society met at the Presbyterian session-rooms and began to make up garments for the soldiers.

The society maintained its organization during the war and accomplished an immense amount of valuable work, which was appreciated by the soldiers at the front.

Monday, May 20th, was the day of the departure of the Honesdale Guards for the field, and it is one of the most memorable ones, locally, in the war period. The company formed on Front Street, accompanied by the fire companies, the Union and the Silver Cornet Bands, the Washington Guards, under Captain Kubach, the Jefferson Rifles, under Captain Teubner, and Wayne Artillery, under Captain Loeven.

During the parade through the principal streets, the procession was followed by an immense crowd. All along the route the soldiers were greeted with cheers and the waving of flags and handkerchiefs. They took the cars for Carbondale at the head of the plane, and as they moved off the artillery fired a resounding salute. They were accompanied by the firemen, and by C. S. Minor, Esq., F. M. Crane, Esq., and General Lord. At Prompton, Waymart and Carbondale, cannon belched forth noisy welcome, and rousing cheers went up from great throngs which had gathered from the country for miles back from the railroad. At Carbondale, before resuming the ride to Scranton, the guards and their friends partook of a substantial dinner, provided for them by the people, at Burnham's. The company arrived safely at Harrisburg, and on May 28th the men, with the exception of nine rejected for various causes, were sworn into the service.

The Honesdale Guards became Company C of the Thirty-fifth Regiment, or Sixth Reserves, and as such their roster appears under the regimental history in this chapter.

On the 8th of June, 1861, occurred an interesting event, in the raising and consecration of a banner on the Presbyterian Church in Honesdale—a gift from the ladies' society. Coe F. Young presided at the meeting, and the Revs. Grenell and Dunning and Mr. F. B. Penniman made addresses.

There was no regimental organization in Wayne County and not more than two companies in any one regiment. About ten full companies went from the county; there were detachments of considerable size in several other companies and a large number of scattering men, not only in Pennsylvania, but in New York and New Jersey regiments.

The following table shows the number of troops, as compared to population by townships, that had gone out up to August 28, 1862, not including the companies of Captains Mumford, Buckingham and Tallmadge:

Townships.	Troops.	Population in 1860.
Buckingham	28	1,415
Bethany	16	235
Berlin	34	1,789
Clinton	25	1,200

Texas	90	3,201
Wayne borough[1]	27	540
Total	965	32,455

The following table gives the number of Wayne County men in service, including drafted men.

The whole quota of Wayne County was 1892.

In service at the marshal's report	950
Discharged disabled	45
Died in service	32
Entered service between report and draft.	171
Number drafted	700
Total	1898

The men who entered service between the report of marshal and draft were thus distributed:

In Wayne County Cavalry	83
Captain Comfort, Co. I, 84th Pa.	54
Captain Cooley's Co.	1
Captain Schooley's Battery	4
Enlisted under Lieut Thayer	10
Enlisted in Pike Co. (Capt. Mott)	6
In service, omitted by marshal and discovered by commission	13
Total	171

In addition to the foregoing, there were at least three hundred Wayne County men among the troops credited to New York and New Jersey and some in the regular army.

The people of Honesdale (and of the county as well) were very liberal in financial "support of the war." The contributions of the citizens of the borough to the bounty fund alone amounted to over twenty thousand dollars.

The subscriptions made to the county bounty fund, made in 1862, were as follows:

It is claimed that Manchester township was the banner township of the State, in proportion to its population in sending men to the Union Army during the Rebellion—the population in 1860 was shown by the census to be nine hundred and eighty-eight. The largest vote that was ever polled in Manchester township prior to the Rebellion was one hundred and ninety-four, and from a population containing one hundred and ninety-four votes there went to the army one hundred and twenty-one men (exclusive of reinlistments). Of that number just one hundred returned and the names of the other twenty-one are upon the granite monument which was erected in the park at Honesdale to the memory of the fallen soldiers of Wayne County. Of the men that returned, many were maimed and crippled—George White and Obadiah Palmer each suffered the loss of a limb.

The turnout from some families was remarkable. Samuel Price had four sons, all went, only one returned; Righteous Reeves, four sons, all went and the father too; of the Teeples there were eight adults, six went, one was killed; J. F. Gifford had three sons, all went, one was killed; A. B. Hathaway had four sons, three went, two were killed. But exceeding all others were the Lesters. The family of Daniel Lester consisted of eleven sons, of whom two were drafted and nine entered the army by enlistment, and the old father, his hair well intermingled with gray and nearly seventy years of age, went home displeased and disappointed when the recruiting officer (Captain Parker) refused his offer to enlist. One of the boys—Warner Lester—was in the New York Thirty-eighth Regiment at the first battle of Bull Run; six other residents of Manchester township were in that battle. At that early period of the Rebellion there was but little recruiting done outside the Honesdale company, and the seven men who were in the first Bull Run fight went down the river as raftsmen, and returning by New York, enlisted there. The explanation of the draft in Manchester is that there being no recruiting station in that vicinity, the men went to other places—two went to Honesdale, some were in the New York Fiftieth, New York One Hundred and Forty-third and New York Fifty-sixth—and not taking pains to be credited to Manchester, left the town liable to draft.

Following is a list of the names of volunteers from Manchester township. The names thus marked (*) are of those killed.

Following is as complete a list as can be obtained of the soldiers from Wayne County—the full companies being given first in the order of the regiment numbers.

THIRTY-SECOND REGIMENT (THIRD RESERVES).—The Third Reserve Regiment was organized from companies recruited in Berks County, in the city of Philadelphia and Wayne County, for the three months' service, but failed of acceptance. On the 30th of May these companies rendezvoused in Philadelphia and proceeded to the camp near Easton, where a regimental organization was effected by the choice of the following officers: Horatio G. Sickle, of Philadelphia, colonel; William S. Thompson, of Bucks County, lieutenant-colonel; Richard H. Woolworth, of Philadelphia, major.

On July 22d it moved to Harrisburg, where, on the 27th, it was mustered into the United States service, and assigned to the Reserve Corps, as the Third Regiment. It was ordered to Washington and remained there until August 2d, when it was ordered to Tenallytown. General McCall, the commander of the Reserves, had directed a camp to be formed there for all the Reserves. In the organization of the corps, the Third was assigned to the Second Brigade, Brigadier-General George G. Meade. On the 9th of October the regiment moved over the Potomac and encamped near Langley. On March 10th they broke camp and marched to the vicinity of Alexandria. On April 10th the Third, with the brigade, was taken to Manassas Junction, and remained there until the 18th, when it marched to Cattell's Station, arriving opposite Fredericksburg May 2d. In the movement across the river and the occupancy of Fredericksburg and the advance towards Richmond the Third participated. The Reserves were ordered to the support of McClellan, and on the 11th arrived at White House. On the 13th the Third joined the division at Dispatch Station. The army was now lying in front of Richmond. The Reserves were the first to feel the shock of battle, and their loss in killed, wounded and missing was one hundred. At Gaines' Mill the regiment's loss in killed, wounded and missing was eighty-six. General Meade being wounded, Colonel Sickle succeeded to the command, Lieut.-Colonel Thompson commanding the regiment. In the battle which ensued at Malvern Hill the following day the Third was held in reserve, and suffered no loss. With the Army of the Potomac they re-enforced Pope in Virginia.

On the 27th they marched through Warrenton, and the following day crossed the country toward Manassas Junction. Late in the afternoon it was ascertained the enemy had removed from Manassas. The division marched to the left on Sudly Spring road, but arrived too late to participate in the battle fought by the forces of King and Stonewall Jackson. On the 29th the division was formed and moved to meet the enemy. In the engagement the Third was held as a reserve, but suffered considerable loss. In the engagement which followed, the next day, the loss of the Third was severe. On the following day occurred the bloody battle of Chantilly, resulting in a loss in killed and wounded of fifty-one men. On the 26th of October the Third, with the division, marched to Warrenton, and remained there until the 17th of November, when it removed to Brooks Station, remaining until December 8th, when they joined in the movements against Fredericksburg. In the engagement which ensued on the 13th the Third suffered a loss of one hundred and twenty-eight killed, wounded and missing. On the 8th of February it moved to the defense of Washington and was attached to the Twenty-second Army Corps. Here it remained with the rest of the Second Brigade until January, 1864, when, with the Fourth Regiment, both under the command of General Sickle, it was ordered to duty in West Virginia. Upon its return from the campaign in West Virginia it proceeded to Philadelphia, and was mustered out of service on the 17th of June, 1864.

THIRTY-FIFTH REGIMENT (SIXTH RESERVE). —The Thirty-fifth Regiment, otherwise known as the Sixth Pennsylvania Reserve, was rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, its formation being commenced in the latter part of April, 1861, and its organization being completed on the 22d of June, by the appointment of field officers, viz.: Colonel, W. Wallace Ricketts; Lieutenant-Colonel, William M. Penrose; Major, Henry J. Madill.

Being armed and equipped at the camp of organization, the regiment moved thence, on the 11th of July, to Greencastle, Pa., where it occupied a camp named Camp Biddle, remaining there until the 22d, when it was moved by railway transportation, via Baltimore, to Washington, D. C., arriving there on the 24th. At its camp, east of the Capitol, it was mustered into the United States service on the 27th, and was then marched to the camp of the Pennsylvania Reserves, at Tenallytown, Md., where it was assigned to duty in Colonel John S. McCalmont's (Third) brigade of the Reserve Division, under General George A. McCall. It remained at the Tenallytown camp until the 9th of October, when, with the other regiments of the division, it crossed the Chain Bridge into Virginia, and encamped near Langley's, at "Camp Pierpoint," where it remained more than five months, during which time (December 20th) it fought its first battle at Dranesville, on which occasion the Sixth held the centre of the line, and behaved with the utmost steadiness and gallantry. On the 10th of March, 1862, it moved with the Army of the Potomac, remained a few days at Hunter's Mills, Va.; then moved to Alexandria, Va., where it remained several days; then moved to Bailey's Cross-Roads, and thence, in turn, to Fairfax Court-House, Manassas Junction, Catlett's Station and Falmouth, where it arrived on the 3d of May, and encamped a mile north of the town.

The regiment remained encamped on the Rappahannock about six weeks, and on the 13th of June embarked for White House, on the Pamunkey River, arriving there on the 14th and becoming a part of the Army of the Potomac, under General McClellan. It was advanced from White House to Tunstall's Station, on the York River Railroad, and remained there until the disastrous battle of Gaines' Mill compelled the retirement of the Union troops and the destruction of the vast quantity of stores which had been accumulated at White House. At that place, on the 28th of June, the Sixth embarked, and, proceeding down the York River to Fortress Monroe, and thence up the James to Harrison's Landing, reached that place on the 1st of July. On the 4th it was transferred to Sinclair's (First) brigade of Seymour's (Reserve) division of the Fifth Army Corps, under General Fitz-John Porter. It remained on the Peninsula, but without being engaged in any fighting of consequence, until the night of the 14th of August, when it moved by transport down the James, and thence up the Potomac River to Acquia Creek, arriving there on the morning of the 16th, and proceeding without delay from that place, by rail, to its old post at Falmouth. On the 21st it marched from Falmouth for Kelly's Ford, on the Rappahannock, reaching its destination at dark on the 22d. Again, on the 23d, it moved on to Rappahannock Station, and on the 24th encamped near the Fauquier White Sulphur Springs, on the Warrenton road, where it remained until the 27th, when it marched with the division, and at night bivouacked at New Baltimore. The next day, on its march, it became slightly engaged with the enemy near Gainesville, but no battle resulted, and its night bivouac was made on the Alexandria turnpike.

On the 29th and 30th of August the Sixth participated gallantly in the battles in the vicinity of Groveton, Va., and the old Bull Run battle-ground, charging the Confederate position with the greatest bravery, driving the enemy and holding the ground gained. The loss of the regiment was thirty-six killed and wounded and eight missing. The regimental colors were shot from the staff in this memorable charge.

From the field of this engagement the regiment marched to a bivouac at Cut Run, where it remained on picket during the 31st and until nearly night of the 1st of September, when it took up the line of march for Fairfax Court-House. On the following day it moved to Hunter's Chapel and afterwards to Munson's Hill. On the 6th of September it moved to the Potomac, which it crossed by the Long Bridge, and, marching through Washington, proceeded, by way of various towns in Maryland, to South Mountain, where it occupied the right of the Union line in the desperate battle which was fought along its declivity from base to summit on the 14th of September.

"Night was fast approaching, and the battle raged furiously for many miles to the left. Companies A and B, Captains Ent and Roush, were ordered out to seize and hold the knob of the mountain immediately in front. They marched from the wood, passed the enemy's flank, and firing into it one volley, made straight for the mountain-top. When within one hundred yards they received the fire of the enemy, protected by a ledge of rocks which capped the summit. Immediately, Companies C, D and E were ordered to their support, and, forming to the left of the first two, the line advanced at a charge. The numbers of the enemy were largely in excess of those of the Sixth, but the five companies, restrained during the early part of the battle, dashed like a steed released from his curb against the very muzzles of their guns. The enemy, staggered by the impetuosity of the charge, yielded the first ledge of rocks, and retreated to the second, from behind which he delivered a most galling fire, causing the advance to reel under the shock and threatening its annihilation. The rebel line to the left, which had been passed by these companies, had, in the mean time, been compelled to yield to the persistent hammering of the other regiments of the Reserves. The cheers of the brigade were distinctly heard by both, when the rebels, broken in spirit by the severity of their losses and the determined front presented by the Reserves, fled down the mountain-side. These five companies had performed an important service, and driven before them in confusion the Eighth Alabama Regiment. The loss was twelve men killed, two officers and thirty-nine men wounded."[1]

From the scene of conflict at South Mountain the regiment marched to the field of Antietam, where it took part in the great battle on the 16th and 17th of September, in which, says Bates, it "sustained an aggregate loss of one hundred and thirty-two." After the battle of Antietam the Sixth Reserve remained on the north side of the Potomac, in the vicinity of Sharpsburg, about six weeks, and, on the 29th of October, crossed the river at Berlin and marched to Warrenton, Va., arriving there November 6th. On the 11th it left the Warrenton camp and moved, by way of Stafford Court-House, to Brooks' Station, on the Acquia Creek Railroad, where it remained in camp until December 8th, when it moved, with other regiments of the division, to the heights north of the Rappahannock, preparatory to crossing that stream for an assault on the strong position of the enemy at Fredericksburg. On the morning of the 12th the regiment crossed the stream on a pontoon bridge, about three miles below the town, and advanced to a position which it held through the day. In the terrific battle of the 13th it became furiously engaged, driving the enemy from his position at first, but afterwards being compelled, by overpowering numbers, to yield the ground thus gained, and to fall back to its first position. The strength of the regiment on entering this conflict was about three hundred men, of which number it sustained a loss of one hundred and two killed and wounded and nineteen missing.

After the Fredericksburg battle the regiment encamped at Belle Plain and thence moved to the former camp at Brooks' Station, where it remained until the first part of February, 1863. On the 7th of that month it was ordered to Alexandria, where it became a part of the Twenty-second Corps. Late in March it moved to Fairfax Station, and remained there until the 25th of June, when, with the other troops of the command, it moved across the Potomac, and thence northward to the field of Gettysburg, reaching that historic ground on the 2d of July, and having, in the mean time, been transferred back to the Fifth Army Corps. In the great conflict of Gettysburg it made two charges, liberating a large number of Union prisoners, recapturing an artillery piece and several caissons and sustaining a loss of twenty-four killed and wounded. After the battle it joined in the pursuit of the enemy as far as Falling Waters, Va., and afterwards encamped for a month at Rappahannock Station. Thence it moved to Culpepper Court-House and encamped near that place till October 10th, when it recrossed the Rappahannock and fought at Bristoe Station on the 12th. On the 26th of November it was again engaged with the enemy in the battle at New Hope Church, sustaining a small loss in killed and wounded. On the 5th of December it went into winter-quarters at Kettle Run.

On the opening of the campaign of 1864 the Sixth moved from its winter camp on the 29th of April, and marched to Culpepper, from which point it moved to Germania Ford, and there crossed the Rapidan on the 4th of May. On the 5th and 6th it was heavily engaged in the Wilderness, as also again on the 8th, 9th, 10th and 12th in front of Spottsylvania, losing in the series of actions seventy-seven killed and wounded and nine missing. On the 22d it was again engaged, and captured ninety-two men of the Confederate corps of A. P. Hill.

The last battle of the Sixth Reserve was fought at Bethesda Church, Va., on the 30th of June. It entered that conflict only about one hundred and fifty strong, yet sustained and repulsed a furious charge of the enemy, "captured one hundred and two prisoners, and buried seventy-two dead rebels in its immediate front."

On the following day (its term of service having expired) the regiment marched to the rear and was moved thence to Harrisburg, where it was mustered out of service in June, 1864.

FIFTY-SIXTH REGIMENT.—This regiment was organized at Camp Curtin in the fall of 1861. The men composing it were from various sections of the State, but principally from Philadelphia and the counties of Wayne, Indiana, Centre, Luzerne, Schuylkill and Susquehanna. On the 1st of September, Sullivan A. Meredith, of Philadelphia, who had been colonel of the Tenth (three months' men), was appointed colonel by Governor Curtin. Soon after J. William Hofmann and Thomas S. Martin, of Philadelphia, were appointed lieutenant-colonel and major. Subsequently Major Martin was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Eleventh Regiment, and John B. Smith, of Pittston, was appointed major. The regiment remained in Camp Curtin until spring. On March 8, 1862, the organization still being incomplete, having but eight and a half companies, left Harrisburg for Washington, reaching there on the 9th inst., remaining at Fort Albany till April 4th. From there it proceeded to Budd's Ferry, on the Lower Potomac, and was there engaged in guarding government property. On the 24th it embarked for Acquia Landing. On the 21st of May the regiment removed to Potomac Creek, to guard the railroad bridge. On the 27th it proceeded to Fredericksburg and encamped on the left bank of the Rappahannock, it was occupied in doing guard duty until the 9th of August, when it was assigned to Doubleday's brigade, McDowell's corps. On the 28th, in an engagement with the enemy, near Gainesville, in which the Fifty-sixth was engaged, Captain George Corman, of Company F, was killed, and Colonel Meredith was severely wounded. Lieutenant-colonel Hofmann immediately assumed command. On the following morning the division moved to Manassas Junction. At 2 P.M. the division moved back to within a mile of the scene of the conflict. Here a regiment was required to hold the enemy in check, while the troop deployed to the left. The Fifty-sixth was ordered forward. The regiment held its ground until ordered to retire. Captain Osborn and Lieutenant Mumford were wounded in this skirmish. It accompanied the division in the campaign in Maryland; was in the battle of the 16th and 17th of September, at Antietam, and suffered but little loss. Crossing the Potomac with the brigade, on the 30th of October, it was ordered to Union to the support of Pleasanton's cavalry, and on the 2d of November was ordered to drive the enemy from the town. In this engagement the regiment lost five killed and ten wounded. Preparations were now being made for the Fredericksburg campaign. On December 9th, the command was at Brooks' Station; on the 12th crossed the Rappahannock; on the 15th recrossed the river and encamped and remained until the 25th. On the 8th of January Lieutenant-Colonel Hofmann was promoted to colonel, Colonel Meredith to brigadier-general, and Captain George B. Osborn, captain of company A, was promoted to lieutenant-colonel. On the 28th of April the regiment moved on the Chancellorsville campaign. On the 29th an effort was made to lay a pontoon bridge across the river at Pollock's Mill. The enemy's sharpshooters rendered it impracticable, unless driven from their position. To effect this, a storming-party was sent across in boats, and the Fifty-sixth was deployed as skirmishers on the left bank of the river. In this demonstration two were killed and seven wounded. On the 25th of June the march towards Gettysburg was commenced, and the regiment reached Frederick on the 28th, arriving at Emmettsburg on the 30th. The brigade led the advance of the First Corps, and the Fifty-sixth was second in the brigade column. As the head of the column arrived at the front, the regiment was the first to get in position, and as the enemy, at the moment advancing, was within easy musket-range, it was immediately ordered to fire, which opened the battle. Brigadier-General Cutler then in command of the First Division of the First Corps, says, in a letter dated November 5, 1863, to Governor Curtin, "In noticing in the papers to-day an account of the proposition for a National Cemetery at Gettysburg, for the men who fell there in July last, I am reminded that I have neglected a duty which I owe to one of your regiments—the Fifty-sixth and its brave commander, Colonel J. William Hofmann. That regiment was in the Second Brigade of the division, and was at that time under my command. It was my fortune to be in the advance on the morning of July 1st. When we came upon the ground in front of the enemy, Colonel Hofmann's regiment got in position a moment sooner than the others, the enemy advancing in line of battle within easy range. Being a few paces in the rear of Colonel Hofmann, he turned to me and inquired, 'Is that the enemy?' My reply was, 'Yes.' Turning to his men, he commanded, 'Ready, right oblique, aim, fire!' and the battle of Gettysburg was opened. The battle on the soil of Pennsylvania was opened by her own sons, and it is just that it should become a matter of history. I desire to say to your Excellency that the Fifty-sixth is one of the very best regiments in the service, and Colonel Hofmann, without qualification, one of the best officers, brave, faithful and prompt, and I hope you will cause proper measures to be taken to give that regiment the credit, which is its due, of opening that memorable battle. Lieutenant Gordon, of Company B, and seven men were killed; Captains Burrett and Flyn and Lieutenant Hubler and sixty-one men wounded. Seventy-eight missing was the loss of the regiment at Gettysburg. In an engagement on the 2d, at Culp Hill, the regiment lost two killed and had three men wounded. During the movement on Mine Run the regiment sustained a loss of five men wounded. On the 6th of February the regiment under command of Major Jack participated in the demonstration at Raccoon Ford. On the 10th of March it was granted a veteran furlough. Returning on the 20th, then came the memorable Wilderness campaign. In the engagement at Parker's Store, May 4th, the regiment sustained heavy loss in killed, wounded and missing. It fought determinedly at Laurel Hill in connection with the Ninety-fifth New York. From the 11th of May the regiment shared the fortunes of the army until it crossed the James River, on the 16th of June. On the 17th it faced the foe near the Black Water road, and in this assault Captain Mumford fell at the head of his regiment. The regiment participated in the advance to the Hatcher's Run, on October 27th, and to Hickford, on December 5th. It destroyed several miles of the Weldon Railroad on the 8th. On the 13th the regiment encamped at Lee's Mills, where it remained until February 4, 1865. In the mean time Colonel Hofmann had been brevetted brigadier-general, and Lieutenant-Colonel Osborn colonel. On the 23d of December Colonel Osborn was discharged, his term of service having expired. Captain Burritt had been discharged on November 21st, on account of his numerous wounds, and Lieutenant Healy, on January 7th, on account of failing health. On December 26th, Major Jack was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and Lieutenant Henry A. Laycock to major. The regiment participated on the 5th and 6th of February in the second engagement at Hatcher's Run. A month later General Hofmann and Lieutenant-Colonel Jack were discharged, their terms of service having expired. Major Laycock and Captain Black were promoted to colonel and lieutenant-colonel respectively, Captain Michaels to major. The regiment shared the perils and honors of the final campaign, which brought the Army of Northern Virginia to surrender, and on the 1st of July was mustered out of service at Philadelphia.

Colonel George B. Osborn was born March 22, 1836, at Windham, Greene County, N. Y., and was the son of Gernsey and Ann Maria (Hollister) Osborn.

Deacon Nathan Osborn, born July 13, 1763, at Watertown, Conn., the paternal grandfather of the subject of our sketch, was a farmer, and with Rebecca, his wife, born February 8, 1764, at the same place, removed to Greene County, N. Y., in the year 1800. He served in the War of 1812–14, and rose from the ranks to be major of his regiment. He had thirteen children (eight sons and five daughters), of whom Gernsey Osborn was born at Windham, on January 22, 1806, and married Ann Maria Hollister (born at Rensselaerville, Albany County, N. Y., on March 13, 1809), in the town of Cairo, Greene County, N. Y., on January 22, 1828, who bore him four sons,—Bennet, Lewis A., George B., and Gernsey, Jr. On the maternal side the grandparents of Colonel Osborn were Jessie Hollister, born at Sharon, Conn., and Ann Maria, his wife, born at Salisbury, Conn. He was a farmer, and moved from Sharon to Rensselaerville, Albany County, N. Y., about the year 1805. They had four children,—one son and three daughters,—of whom Ann Maria married Gernsey Osborn, as above stated.

Geo. B. Osborn.

Gernsey Osborn was engaged in the tanning business in Greene, Sullivan and Ulster Counties, N. Y., until 1849, when he removed to Starrucca, Wayne County, Pa., where he was connected with E. P. Strong (now Judge Strong) in the tanning interest until 1862, when he sold out and removed to New York, where he now resides. His third son, George B., received a liberal education at Napanock, Ulster County, N. Y., Kingston Academy, N. Y., and West Bloomfield, N. J., and having attained his fourteenth year, began to learn the tanner's trade under his father's eyes, succeeding so well (and acquiring the reputation for energy and thoroughness which has since been so marked a part of his character) as to be made the foreman of the tannery which his father undertook with Major Strong, at Starrucca. In this capacity we find him at the breaking out of the Rebellion and until the defeat of our army at the first battle of Bull Run, upon receipt of news of which disaster he and his brother-in-law, Oliver Mumford, commenced at once to recruit a company, and entered the service on August 2, 1861, being assigned as Company A, of the Fifty-sixth Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers (Colonel S. A. Meredith), then being organized in Camp Curtin, at Harrisburg—George B. Osborn with the rank of captain, and Oliver Mumford as first lieutenant. Joining the Army of the Potomac the regiment was put in the First Brigade of the First Division of the First Army Corps, which now bears upon its tattered flags in the State Capitol at Harrisburg, the record of twenty-eight battles.

George B. Osborn served as captain of Company A over one and a half years, and was promoted to lieutenant-colonel of his regiment, the Fifty-sixth; was detailed in 1863 to act as assistant inspector-general of the division in which was his regiment, and in such capacity served on the staff of General Cutler until he was wounded, and then on the staff of General Wadsworth until the death of that accomplished officer; also on the staff of General G. K. Warren, commanding the Fifth Corps, and on the staff of General S. W. Crawford, commanding the Third Division of the Fifth Corps, where he remained until the expiration of his term of service, December 24, 1864.

He was engaged in twenty-six battles, and was made brevet-colonel United States Volunteers for bravery on the battle-field. We attach a certain interesting letter from his colonel and old commander, General Hofmann, of Philadelphia, in further tribute, and excerpt a few lines from other letters written to him. General H. A. Morrow says: "I have known you for nearly three years, and know you to be a soldier sans peur et sans reproche, a gentleman of conciliating and engaging manners, and a patriot wholly devoted to the good of the service. You carry into your retirement the respect, confidence and best wishes of every officer in this division, and to those of us who have known you longest and best you are endeared by many associations, the memory of which can perish only with our lives." General S. W. Crawford says: "I desire to assure you of the unqualified satisfaction I have ever had with you as an officer of my staff and a soldier of my command. Faithful in the office, fearless and devoted in the field, you have served the country and the cause with an unvavering fidelity to the end of your term, and you leave the service with the esteem, the confidence and the respect of your comrades, whose object, I trust, will be to emulate your example." General J. W. Hofmann writes under recent date as follows: "My Dear Colonel, I take great pleasure in recalling your services in the field during the war for the preservation of the Union, and bear testimony to the courteous and gentlemanly intercourse that existed between you and those serving with you; the satisfactory manner in which you discharged the general duties that devolved upon you as a line-officer, field-officer and staff-officer, and your gallant conduct on the many fields of battle, conspicuous among this, your cool, self-possessed conduct on the memorable field of Gettysburg, on the morning of July 1st, when we first discovered the enemy in front of Seminary Ridge. The close official and pleasant personal relations that existed between Generals Cutler, Wadsworth, Ayers and others, upon whose staff you served, justifies me in saying their verdict coincides with my own.

"I recall your presence in the long, exhausting march from Fredericksburg to Cedar Mountain, in August, 1862; in the actions at Sulphur Spring and Rappahannock; in the battles of Gainesville and Groveton and second Bull Run, August 28th, 29th and 30th; your wounding in the latter battle, and a letter received from your brother under date of September 17th, informing me that you had left home to rejoin the regiment, against the judgment of the surgeon; your arrival a few days thereafter and resuming your duties; your participation in the action at Union, Va., November 2d and 3d; in the battle of Fredericksburg; the battle of Chancellorsville; the decisive battle of Gettysburg; the march into Virginia after the Army of the Potomac had for the second time driven its adversary across the Potomac River; my detail on special duty; your assumption of the duties of commander of the regiment during the subsequent operations to October, and your detail as a staff-officer on the staff of the division commander. I recall your presence as such in the action at Mine Run; in the movement on the Rapidan, in the winter of 1863–64; throughout the campaign in the following spring, from the Rapidan down to the James River, with its almost inseparable battles of the Wilderness, Alsop's Farm, Spottsylvania, North Anna, Tolopotomoy and Bethesda Church, unsurpassed for gallantry and heroism, and the sanguinary sacrifices entailed upon the participants. And again in the assault of the enemy's works below Petersburg, June 18th, when Captain Mumford fell while gallantly leading the regiment in the assault, and in the subsequent operations incidental to the siege of Petersburg. I testify to all this with great pleasure. Renewing my acknowledgments to you for the support received from you on all occasions when you were under my command, and for the courteous manner in which you discharged the delicate duties of a staff-officer while serving upon the staff of my division commanders, I am very truly yours, J. W. Hofmann, brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers, (late colonel Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Veteran Volunteers). To Brevet-Colonel George B. Osborn, United States Volunteers, (late lieutenant-colonel Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Veteran Volunteers.")

Returning home from the war in 1865, Colonel Osborn spent a year in the oil regions near Marietta, Ohio, and another in the manufacture of hoop-skirts with his oldest brother in New York City, following that by selling goods for wholesale jobbing houses. In 1870 he removed from New York to Starrucca, and during the next three years was engaged in the mercantile business with his brother in law, W. W. Mumford, at the end of which period he became partner with Major E. P. Strong in the lumber and mercantile business, and so continued for twelve years.

In 1886 he erected a steam factory at Starrucca, for the manufacture of umbrella and parasol sticks, chair stuff, etc., in which he employs from twelve to fifteen hands steadily, and is building up a handsome business to the advantage of the county.

Colonel Osborn was married to Miss Matilda E., daughter of the late Hon. James Mumford (a sketch of whom is contained in this volume), on August 2, 1859, and has one daughter and an adopted son (child of Daniel and Hattie Cargill, both deceased).

SEVENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.—Portions of Companies G and H of this regiment were from Wayne. The Seventy-seventh was rendezvoused at Camp Wilkins, near Pittsburgh, where it was organized, under command of Colonel Frederick S. Stumbaugh, in October, 1861. On the 18th of that month it was embarked on transport steamers, and proceeded down the Ohio to Louisville, Ky., in company with the Seventy-eighth and Seventy-ninth Regiments of the Pennsylvania line, these three regiments forming a brigade, commanded by Brigadier-General James S. Negley, of Pittsburgh. From Louisville the brigade marched south along the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, and remained encamped for a considerable time at a camp called "Camp Negley," in honor of the brigade commander. While here the Seventy-seventh was detached from the brigade and assigned to the Fifth Brigade of the division commanded by General Alexander McD. McCook, the other regiments of the brigade (commanded by Brigadier-General Thomas J. Wood) being the Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Indiana and the Thirty-fourth Illinois. This brigade, with the army of General Buell, marched southward into Tennessee, and arrived at Nashville on the 2d of March, 1862. Soon afterwards the Seventy-seventh, with the other forces of General Buell, continued the southward march, moving towards a point on the Tennessee River, where the forces of General Grant and the Confederate army under General Albert Sidney Johnston were approaching each other, and where, on Sunday, the 6th of April, they joined in the great battle of Shiloh, or Pittsburgh Landing. On the evening of the 5th (the same time when the Army of the Potomac, under General McClellan, arrived in front of Yorktown) the advance of General Buell's corps reached Savannah (nine miles below Pittsburgh Landing, on the Tennessee), and bivouacked there for the night. On the following morning Buell heard the roar of the distant battle, and hurried his troops forward with all possible speed. The division of General William Nelson led the advance, and pushed on without halt until late in the afternoon, when it reached the right bank of the Tennessee, opposite the place where General Grant's hard-pressed battalions were engaged in the desperate fight, contesting every inch of ground, yet slowly retiring towards the river. When the succoring division came up opposite the scene of conflict, its brave yet rough old commander sent an aide across to report to General Grant, with this message: "Tell him," said he, "that General Nelson is here with ten thousand fighting men and no d—d cowards!" this last remark being caused by the sight of a large number of fugitives from the fight skulking behind the bluff bank of the river. "Tell General Nelson," said General Grant to the aide, "that our men seem to be doing pretty well; but we shall be glad to see him over here." The division was promptly crossed and placed in position, enabling the Union forces to hold their ground firmly against the last desperate assaults of the Confederates. During the night the gunboats in the river kept up an incessant cannonade, throwing their huge shells over the heads of the men of Grant's army and into the Confederate lines beyond. In the morning of the 7th the battle was renewed, and the Confederate forces were driven back at all points, though they held their ground most stubbornly and fought for hours with the greatest desperation. Other troops of Buell's command had arrived in the mean time, and among them the brigade in which was the Seventy-seventh Pennsylvania, which came up by steamboat from Savannah. At about nine o'clock in the morning it marched upon the field, and was immediately under fire. For six hours after its arrival the battle raged with the greatest fury. The regiment repelled a desperate assault of cavalry, and was in the front line in the final charge which drove the enemy from the field and ended the conflict.

For about a week after the battle the regiment remained on the field near Pittsburgh Landing, then moved several miles to a new camp. About four weeks later it moved with the army towards the enemy's strong position at Corinth, Miss., in the expectation of a general attack upon the works at that place; but they were occupied without resistance, the Confederates having evacuated. Upon the fall of Corinth, General Buell's army marched back to Nashville; the Seventy-seventh, with its brigade, passing the entire summer on the route, which was from Corinth up the valley of the Tennessee to Bridgeport, Ala., thence northward, by way of Stevenson, Cowan, Decherd, Manchester and Murfreesborough, to the capital. Here it had a little rest, being ordered northward on the rapid march with Buell's forces to intercept the Confederate General Bragg, who was marching on Louisville, Ky. Buell's forces arrived on the 26th of September, and on the following day the Seventy-seventh encamped in the suburbs of the city.

On the arrival of General Buell's army at Louisville, General Bragg faced his forces southward, and marched back towards Tennessee. Buell followed with his army, leaving Louisville on the 1st of October. The Seventy-seventh, moving with the left wing, passed through Stanford and Nicholsville, Ky., skirmishing with the enemy at Claysville, Lawrenceburg and other places, but not being present at the general engagement near Perryville, October 8th. It reached Nashville, Tenn., in the last part of October, and remained there and in that vicinity for two months, taking part in a minor engagement at Lavergne on the 27th of November. On the 26th of December it moved with the army towards Murfreesborough, near which town the great battle of Stone River was fought on the 31st of December and 1st and 2d of January. The Seventy-seventh was on the left of the division of General R. W. Johnson, which occupied the extreme right of the army, the position of the regiment being partly in a cedar thicket and partly in a cotton-field, with the enemy near and directly in front. In this position it lay during the night of Tuesday, December 30th. The battle was opened by Hardee's (left) corps of the Confederate army, which made a furious assault soon after daylight on the 31st, while the battery horses of Johnson's division were being taken to water. In a few minutes twenty-seven guns out of Johnson's five batteries were in the hands of the Confederates, and the three divisions of Johnson, Davis and Sheridan (comprising McCook's army corps) were in retreat in some disorder across the cotton-field towards the shelter of a cedar wood in the rear. The Seventy-seventh, with some other troops, rallied, made a counter-charge and recaptured the guns of Edgerton's battery, which, however, were soon after again taken by the enemy, and the regiment, compelled to relinquish its temporary advantage, was finally driven across the field and through the woods to the vicinity of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, where the troops were rallied and a new line established by the commanding general, Rosecrans. This line, strengthened by slight breast-works, was held through the day against repeated attacks by the enemy. Several attacks were also made on Thursday, January 1st, and the artillery fire was incessant during that day; but no very decided advantage was gained on either side. The forenoon of Friday passed in comparative quiet; but about the middle of the afternoon the Confederates attacked with great fury on the left of Rosecrans' line, gaining an advantage at first, charging across Stone River, and causing the Union troops to recoil at that point; but they rallied at once and drove the enemy back across the stream. From that time the conflict raged until after dark, resulting in the complete rout of the Confederates, who retreated through the town of Murfreesborough and along the turnpike road towards Shelbyville.

Through the entire battle of Stone River the Seventy-seventh behaved with great gallantry and steadiness, for which it was highly complimented by General Rosecrans. Soon after the battle it encamped near Murfreesborough, where it remained until the general advance of the Army of the Cumberland, June 24, 1863. In the advance a Confederate division (Cleburne's) was found in a strong position at Liberty Gap, where a heavy fight resulted on the 24th and 25th, ending in the retreat of the enemy. The Seventy-seventh was one of the charging regiments, and sustained severe loss in the engagement.

The enemy retired to a strongly-intrenched line at Tullahoma, but evacuated it on the approach of the Union army, and retreated to Bridgeport, Ala., and thence into Northern Georgia. The Union army followed in pursuit, the Seventy-seventh with its division arriving at Bridgeport, on the Tennessee River, on the 31st of August. Crossing the river, it moved to Trenton, Ga., thence up Lookout Valley to Valley Head, then across the mountain to Broomtown Valley, on the road to Rome, Ga.; but before reaching the latter place the progress of the column was arrested by the intelligence that the enemy was menacing the left of General Rosecrans' army, with the evident intention of giving battle to that part of the line (which was separated from the extreme right and more than thirty miles from it) and of making a desperate attempt to re-occupy Chattanooga; and, finally, that Longstreet's corps, having been detached from the Army of Northern Virginia, was already on the south side of the Savannah River, and moving by rail, with all possible speed, to join Bragg's army at Lafayette, Ga. Upon receipt of this intelligence the Seventy-seventh, with its division and the other commands of the Union army, moved rapidly back over the mountain and down the valley by the same route over which the advance had been made, and again crossing the mountain lower down towards the Tennessee, entered the valley known as McLemore's Cove on the 17th of September. After some fighting at that place, the Seventy-seventh, with its division, moved by way of Dug Gap, Pond Spring and Gordon's Mills, and arrived on the field of Chickamauga on Saturday, the 19th of September, and soon afterwards became hotly engaged in the great battle which was fought there on that and the following day by the Union army under General Rosecrans and the Confederate forces under Bragg, reinforced by Longstreet's corps from Virginia.

Near the close of the first day's fight at Chickamauga the regiment charged, with its brigade (Willich's), and gallantly drove the enemy in its front, but in the exultation of the moment advanced too far, and while in that exposed position, just at dark, was attacked by a heavy body of the enemy (who had been reinforced at that point). The Seventy-seventh Pennsylvania and Seventy-ninth Illinois, being in the most advanced and exposed position, fought desperately against overwhelming odds; but after a hand-to-hand struggle in the twilight gloom they were overpowered, and seventy enlisted men of the Seventy-seventh taken prisoners, as were also several of the company officers and all the field officers of the regiment, who remained prisoners till May 1, 1864. Many of the privates of the regiment who were captured in this fight died in the prison-pen of Andersonville.

The remnant of the regiment (those who escaped capture in the evening of the 19th) fought in the battle of the second day at Chickamauga under command of Captain Joseph J. Lawson, of Company C. The battle resulted in defeat to the Union army, and on Saturday night (September 20th) the Seventy-seventh, with the other commands, withdrew from the field of disaster to Rossville, Ga., and from there, on Monday night and the early morning of Tuesday, retreated to Chattanooga.

After Chickamauga the regiment saw no more of fighting during the year 1863. In October it moved from Chattanooga, crossing the Tennessee, and marching by the "Bob White road" to Jasper, Tenn., where it arrived on the 26th. Thence, crossing the Tennessee to Shellmound, it moved up the river to Whiteside's, Ga., where it remained during the winter, and where a considerable number of the men re-enlisted as veterans, and the strength of the command was largely increased by recruits from Pennsylvania.

In the spring and summer campaign of 1864 the Seventy-seventh fought at Tunnel Hill on the 7th of May, at Rocky Face Ridge on the 8th, in several minor engagements from the 9th to the 13th, at Resaca, Dallas, Ga., at New Hope Church, at Kingston, Ga., at Kenesaw Mountain (where it lost heavily in killed and wounded), and at Peach Tree Creek, July 20th. It also fought in the subsequent actions around Atlanta, including the battles of Lovejoy's Station and Jonesborough.

After the fall of Atlanta, when the Confederate army under General Hood suddenly crossed the Chattahoochee into Alabama and marched towards Nashville, with the evident intention of assaulting and capturing that city, General Sherman detached a strong force from his army at Atlanta, and placed it under command of General George H. Thomas, with orders to march in pursuit of Hood, give him battle and thwart his designs. The force was composed of the Twenty-third Corps (General Schofield) and Stanley's (Fourth) Corps, of which latter the Seventy-seventh was a part. The regiment arrived on the 3d of November at Pulaski, Tenn. About the 25th it moved to Columbia, where the enemy was found in heavy force and strongly posted. A severe engagement resulted, in which, on the 29th, the Seventy-seventh took a conspicuous part. During the following night the regiment moved to Franklin, Tenn., where it fought bravely in the great battle of the 30th, being at one time almost entirely surrounded by the enemy, but escaping from its exposed position by the exercise of the highest soldierly qualities. Again, in the great and decisive battle of Nashville, the Seventy-seventh took a prominent part in charging the Confederate works on the 15th of December, and on the following day exhibited still greater gallantry in attacking one of the enemy's strongest positions, moving forward under a most destructive fire of canister, capturing a battery and driving the Confederates in its front in utter and irretrievable rout. The loss of the regiment in this battle was heavy in killed and wounded, among the former being Lieutenant Alexander T. Baldwin, Company C.

The Confederate army, completely defeated and routed at Nashville, fled southward into Alabama. Among the Union forces which pursued was the Seventy-seventh, which marched rapidly to Huntsville, Ala., but there abandoned the pursuit and remained through the succeeding winter. About the middle of March, 1865, it marched to East Tennessee, where it was joined by five new companies. About the last of April the regiment returned to Nashville, where it was assigned to the First Brigade, First Division, Fourth Army Corps. In June it left Nashville, and passing down the Mississippi by boat to New Orleans, went into camp at Plaine Chalmette (General Jackson's old battle-ground of 1815), where it remained nearly a month; then embarked and proceeded by sea to Indianola, Texas, arriving there on the 27th of July, and immediately afterwards marching to Green Lake. Afterwards it moved to a camp near Victoria. It remained in Texas until the early part of December, 1865, when it moved to Indianola, where the men were embarked, and proceeded by sea to Philadelphia. Arriving there on the 16th of January, 1866, they were duly disbanded, and returned to their homes and the vocations of civil life.

EIGHTY-FOURTH REGIMENT (Three Years' Service.)—The Eighty-fourth Regiment was recruited under the direction of William G. Murray, in the counties of Blair, Lycoming, Clearfield, Dauphin, Columbia, Westmoreland and Wayne. The men rendezvoused at Camp Crossman, near Huntingdon, and subsequently at Camp Curtin. Recruiting commenced early in August, and in October an organization was effected by the choice of the following field officers: William G. Murray, colonel; Thomas G. MacDowell, lieutenant-colonel; Walter Barrett, major. On the 31st of December the regiment was ordered to Hancock, Maryland. Here it was armed, crossed the Potomac and proceeded to Bath, where a portion of the Thirty-ninth Illinois, with a section of artillery, Lieutenant Muhlenberg, was posted confronting the enemy. Colonel Murray, assumed command; an engagement took place and the regiment lost one man. The Eighty-fourth was posted successively during the winter at the North Branch Bridge, at the South Branch Bridge, and at Paw Paw Point, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The regiment participated in the engagement at Winchester, and on March 23d, while charging the enemy at the head of his men, Colonel Murray was struck in the forehead by a minnie ball and instantly killed. Out of two hundred and sixty of the Eighty-fourth who, went into the battle, twenty-three were killed and sixty-seven wounded. Colonel Murray, Captain Patrick Gallagher and Lieutenant Charles Reem were killed. After the battle the Eighty-fourth, under command of Major Barrett, was assigned to provost duty in the town of Berryville until May 2d, when it joined in the general advance up the valley and proceeded to Fredericksburg.

From Port Republic the division marched to Alexandria. On the 25th of June Samuel M. Bowman, of Columbia County, late major in the Fourth Illinois, was commissioned colonel, Major Barrett promoted to lieutenant-colonel and Adjutant Thomas H. Craig to major. In July the regiment joined Pope's army, and was engaged in the battle of Cedar Mountain on the 9th of August. On the 14th it joined in pursuit of the enemy to the Rapidan, and participated in the movements of the army until the regiment arrived within the defenses of Washington, and at that time had scarcely seventy men in its ranks fit for duty. In consequence of its severe losses it was ordered to light duty at Arlington Heights, where it remained until the Antietam campaign. In the mean time it had been recruited up to its full standard, Colonel Samuel M. Bowman commanding. About the middle of October it rejoined the army. In the campaign which followed, it continued in General Whipple's independent division. Under General Hooker the army was reorganized, and the Eighty-fourth constituted a part of the Second Brigade of the Third Division, Colonel Bowman commanding. In the Chancellorsville campaign, in the engagement on the 3d of May, this regiment suffered a loss of two hundred and nineteen killed, wounded and missing. Captain Jacob Peterman was killed; Captain C. G. Jackson, Lieutenants William Hays, Albert Stineman, John R. Ross, Geo. S. Good and Assistant Surgeon John S. Waggoner, severely wounded. The regiment participated in the operations of the brigade on the morning of the 4th, when General Whipple was killed. The Eighty-fourth then became a part of General Carr's brigade of the Second Corps. On June 11th Colonel Bowman was ordered to special duty, and never afterwards rejoined the regiment. Major Melton Opp had been promoted to lieutenant-colonel, Captain George Zinn to major. Upon the return of the army to Virginia the regiment was engaged at Wapping Heights on July 24th; Thoroughfare Gap on the 10th October; at Freeman's Ford on the 13th; at Bristoe Station on the 14th, and again on the 19th; at Kelly's Ford on November 7th; at Jacob's Ford on November 27th; at Locust Grove on the 28th; at Mine Run on the 30th, losing four men mortally wounded, five slightly wounded, five missing, and one officer, Lieutenant Good, captured. The regiment participated in the Wilderness campaign. On the 6th of May the fighing proved disastrous to the Eighty-fourth. Colonel Opp received a wound in the right lung, proving a mortal hurt; the loss to the regiment being severe. It participated in all the engagements in this campaign until the 31st of May. On June 14th they crossed the James River and engaged in operations of the siege of Petersburg. On the 27th of July it recrossed the James and had part in the engagement at Deep Bottom. In October the men whose term of service had expired were mustered out and the veterans and recruits were organized in a battalion of four companies. On the 13th of January it was consolidated with the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania; upon the consolidation Lieutenant-Colonel Zinn became colonel. The Fifty-seventh was finally mustered out of service on June 29, 1865.

A portion of Company I was from Wayne County. The names of the men follow:

ONE HUNDRED AND TWELFTH REGIMENT (SECOND HEAVY ARTILLERY).—Two batteries—C and E—of this regiment were chiefly from Wayne. The One Hundred and Twelfth Regiment was raised under authority granted in October, 1861, by the War Department to Charles Angeroth, of Philadelphia, to recruit a battalion (afterwards extended to a regiment) of heavy artillery. Recruiting was commenced at once, and proceeded rapidly. The regiment was organized in the early part of January, 1862, with Col. Charles Angeroth, Lieutenant-Colonel John H. Oberteuffer, and Major Wm. Candidus as its field officers.

On the 25th of February the regiment (excepting Companies D, G and H, which had previously been placed on duty at Fort Delaware, below Philadelphia) was ordered to Washington, and upon its arrival was reported to General Abner Doubleday, by whom it was assigned to duty in the fortifications north of the city. The three companies from Fort Delaware rejoined the others on the 19th of March, and for more than two years from that time the regiment remained in the Washington defenses north of the Potomac. On the 26th of March, 1864, it was transferred to the Virginia side, and placed to garrison Forts Marcy and Ethan Allen, near the Chain Bridge.[1]

On the opening of the spring campaign of 1864 the regiment was ordered to the front, and accordingly embarked at Washington on the 27th of May, and proceeded to Port Royal, on the Rappahannock River, where it arrived on the 28th. From that place it marched across the country, and joined the Eighteenth Army Corps, under General W. F. Smith, at Cold Harbor, on the 4th of June. There it was formed into three battalions in order to secure greater facility in manœuvring. These battalions, with the Eighty-ninth New York Regiment, formed the Second Brigade in the Second Division of the corps.

[1] At that time the regiment had increased by recruiting to about thirty-three hundred men, and a new regiment, designated as the Second Provisional Artillery, was formed from its surplus by order of the War Department. The new regiment was organized April 20, 1864, and was sent into the field as a part of the Ninth Corps.

Moving with the army across the James River, the regiment took its position in the lines investing the city of Petersburg, and during the months of June, July and August performed constant and severe duty in the trenches from the Appomattox River to the Jerusalem plank-road, being in that time reduced from an effective strength of eighteen hundred and thirty-six to less than nine hundred. This number was increased early in September by an accession to its ranks of about four hundred men, the remnant of the Second Provisional Artillery Regiment, which had originally been formed from its surplus strength.

On the 20th of September the regiment moved with the Army of the James across the river, and took part in the operations which resulted in the capture of Fort Harrison, and in which the First and Second Battalions sustained a loss of over two hundred in killed, wounded and prisoners.

The regiment remained in its position near Fort Harrison until the 2d of December, when it was ordered to Bermuda Hundred, its term of service being then within about a month of its close. At that place a large number of the men re-enlisted as veterans; these, with the recruits who joined, amounting to over two thousand men. The regiment, however, was not called on to do much more fighting. After the evacuation of Petersburg by the enemy it was ordered to duty in that city, and after the surrender of Lee's army the several companies of the Second were distributed through the lower counties of Virginia to maintain order, and remained on this duty till the beginning of 1866. On the 29th of January in that year it was mustered out of service at City Point, Va., and was soon after transported to Philadelphia, where its men were discharged on the 16th of February.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.—Company A, of this regiment, was recruited principally, and K partially, in Wayne County; Companies C, D and H in Clinton; G in Butler, and Company I in Bradford. The men rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, and on August 25, 1862, a regimental organization was effected. The field officers were Henry M. Bossert, colonel; Joseph B. Kiddoe, lieutenant-colonel; Charles W. Wingard, major. Soon after its organization it was ordered to Washington. On the 31st of August it was assigned to General Hancock's brigade, Seventh Division, Sixth Corps, then marching through Washington, after the defeat at Bull Run, and about to enter on the Maryland campaign. The regiment participated in the engagement at Crampton's Gap, in South Mountain. They were then ordered to Harper's Ferry, engaging in the battle of Antietam. It was then ordered to do guard duty at Camp No. 4, on the Potomac. When Stuart with his cavalry made his raid into Pennsylvania, it was sent with the brigade in pursuit. Near the close of October it was ordered to Washington. When the army reached Fredericksburg it was again ordered in the field, Colonel Bossert being placed in command of a brigade composed of his own regiment, four regiments from New Jersey and one from New York, and was charged with the guarding of the landing at Acquia Creek and the railroad leading to Fredericksburg. On January 20, 1863, it was ordered to the front. On March 14th Colonel Bossert was honorably discharged, Lieutenant-Colonel Kiddoe promoted to succeed him. It afterwards participated, under Hooker, at Chancellorsville. About the middle of May, the term of enlistment being about to expire, it was ordered to Harrisburg, and was mustered out June 1st.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIRST REGIMENT.—Seven companies of this regiment were raised in Bradford County, two in Susquehanna and one in Wayne County. On August 29, 1862, the regiment organized at Camp Curtin, with the following officers: Henry J. Madin, colonel; Guy H. Watkins, lieutenant-colonel; Israel P. Spaulding, major. The command immediately moved to Washington. About the middle of September the regiment was assigned to the First Brigade, General Robinson commanding. It joined the army in its movement to Warrenton; also with Burnside towards Fredericksburg, and participated in the engagement at the lower crossing of the Rappahannock. In the Chancellorsville campaign it followed with the brigade and shared in its perils, and in the engagement on the 3d of May it sustained a loss of two hundred and thirty-four, either killed, wounded or missing. Lieutenant-Colonel Watkins was severely wounded and fell into the enemy's hands.

On the 11th of June the regiment started on the Gettysburg campaign, and in the action on July 1st suffered a severe loss, probably greater than any regiment engaged. At the morning call one hundred and ninety-eight answered; of the number, one hundred and thirty-six were either killed, wounded or missing. The regiment participated in the fall campaign, and was engaged at Kelly Ford, Locust Grove and Mine Run, losing a number of men, Lieutenant James Vanauken being among the killed. On the 3d of May the regiment entered on the spring campaign, as a part of the Fourth Division of the Second Corps, and in the engagements at Plank-Road and Po River, from the 5th to the 18th, the losses were nine killed, ninety-eight wounded and twenty nine missing. In the general movement on the 18th at Petersburg the regiment was engaged; Lieutenant-Colonel Watkins was killed, and nine men wounded. The regiment, under the command of Major Tyler, participated in the operations upon the Weldon Railroad, in the advance toward Richmond, the battle of Sailor's Creek, Major Horton now being its commander, and on the 28th of May, 1865, was mustered out at Washington, D. C.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SECOND REGIMENT. (SEVENTEENTH CAVALRY.) The One Hundred and Sixty-second Regiment of the Pennsylvania line—otherwise the Seventeenth Cavalry—included in its organization one company (M) of men raised principally in Wayne County, and having for its first commanding officer Captain Coe Durland, afterwards lieutenant-colonel. The colonel was Josiah H. Kellogg, previously a captain in the First United States Cavalry.

The regiment was recruited in the summer and autumn of 1862. On the 25th of November it left its rendezvous, near Harrisburg, and moved to Washington. December 22d it went to Occoquan, in the vicinity of which three companies remained some days, frequently skirmishing with the enemy. On the 5th of January, 1863, the detachment rejoined the regiment at Stafford Court-House, and the Seventeenth was made a part of the Second Brigade of the First Cavalry Division. In the Chancellorsville campaign Companies C and I were on escort duty with General Meade, and during the battle were engaged in the transmission of orders. In June, 1863, the regiment, with other troops, under Buford and Gregg, operated along the Rappahannock, and frequently skirmished with the enemy. In the Gettysburg campaign the division of which the Seventeenth was a part was under the command of General Buford, and at the commencement of the battle held the enemy at bay during four hours, till the arrival of the First Corps. It was afterwards efficient in preventing the attacks of flanking columns of the enemy. In the fall campaign of 1863 the Seventeenth, with the other cavalry, was very active and efficient in thwarting the movements of the wily rebel chief.

During the winter of 1863–64 the regiment was engaged in picket duty, and in February of that year a detachment went, under Captain Spera, with General Kilpatrick in his raid on Richmond.

In the brilliant cavalry operations under General Sheridan during the summer and autumn of 1864 the Seventeenth bore an active part, and was often in action, but space will not permit a detailed mention of the engagements in which it participated. Captain Spera, of Company C, who had on many occasions shown himself a brave and efficient officer, was, on the 10th of August, 1864, promoted to the office of major. He had the honor to accompany General Sheridan on his famous "ride," as the following account will show:

". . . General Sheridan then ordered Major Spera to take twenty men, with the best horses, from the escort and follow him, as he was going to move lively to the front, the remainder of the escort being directed to report to General Forsythe and Colonels Thorn and Alexander, to do what they could in stemming the tide of fugitives. On the way up the pike towards Newtown the crowds of men and wagons thickened until the multitude became almost a jam, so much so that it was impossible to keep the pike, and General Sheridan struck off to the left of the road, dashing through fields and over fences and ditches. He spoke to few, occasionally crying out, 'Face the other way, boys!' A chaplain was met, mounted on a mule, who seemed importunate to speak with the general, and beckoned him to stop, but the general told him to face about and ride along if he had anything to say. But the mule-mounted chaplain was soon left behind, with his story untold. On arriving upon the field the general struck to the right of the road, where were Generals Wright, Getty and members of his own staff, one of whom remarked, 'General, I suppose Jubal Early intends driving you out of the valley.' 'What!' exclaimed Sheridan, 'drive me out of the valley! Three corps of infantry and all my cavalry? I'll lick him before night.' With a lion heart he set to work disposing his forces, and by nightfall he had redeemed his promise."

In the winter of 1864–65 the regiment had its quarters near Winchester, and was employed in picket and scout duty. On the 24th of February, General Sheridan commenced the campaign of 1865, which terminated with the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox. During this campaign the Seventeenth sustained, to the last, its well-earned reputation. General Devin said, in his farewell order to the Seventeenth: "In five successive campaigns, and in over threescore engagements, you have nobly sustained your part. Of the many gallant regiments from your State, none has a brighter record, none has more freely shed its blood on every battle-field from Gettysburg to Appomattox."

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-NINTH REGIMENT.—The troops comprising this regiment (nine months' service, drafted militia) were from the counties of Berks, Lancaster, Pike and Wayne. They were organized in companies at periods ranging from October 23, 1862, to the 6th of December. On December 8th an organization was effected, with the following field officers: William H. Blair, colonel; Daniel M. Yost, lieutenant-colonel; William H. Yerkes, major. Soon after the organization it proceeded to Fortress Monroe, and thence to Yorktown. It did little else than garrison duty until the last of July, when it joined the movement with General Dix up the Peninsula. Upon its return to camp it was ascertained Lee had invaded Pennsylvania, and, though its term of service was about to expire, by the unanimous vote of the men, their further services were tendered to Governor Curtin as long as it should be needed for the defense of the State. The offer was accepted, but by the time the regiment had reached Washington the rebel army had retreated to Virginia. It was accordingly ordered to Harrisburg, and was mustered out on July 27th.

CHAPTER VIII.

Leading and Characteristic Industries—The Tanning Interest—Lumbering—The First Raft Sent Down the Delaware—Bee-Keeping.

AGRICULTURE is, of course, the leading industry of Wayne County, and it is treated of to some extent elsewhere. The peculiar and prominent industries next in importance may be said to be lumbering, tanning and bee-keeping. The tannery interest has been a very large one and is still of considerable importance. It is also one of the oldest industries carried on in the region.

Previous to 1830 there were but three tanneries in Wayne County. One of these was located in Canaan township and managed by Samuel Rodgers; another was situated in Mount Pleasant, and owned by Asa Smith; the remaining one was located in Bethany, under the supervision of Deacon Olmstead. The business of these tanneries was of a purely local nature, both the raw material being procured and the finished leather disposed of in the immediate vicinity. In 1826 Major Jason Torrey visited Montrose for the purpose of attending to some business relating to the Milford and Owego turnpike. While there he was favorably impressed with the prospects of a town to be built at the western terminus of the Delaware and Hudson Canal. By explaining to Isaac P. Foster, a director of the Milford and Owego turnpike, the probable business opportunities of this prospective town, he induced Foster to go there and commence business in company with himself. The following year Foster came to Dyberry Forks, erected a shanty and opened a store. This store was located on the "point" opposite the head of Third Street. At that time Samuel Kimble had cleared a small space in the vicinity of the present site of the National Hotel, on Second Street, where he and his family lived in a log house. With this single exception, all the land below the West Branch, comprising what is now the larger portion of the borough of Honesdale, was a wilderness. Above the Lackawaxen Major Torrey endeavored to effect a clearing. With this object in view, a gang of men, under the superintendence of Jonathan Bidwell, were employed by him to cut down the forest. At the time of the erection of the store there was only one building in the immediate vicinity. This was a large, barn-like structure, also situated on the "point," built and used as a boarding-house for the wood-cutters. Mr. Torrey's residence was in Bethany. While pursuing his business at Dyberry Forks he occupied one corner of this building for an office. This building was afterwards converted into a house for public worship, and was known as the "Old Tabernacle." The celebrated Lorenzo Dow, during a visit to Honesdale, occupied its pulpit.

In a district so sparsely populated the sale of "store-goods" was exceedingly limited. This fact led Mr. Foster to the conclusion that some other business was necessary for his financial success. Having been engaged in the manufacture of leather in Montrose previous to his removal to Wayne County, he naturally looked around for a favorable location for a tannery. A suitable site one mile farther up the West Branch was selected, and, in company with Ezra Hand, D. P. Kirtland and John F. Roe, he at once commenced the erection of the necessary buildings. The required machinery was also procured, and in 1830 the tannery went into active operation. For many years this was the leading and most flourishing leather establishment in this portion of the country. By means of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, South American and other hides were brought to the tannery and finished leather taken to the New York markets. The entire region was covered with hemlock timber, the bark of which could be procured at a very little expense. This rendered tanning a very profitable enterprise. During the sleighing season, when the price of leather was high and the canal frozen over, both leather and hides were transferred to and from New York on sleds. Mr. Foster, seeing that the enterprise was a success, purchased the interests of his several partners and conducted the business himself, in connection with his store, which he removed to a more convenient location. He subsequently associated with him his sons, who, after his withdrawal, succeeded him.

In 1871 Wayne County ranked first of all the counties of the United States in the value of her leather manufacturing interest. For many years it had the largest tannery in the world within its boundaries.

In 1870 the aggregate business of the several tanneries in the county was estimated at three million dollars.

The following is a statement of their transactions for the year 1869, which was not considered a peculiarly favorable one, as several tanneries were burned and others were undergoing repairs:

E. Beach & Son, Damascus	$116,829
L. H. Alden, Clinton	181,478
E. P. Strong, Wayne (Starrucca)	210,310
Young & Cornell, Dyberry	198,012
A. E. Babcock, Preston	141,253
Burgmuller & Co., Scott	99,022
J. T. & W. Cromwell, Palmyra	119,339
S. N. Darby, Damascus	49,683
H. Drake & Sons, Berlin	94,544
Jones & Wales, Buckingham	119,910
Foster Bros. & Co., Texas	50,794
B. G. Morss, Sterling	223,419
H. K. Nichols & Co., Mt. Pleasant	49,241
L. A. Robertson & Co., Cherry Ridge	285,721
Weston, Rockwell & Co., Manchester	144,419
Brunig & Bro., Texas	39,148
F. H. Rockwell, Oregon	62,345
L. B. Richtmyer, Manchester	115,761
Samuel Saunders, Texas	11,553
Total	$2,312,781

During the few succeeding years the tanning industry assumed even larger proportions, until the failure of bark in the neighborhood, and the extra expense incident to obtaining it from a distance, rendered the manufacture of leather more profitable in other locations, where bark was easily obtained. From that time to the present the tanning industry has steadily declined and in 1884 there were five tanneries in the county. These employed one hundred and forty-five persons, to whom they paid fifty-one thousand four hundred and ninety dollars. The value of the product has decreased from three million dollars in 1870 to four hundred and seventy thousand dollars in 1884. And at the present date all but two or three of the tanneries are abandoned. Large fortunes were accumulated by all engaged extensively in the business. When the removal of the tanneries was necessary, many tanning firms from this county opened tanneries in other counties, where they still conduct the leather business.

The lumber interest in Wayne County followed closely in the footsteps of the leather manufacture. Although a leading branch of industry in all well-timbered districts and the principal support of many persons, yet in places like Wayne County, where the bark is desired and used, the lumber interest is much more quickly and largely developed. For the successful operation of the tanneries, large quantities of bark were required. This could only be obtained by felling numerous trees. The utilization of these trees cut down for their bark returned a good profit. The conversion of so many trees into boards and other timber rendered saw-mills a necessity and very soon many were erected.

For three-quarters of a century after the first settlements on the banks of the Delaware River were effected by white men, heavy forests covered the entire territory comprising what is now Wayne County. At the beginning of the present century patches of clearing began to be interspersed here and there with the dense woods. The different shades of the foliage of the trees clearly demonstrated the fact that some were deciduous and others evergreen. The woods were composed of tall, straight trees of different varieties, not arranged promiscuously, but grouped in parcels of various sizes containing some particular species. In some places underbrush was thickly grown, making it almost impenetrable, while elsewhere for many acres the woods were entirely destitute of undergrowth.

In the southeastern part of the county the growth of vegetation was distinct and regularly arranged. Several species of shrubs predominated. The trees grew in small groves, consisting principally of chestnut, oak, hemlock and pine. "Open Woods" was the name given to this district, and in contradistinction the other part of the county was called "Beech Woods."

The forest for many years was the greatest source of wealth to the county. White and yellow pine, oak, chestnut and hemlock were procured from the open woods; the "Beech Woods" furnished cherry, whitewood, white pine, basswood, black and white ash, curled and spotted maple, hemlock and beech.

The first timber raft sent down the Delaware was unquestionably set afloat by Daniel Skinner, of Damascus, in the year 1764. He conceived the idea of lashing together a number of the splendid pine trees for which that region was famous, and floating them to Philadelphia, where he felt assured they would find a ready market for use as masts of vessels. He immediately set about putting his idea to a practical test, and at length, after much labor succeeded in starting his venture down the river, he, with an assistant following in a canoe, for the purpose of piloting the craft through in safety. The enterprise proved a failure. After floating some distance in safety, the raft ran upon an island, and all the efforts of Mr. Skinner and his assistant to dislodge it proved unavailing; they were finally obliged to abandon it and return to their homes. Not easily discouraged, however, Mr. Skinner soon made another and more successful venture. Having constructed his raft upon better principles and rigged it with oars, he again cast off his lines and swung out into the stream, taking to himself the responsible position of steersman, and employing a neighbor, named Josiah Parkes[1] to manage the forward oar. After trifling mishaps the pioneer craft reached Philadelphia and was advantageously disposed of, its navigators returning to their homes in triumph. Mr. Skinner was immediately dubbed "Lord High Admiral of the Delaware," and his companion "Boatswain Parkes," by which titles they were ever after recognized. Josiah Parkes was the grandfather of "Big Billy" Parkes, known to raftsmen of recent times as a man of uncommon strength, as he was of unusual size. Josiah Parkes' title of "Boatswain" or "Bo'son Parkes" was confirmed by the fact that he served in that capacity on board of Admiral Vernon's fleet at the taking of Havana. His brother was also on board the same fleet, and went to England with it on its return there and became a very distinguished man, being promoted to an Admiralty in the British navy.

Since the first raft was safely floated to Philadelphia by Mr. Skinner to 1870, it is estimated that at least two billion feet of lumber have been navigated to market. Most of this commanded what was considered a good price at the time when it was sold, but which is scarcely ten per cent. of the present value. So it can easily be seen that the county would be much wealthier with its standing growth of timber than it became by disposing of the lumber years ago.

Seventy-five years ago the principal export timber was pine. About one-fourth as much hemlock as pine was marketed at that date. Considerable change, however, has taken place since that time, and within the past fifteen years ninety per cent. of the lumber manufactured or shipped to market in the log is hemlock.

The introduction and use of circular sawmills in the forests of the county gave a wonderful impetus to the lumber trade. Mr. Murray erected the first circular saw-mill about thirty-five years ago. It was situated at Ketschall, and operated by John J. Merrill, of Beech Pond. The next one was erected in Lebanon township by Mr. Treat. Others followed rapidly, until in 1870 there were fifty in the county, some of which were run by steam-power.

[1] Josiah Parkes took out a warrant in his own name for one hundred and fifty acres of Stockport flats, which he sold to Colonel Hooper, of Trenton, for a barrel of rum. Stockport, formerly called Tockpollock, was years ago the headquarters of the lumbermen on the Delaware.

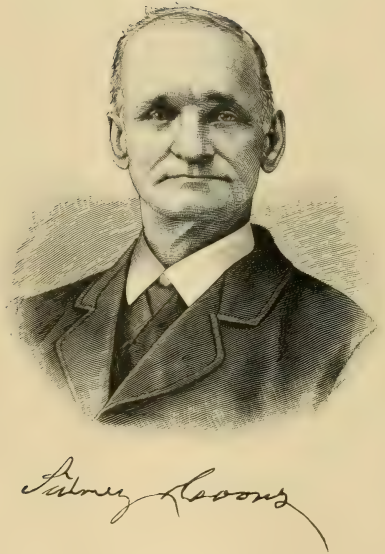
In 1870 there were consumed in sawed timber, square timber, piling and logs, at home and by export, 101,250,000 feet of logs of the several varieties. Ninety per cent. of this total was hemlock, which, at the average price of eleven dollars per thousand feet, brought to the county an aggregate sum of $1,115,000, out of which, however, a large amount must be deducted for expenses. From 1860 to 1876 there were annually felled in the forests of Wayne County 100,000,000 feet of timber. From that time to the present the amount of timber cut has steadily declined. As the scarcity of the timber became greater the value of the lumber increased. There were in 1884 twenty-seven saw-mills in the county, operating on an average one hundred and seventy days annually. For the operation of these mills one hundred and forty-eight persons were employed, who received as wages $68,117. The number of feet of timber decreased from 101,250,000 feet cut in 1870 to 12,600,000 feet in 1884.

In May, 1886, the last merchantable tree in the hemlock forests, that for more than a quarter of a century supplied the mills on Dyberry Creek, was felled. The name of William Kimble is necessarily connected with the destruction of this forest. His father was one of the early settlers in this region, and he at an early age became acquainted with a woodman's life. In 1860 he drove the first log cut in this region. Since that time he has not missed a day's log-driving on this creek, and doubtless with feelings of regret piloted to its destination the last log that will ever be run on this stream to Dyberry mills.

The destruction of the hemlock woods in this county has materially affected the water supply, many large streams having become almost dry within the past decade.

There is now one planing-mill in the county. This mill gives employment to seven men, who for their labor receive annually three thousand six hundred dollars. The mill consumes nine hundred and sixty-nine thousand feet of timber. The product is valued at five thousand one hundred dollars.

The manufacture of textile fabrics has become an industry of considerable importance in Wayne County. The favorable conditions for manufacturing afforded by an excellent water-power promise to replace the saw-mills with manufactories of this nature. There are now in the county five establishments manufacturing textile fabrics; two manufacture silk goods, two woolen goods and one yarn. The two silk-goods establishments employ three hundred and fifty persons, to whom they pay an annual sum of $60,000. The value of the product of these mills is $250,000. The woolen goods manufactories employ fifty persons, to whom the annual sum of $11,800 is paid. The value of their products is $52,000. The yarn-mill employs but seven persons. The product of this mill is valued at $2100.



There are eighteen grist-mills in the county. These mills employ twenty-eight men and pay them the annual sum of $9231. The daily consumption of these mills is 5051 bushels. They annually mill 6976 bushels of wheat and 399,098 bushels of other grain; 3140 barrels of flour are annually manufactured by these mills.

The three iron foundries of the county employ twenty-three men, to whom the annual sum of $9100 is paid. The daily capacity of these foundries is three tons.

According to the industrial statistics of 1884 for Pennsylvania, there are sixty-five manufactories in Wayne County. These factories employ 1244 persons, to whom they annually pay $394,703. In addition to these there are many minor industries not mentioned.

Bee-keeping has within a few years grown to be an extensive and profitable industry, as is evidenced by the single fact that one man has in a certain season shipped as much as thirty-five tons of honey from the county. This man was Sidney Coons. It would perhaps be fairer to say that his large shipment represented the production of the bee colonies owned by his sons as well as his own.

We have no record as to when the honey bee was first introduced into Wayne County or by whom. According to all accounts, there were no honey bees in North America in advance of the white men; they were first imported from Europe and became the forerunner of the white men, and the red men called them the "white man's fly." They probably have been kept in a domesticated state from the time the first settlements were made in the county. They were kept in conical straw and log hives and later in the box hive and the honey obtained was known as box or cap honey. To obtain the honey from the interior of the hive the keepers resorted to the sulphur pit.

In the year 1854 W. L. Hazen, of Bethany, took quite an interest in the bee business. He made some improvements in bee-hives and produced a large quantity of box honey. In the year 1878 he built a boat and shipped his honey to Philadelphia. For four years, he shipped from one to three thousand pounds in that way.

George W. Leonard commenced keeping bees in the movable comb-hive in 1867, and introduced all the modern improvements. He obtained the Italian bees in 1873 and in a few years increased his stock to one hundred colonies. He had from that time up to 1885 kept from one to two hundred and fifty colonies or hives. From 1875 to the present time he has averaged five thousand pounds of honey a year. He says there are five hundred colonies kept in movable comb hives south of the Delaware and Hudson Railroad and about the same number kept in the box hive.

Robert Bonear, Cherry Ridge	40

There are others that have two or three swarms each.

Sidney Coons & Sons are the largest bee-keepers in Wayne County. They made thirty-five tons of honey in 1885. Alvin Purdy and John Bunnel, of Texas, had their bees all destroyed by a contagious disease called "foul brood." It extended westward through Dyberry and Damascus, producing great havoc.

The principal honey and pollen producers or flowers, in rotation, as they bloom, are the alder and willow the first of the season, which produce pollen only. Next is soft maple, which usually blooms the 25th of April and produces both pollen and honey. Then comes the hard maple, which produces both pollen and honey, but not so abundantly as the soft maple. The wild cherry and fruit blossoms yield pollen and honey. Next comes the dandelion, which yields pollen and honey. The wild gooseberry yields abundantly, but is not very plenty. Then comes the sorrel, which yields both pollen and honey. On the 25th of May the raspberry begins to bloom and the flow of honey is so great in the vicinity of large bark peelings and briar patches that tons of it go to waste for the want of bees to gather it. For several weeks the bees are allowed to partake of this flower. It is secreted at all hours and in all kinds of weather and is the most reliable honey producer in the county. Next comes sumach, which yields honey and large quantities of pollen. Then comes silk or milk weed, which yields honey abundantly.

Next is basswood, which yields abundantly in favorable weather, and lasts until about the 20th of July, which ends the season for white honey in Wayne County. Then comes a scarcity of honey material for about three weeks.

Next in order bloom the dark honey producing plants. Buckwheat is the first and yields a dark, pungent honey. Then comes the golden rod, which begins to bloom the 15th of August, and yields honey until the close of the season, along with fire weeds and the aster. In dry seasons in October the aphis make their appearance on the leaves of the beech and alder, and exude a saccharine substance which is collected by the bees. As winter food for the bees it proves unwholesome. The atmospheric changes have much to do with the flow of honey. The plants secrete the most honey in warm, showery weather and a humid atmosphere.

Sidney Coons, residing near Honesdale, in Texas township, has done as much, if not more, than any other man in Pennsylvania to bring bee-culture to a great state of perfection. He has given this subject such attention by reading authentic works, and by studying the nature and habits of the different varieties of the honey bee, as to multiply five-fold the results of the busy bee's labor, over its most successful work of a quarter-century ago, and now realizes on an average from each swarm, one hundred pounds of section honey annually, above the amount required to keep them, as compared with twenty pounds when he first began bee-culture.

Both himself and sons are large dealers in bees and honey, the latter of which they ship by car-loads to New York and Philadelphia. Altogether the father and four sons own now one thousand swarms, comprised of the "pure Italian," "pure black," a native of this country, and the "hybrid," a cross between the others. He bought his first swarm of Italian bees in North Carolina many years ago, but the majority of his stock are the "native blacks." His taste for the apiary was early cultivated at home, when he was accustomed to see his father work among his bees, but it was not until 1857, when he settled in Wayne County, at Rileyville, that he began to follow bee-culture as a business.

He was born in the town of Broome, Schoharie County, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1821, reared on the home farm at that place, and attended the district school. By the death of his father when Sidney was twenty years of age, the relief of an encumbered property and the care of the family devolved upon him. After four years he sold out the farm and settled at Conesville, in the same county, where he remained until his removal to Lebanon township, Wayne County. For twenty years Mr. Coons was engaged in lumbering and farming in Lebanon, but in 1883 he retired largely from both, and removed to his present place, where his time is mostly taken up with the care of no less than a hundred swarms of bees.

He is the inventor of different kinds of hives now in use, which are a great improvement over the old-fashioned ones, being so arranged that the honey can be removed without disturbing the bees. He married, in 1847, Mary Jane, daughter of Martin B. and Wealthy (Tupper) Thomas, who was born June 23, 1822. Her parents were natives of Salisbury, Conn., and settled in Schoharie County, N. Y., where they died. She had two brothers,—Jeremiah and Erasmus D., now deceased,—and has two sisters, —Sarah, wife of Ira Desilva, of Gilboa, and Persis Thomas, of the same place.

Their children are Theodore E. Coons, a bee-keeper at Tanner's Falls; Rolland L. Coons, a bee-keeper and farmer in Damascus township; Clarence D. Coons, a large farmer and bee-keeper near Equinunk; and Fletcher S. Coons, a bee-keeper and farmer of Mount Pleasant township.

His father Abraham Coons (1795–1841), married Almira (1805–57), daughter of Picket Wood, of Schoharie County, N. Y. She died in Saratoga, N. Y. His grandfather, Jacob Coons, of German origin, resided in Middleburg, N. Y.; afterward removed to Ohio, thence to Illinois, where he died at his son's residence at the great age of one hundred years. His family mostly went with him.

Sidney Coon's brothers and sisters are Albert, died in Illinois; Ambrose, died in Ohio; Addison, resides at Bloomington, Ill.; Emeline, died at the age of twenty; Harriet, the wife of Daniel Black, of Cohoes, N. Y.; and Adeline, wife of Rodney Wilcox, who resides at the same place.

CHAPTER IX.

Description — Topography — Geological Notes — Soils — Streams, Lakes and Fish.

WAYNE COUNTY forms the extreme northeast corner of Pennsylvania. From the New York State line its eastern boundary is the Delaware River down to Narrowsburg, or Big Eddy, a distance of forty-five miles. Thence the boundary line between Wayne and Pike runs south thirty-one and three-quarters, west ten miles twenty-three poles, to the mouth of the Wallenpaupack, and thence up that stream and its south branch to where it is crossed by the old North and South turnpike, a distance of about forty miles; thence seven miles, ninety-two poles west to Lehigh Creek; thence up that stream six miles; and thence due north along Lackawanna and Susquehanna Counties to the New York State line, a distance of forty-eight miles and two hundred and seventy-four poles; and thence along the State line due east a distance of six and three-eighths miles to the Delaware.

Its area, according to figures based upon the best surveys, is 462,615 acres, or 722.8 square miles.

The surface of the county throughout the greater portion of its area is exceedingly irregular. Viewed from the highest land,—the Moosic Mountain range, which extends along the western line,—the succession of hills, as far as the eye can reach, appears not unlike the billows of the ocean; but if one were to leave this mountain stand-point and travel across the county in almost any direction, he would find the surface resembling a "chop sea." The level stretches are few and far between. This quality or condition of the country makes the prospect a very pleasing one in almost any portion of Wayne. As the scene is almost everywhere diversified with the sharp contrast of highly cultivated fields and lands almost as wild as they were before the white man came, varied by long, sweeping slopes and abrupt declivities, and the whole well watered by beautiful streams and dotted with lakes, innumerable beautiful landscapes are afforded. There is scarcely any portion of Pennsylvania in which the pastoral and the picturesque are so intimately commingled as in Wayne County.

The greatest elevation in the county is the Moosic range, heretofore alluded to. This varies in height (above tide-water) from two thousand to two thousand two hundred feet. At a point near the junction of the Wayne County line with the east and west line dividing Susquehanna and Lackawanna Counties it is not over nineteen hundred and fifty feet high, but farther north, to beyond Mount Pleasant, the altitude varies from two thousand and fifty to two thousand one hundred feet. Still farther north the height increases until it culminates in Ararat peak, which is two thousand six hundred and fifty feet above tide-water, and the second highest elevation in the northeastern part of the State.

The least elevation above tide-water in the county is in Damascus township, at the level of the Delaware, where the height is but 765 feet. The elevation of Hawley is 860 feet; of Honesdale, 983 feet; of Prompton, 1089 feet; of Waymart, 1413.14 feet; of the Moosic summit (where crossed by the gravity railroad), 1947.17 feet.

Outline of Geology—Soils.—From a brief account of the geology of the county, written by Professor I. C. White (the author of that volume of the State Report treating of Susquehanna and Wayne Counties) we condense the following:

"The rocks of the county belong principally to one system, viz.: what the geologists have termed the Catskill, since these same strata make up the great bulk of the Catskill Mountains in New York State. The main characteristic of the system is the abundance of red material, in the shape of red shale and red sandstone, the red color being always due to per-oxide of iron disseminated through the rocks, or shale as the case may be. Inter-stratified with the red shales are found frequent layers of gray or greenish current bedded sandstones, often finely laminated and forming excellent flagging material. The base of this system is seen only in Susquehanna County, and in that only along the Susquehanna River and the lower portions of the streams which flow into it, where one hundred to two hundred feet of Chemung rocks may be seen.

"No valuable minerals or metals will ever be found in these rocks, and the pretended discovery of gold and silver by the 'practical miners' in several portions of the district is only a pretence by which impostors have managed to secure free board and pocket money at the expense of their deluded victims. The only mineral in quantities of any value in the county is the coal found in the edge of Clinton.

"With the exception of a few acres in eastern Clinton, there are not and could not be any workable coal-beds in any portion of the county. The reason is that from the Carbondale region the rocks that hold the coal rise toward the east, north and west at a very rapid rate, varying from five hundred to one thousand feet to the mile for about three miles, so that this shoots all the coal-beds far above the tops of the highest hills and mountains, and when such peaks as Elk Mountain, Ararat and Sugar Loaf would have to be a thousand feet higher than now to catch any valuable beds of coal in their summits, it can very readily be seen by any one that there is no prospect for new coal discoveries in Wayne, since the summits of these mountains are even now nearly one thousand feet higher than the general level. It is possible and extremely probable that the greater portion of the county was once covered with the same coal-beds that occur in the vicinity of Scranton and Carbondale, but have been worn away and lost through the tremendous erosion of the Glacial epoch, and that of all previous and subsequent ages. The Scranton Valley coals were saved from this wasting process because they were folded downward far below the general level in the shape of an inverted arch, and have thus escaped destruction in part.

"The Bradford and Oil Creek oil horizons underly all of Wayne County, but it is extremely doubtful whether any number of drillings would reveal the oil itself. The few that have been made resulted in failure."

Of the soils of the county Mr. White gives the following account, with some practical suggestions concerning their improvement, and for the dissemination of this knowledge we can better afford space than we can for a long technical description of the geology of the country:

"The soils of the county," says he, "have been largely derived from the decomposition of rocks in situ, since the hill-slopes are generally so steep that the Drift is seldom found remaining on them except in scattered patches. The Catskill system furnishes almost all of the surface rocks in this district, and the soils have been largely derived either from their gradual decay or trituration by glacial action.

"The red shales of the Catskill have probably contributed more to the formation of the soil than any other part of it, and it is the universal testimony of the farmers that the 'red shale soils' are generally stronger and richer than any others. The amount of alkalies in the shale doubtless accounts for the fertility of its soil, since the quantity of lime and phosphoric acid is not sufficient to have any marked influence for good. But while the red shale soils are usually the best in the district, it is equally true that only in isolated patches and in favorable localities are there any really first-class soils within the county. The great body of the surface is covered by a thin sandy soil of very little natural fertility, and except in the vicinity of swamps, where a great thickness of decayed vegetable material has accumulated, and along some of the larger streams, where the Drift deposits are extensive, there is not much land within the district that will produce abundant crops until it has been fertilized artificially. The hill-slopes are steep and the surface generally rugged. Excellent crops of grass grow on almost any of the soils.

"The great need of the soils is lime, and the more sandy soils are furnishing it. There are no pure limestone strata in the Catskill series, but there are a great many layers of impure calcareous conglomerate or breccia interstratified with the shales and sandstone of this series. Huge fragments of this kind of rock lie scattered about over a large portion of the district, blackened by exposure to the air.

"These 'Nigger-heads' contain from ten to sixty-five per cent. of lime, and might often be burned to great advantage for lime manure. Many of the farmers have noticed the fact that the grass grows greener and richer near them, their lime being dissolved out by every shower to enrich the surrounding soil. But very few farmers have the least idea that these rocks contain enough lime to be of any service for burning. Mr. Schenk, of Cherry Ridge, is perhaps the only resident of the district who has tried a kiln, and he reports that the good effect upon his crops has been more marked than when he used the best stable manure.

"These boulders are so thickly strewn over some portions of Wayne County as to be a serious nuisance. Two birds could be killed with one stone—the land cleaned and the soil manured—by breaking up and burning them into lime. Even those of them least rich in lime might be turned to account, if farmers in clearing their lands would only build and burn their log-heaps over and around these rocks. By this means they would get such a roasting that the smaller ones would slack down, while a large coating of lime would fall away from the larger ones after every such operation."

STREAMS, LAKES AND PONDS.—The drainage of the whole county may be, in general terms, described as eastern,—that is, into the Delaware,—for the territory lies wholly on the eastern slope of the great water-shed, which is divided by the Moosic. This water-shed is, however, split into northern and southern slopes, and so it happens that very few of the streams have an actual eastward course. The subordinate divide or ridge from which these minor slopes descend curves toward the southeast, running in a direction rudely parallel with the course of the Delaware, and, six to ten miles west of it, finally terminates in a narrow ridge at the river, near Lackawaxen.

The streams which flow from the northern and eastern slopes of this subordinate watershed are small. Beginning at the north, they are Strawder's, Chehocton, Big Equinunk, Little Equinunk, Hollister's, Cashe's and Calkin's Creeks. Mast Hope Creek drains a portion of Berlin township through a corner of Pike County into the Delaware.

The Lackawaxen, the main stream of the county, drains the eastern slope of the Moosic water-shed, and the southern and western slopes of the curving subordinate divide, of which mention has been made. Its drainage basin constitutes about two-thirds of the area of Wayne County. It has been extremely useful as an outlet for lumber and other products, and by its banks have been built a canal and railroad which have superseded it as carriers. It is not only the most important but the most historic stream in the county.[1] Long a public highway, it has recently been by law released from serving in that capacity and it is probable that in a few years its waters will be largely used as a motive-power for great manufactories.

The principal affluents of the Lackawaxen are the Dyberry, which empties into it at Honesdale; the Middle Branch, which comes in at Hawley; and the Wallenpaupack, which flows from the southwest, and reaching it just below Middle Creek, pours a considerable torrent into it over the cliffs of Paupack Falls. This is the most picturesque stream of the county, and has many falls and dashing rapids, varied by darkling, quiet pools. It flows a tortuous course, often between precipitous banks, along a rock-fretted channel, and again placidly through broad bottom lands.

The lakes of Wayne County form one of its most remarkable physical features and chief beauties. There are no less than seventy-six lakes and ponds within the limits of the county, some clustered about the heads of the streams and others having no visible inlet—in fact, immense springs. These lakelets vary in size

[1] The Lackawaxen is very frequently mentioned in this work, especially in the general history and Chapter IV. of Wayne County (on Internal Improvements). Hon. George H. Rowland, who lives upon the banks of the stream, has summed up as follows the legislative enactments concerning it:

"In 1771 the Lechawaxen (as it was then called) was declared a public highway by the General Assembly up to the falls thereof (wherever that might have been); I think it must have had reference to the falls near Hawley. In 1791 the General Assembly appropriated two hundred and fifty pounds for the improvement of the navigation of the Lechawaxen, and authorized the Governor to appoint commissioners to contract with parties to do the work.

"Again, by act of February 1, 1808, the Lackawaxen (in this act it is first spelled as we now spell it) is declared a public highway from the falls thereof to Dybery Forks and thence up the Dybery and West Branch to the great falls of its respective branches.

"By act of March 26, 1814, the west branch of the Lackawaxen from Colonel Seely's mills to Silas Kellogg's, in Mt. Pleasant township, was declared a public highway.

"By act of the 13th of March, 1823, Maurice Wurts was authorized to built a slack-water navigation from Wagner's Gap, in the county of Luzerne, to Rix, Gap in the county of Wayne, and thence to mouth of Lackawaxen, in such a manner that boats and rafts might descend at least one day in seven, unless impeded by ice or high water, with channel not less than twenty feet in width, and boats of not less than ten tons' burden.

"In 1825 an act was passed authorizing the above corporation to connect with the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, that had been incorporated by the State of New York.

"By act of 1826 the slack-water navigation was changed to the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, and the Company authorized, if they preferred it, to build a canal and to take water from the Lackawaxen and other streams, but required to discharge it into the Delaware River at or near the mouth of the Lackawaxen River.

from one to one hundred and fifty acres. Prof. White says: "Many of them are surrounded by dry banks of gravel extending down to the water's edge, with no streams draining into them and only a narrow channel cut down through the gravel heap for the outlet. Of course such ponds can only be fed by springs rising from the bottom. Others again have small feeding streams, and are often surrounded by a great expanse of swamp or marshy lands, thus indicating the probable greater expanse of the water in the past.

"The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company has taken advantage of these ancient drained lake basins to secure a constant supply of water for their canal from Honesdale to the Delaware River, during the dry seasons of summer and fall. By throwing high dams across the narrow outlets of several lakelets tributary to the Lackawaxen, the surplus rainfall of winter and spring is caught and stored up to be gradually let out through wickets in the dams when needed in the summer."

These lakes and ponds are most numerous in Preston township, where there are no less than eighteen. The following interesting facts concerning the location, depth and height above tide of these lakes is given by Hon. N. F. Underwood, a resident of the township:

Como Lake (1475 feet A. T.) at village of Lake Como; depth, 24 feet; has two considerable inlets; outlet into Equinunk waters.

Upper Twin, one-half mile north of Como; no inlet; outlet into Lower Twin; depth, 68 feet.

Lower Twin, one-fourth mile southeast of Upper Twin; outlet into Equinunk; depth, 62 feet.

Eastern Spruce, one mile south of Como; no inlet; outlet into Como; area, 30 to 35 acres; marshy on side next to Como Lake, with large swamp extending to within one-fourth mile of the latter.

Sly, one-fourth mile southeast of Spruce; no inlet; outlet into Equinunk; depth, 59 feet; area, 60 to 70 acres.

Long, one and a half miles south-southwest from Como; no inlet; outlet into Equinunk; depth, 52 feet.

Seven-Mile, one mile south-southwest from Como; one considerable inlet; outlet into Equinunk; depth, 22 feet; area, about 75 acres.

Coxtown (A. T. 1950 feet), one and a half miles northwest from Preston Centre; no inlet; outlet into Starrucca Creek; depth, 47 feet; area, 80 to 90 acres.

Western Spruce (A. T. 1960 feet), one-half mile southwest from Preston Centre; small inlet; outlet into Starrucca Creek; depth, 21 feet; area, about 75 acres. Both this and Coxtown have comparatively low surroundings.

The shallow ones have comparatively level floors, sometimes exhibiting only a foot or two of variation in two hundred or three hundred yards. The water in the deeper ones is very clear, while in the shallow ones it is colored like swamp water, their bottoms consisting of soft, vegetable mud to an unknown depth. Without doubt the filling-up process now going on in them has converted many former lakes into the present swamps, and greatly reduced the size of others.

FISH.—What has been said of the lakes and streams of the county leads, naturally, to a few remarks upon the fish which are so plentiful in them. First of all is that aristocrat of the water,—the handsomest and gamest of all the species,—the trout. Formerly, they were very numerous. Thirty or forty years ago a man was not thought much of an angler who could not go out and fill his creel—or, more probably, as creels were not then much used, get a string so long that it dragged the ground—in a few hours. In 1840 they abounded in the Wallenpaupack, Middle Creek, Dyberry and Lackawaxen, ranging from nine to sixteen inches in length; but a few years later the liquor from the tanneries and the saw-dust from the mills so polluted the water, and the pickerel became so numerous, that the trout vanished from all of these streams, excepting their head-waters. Many of the small streams have yet a few trout. The Wangum, Five-Mile, the head-waters of the Dyberry and the creeks in the northern part of the county are now the principal trout-producing streams; but they are fast diminishing, even in these waters, and unless they are restocked will soon entirely disappear.

The most common among the highly-prized fish at present are the black bass and pickerel, both strangers to the waters of the county until brought in by enthusiastic fishermen.

The black bass were first introduced in 1868 by A. W. McGown. The pickerel were brought to the county about 1836, when the principal ponds in the county were stocked. Sand Pond was stocked in 1836 by Aaron Curtis and his father, of Canaan township. It was stocked with bass in 1868 by A. W. McGown. It also has perch, catfish and eels. They are the native fish, and excepting the eels, are in all of the principal ponds in the county. These are not in the lakes that empty into the Paupack, as they cannot ascend the falls; the young fry are below the falls in countless numbers, but none above.

Elk Pond was stocked with bass in 1868 by A. W. McGown. It also has pickerel and perch in its waters. Upper Woods has bass, pickerel and perch. It was stocked with bass in 1868 by A. W. McGown. In 1840 trout were quite plenty in it. Mr. P. G. Goodrich says that he caught one there that weighed three pounds and six ounces, but the pickerel soon exterminated them. White Oak Pond has bass, pickerel, perch and trout in its waters. This is the only pond in the county that has trout in it, and their time is short, as it has been stocked with bass and pickerel within the last few years. Keen's Pond has bass, pickerel and perch, the bass running in from Elk Pond. Beech Pond contains bass, pickerel and perch. Mr. Merrill said the bass were put in the summer of 1885. The pickerel were introduced many years ago. Jones' Pond was stocked with pickerel, in 1836, by a number of the old settlers who resided near the pond. It was stocked with bass, in 1875, by James A. Bigart.

It was stocked with land-locked salmon, in 1877, by S. L. Dart. He also put in five hundred lake trout the same year. He says there has never been one caught or seen since, to his knowledge. It is the opinion of some that they are in the deep water and have never been fished for properly, but they probably were destroyed in a short time by the pickerel, as they were very plenty in the pond at that time. In seems incredible that they could remain there these eight years and not one of them be seen or caught. Biddell Pond contains bass, pickerel and perch. Trout were quite plenty in it about 1836, but it was stocked with pickerel at that time by some of the old settlers, and the trout could not hold their own against the pickerel, and were exterminated. Bass were put in this pond about 1875 by A. W. McGown. Stanton Pond is well supplied with pickerel and perch, and so also are many of the lesser ponds of the county.[1]

A special law enacted in 1870 protects the black bass of Wayne County from the angler except during specified seasons. It provides that:

"From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to take, catch or kill, by any means or device whatsoever, fish commonly known by the name of black bass in any of the waters, lakes, ponds or creeks of Wayne County during the months of March, April, May and June in each and every year; nor shall it be lawful for any person or persons to fish in said waters at any time with any kind of nets, seines, baskets or bags, nor to use in any way what is commonly known as 'Cocculus Indicus' or any other vegetable or mineral substance in said waters, for the purpose of stupefying or poisoning fish in order to catch or destroy them."

It was provided "that any person offending against this law should, upon conviction, be liable to a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars, nor more than fifty dollars, with costs of prosecution for every such offense, one-half of said fine to go to the prosecutor and the other half to be paid to the treasurer of the township in which such offense shall have been committed, for school purposes only; and in default of the payment of said fine, undergo an imprisonment in the county jail of said county for a term of twenty days. Provided the prosecution shall be commenced within sixty days after the offense is committed."

[1] The facts concerning fish were supplied by R. C. Leonard, of Middle Valley. It is a fact not well known, even in Wayne County, where he resides, that Mr. Leonard is the champion fly-caster in the United States. He was a winner at the tournaments in New York in 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885, in the latter year casting one hundred and twenty-five feet (with a salmon rod) and ninety-two feet single-handed. In previous years he made nearly as good records.

CHAPTER X.

THE BOROUGH OF HONESDALE.

TITLE OF THE SITE OF HONESDALE—THE "INDIAN ORCHARD" AND SCHOONOVER TRACTS.—Honesdale is built upon portions of two tracts of land, which were known as the Indian Orchard and Schoonover patents, the former passing from the proprietaries of Pennsylvania to Colonel Jonas Seely in 1765 and the latter from the State to William Schoonover in 1803. The former, a prominent citizen of Reading, Berks County, and an officer in the provincial service during the French and Indian War (sometimes called in Eastern Pennsylvania Teedyuscung's War), on being relieved of his command near the close of the struggle, petitioned the proprietaries for a large tract of land, pledging its early settlement as an inducement for the issuance of the grant. His application was favorably received, but it was not until the 30th day of July, 1793, that a warrant was issued to him, or rather to the surveyor-general, James Scull, giving him authority to survey the lands for Seely. The conditions, briefly stated, were that ten thousand acres of land were to be surveyed to and for Jonas Seely, in one or two tracts, on or near the north branch of the "Lackawaksin" Creek, in Northampton County, "beginning about a mile above the forks of that creek and going on or near to a Tract there of eight hundred acres," which had been surveyed for the proprietaries' use; that there should be surveyed and set off for the proprietaries ten acres for every hundred acres of the tract, "at least of equal value and Goodness with the Rest;" that the grantee should pay for every hundred acres thereof five pounds "sterling money of Great Britain," one-half within six months and the other within eighteen months after the return of the survey; that the grantee should settle the tract within three years ensuing after the date of the warrant, unless there should be "rupture or war with or interruption by the Indians," in which case the condition should be complied with in a reasonable time not exceeding three years after the termination, and it was further provided and agreed if the latter stipulation should not be fully complied with, the residue of the lands not settled should revert to the proprietaries and remain "for their use as fully and effectually as if the warrant had not been granted."

It was not until February, 1769, that James Scull made return of the survey executed under the authority of the warrant just synopsized. In his return all the land surrounding the tract was described as "vacant," with the exception of the proprietaries' manor, which adjoined it upon the east. The northwestern corner of the tract was a birch tree on the hillside a little south of the old burial-place in the present borough of Honesdale, and the northern boundary extended from this point in a northeasterly direction for a distance of a little more than four miles, into what is now Berlin township. The bulk of the tract as surveyed lay in the form of a square, with its southern limit a little below Indian Orchard, and the remainder was included in a strip about three-fourths of a mile broad and nearly three miles long, extending down the Lackawaxen on each side of the stream to a point some distance below White Mills. The tract was returned as comprising eight thousand three hundred and seventy-three and one-half acres, with an allowance of six per cent. for roads. The name of the tract, "Indian Orchard," by which it was known in all subsequent conveyances, was given to it owing to the fact that within its bounds was included the famous apple orchard below Honesdale on the Lackawaxen, originally planted by the Indians.

The obligation which Colonel Seely entered into to cause the settlement of the tract by thirty families was not fulfilled, nor does it appear even to have been undertaken, and yet the tract did not revert to the proprietaries. Ill fortune overtook the enterprising first owner of the site of Honesdale and of the Indian Orchard tract, and he was obliged to part with it. In March, 1779, he conveyed the tract, reserving one thousand acres at the north end, to Colonel Mark Bird and James Wilson (a lawyer of Philadelphia and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence) in fee as tenants in common. Colonel Bird, who was a conspicuous character in Pennsylvania during the Revolutionary period, soon after released and conveyed his share to Wilson, who, eventually, also secured the thousand acres reserved by Colonel Seely. Mr. Wilson not long afterwards paid into the receiver-general's office £1207 3*s.* 4*d.*, the amount of the purchase, and on the 16th of November, 1781, a patent for the tract was issued to him under the seal and authority of the Supreme Executive Council of the province, being signed by William Moore, president of that body, and attested by T. Matlack, secretary.

Other creditors of Colonel Seely had, however, in the mean time taken measures to secure their claims against him, and having obtained judgments, had entered them of record in Northampton County, of which it should be borne in mind the territory of Wayne was then a part. In March, 1790, the Indian Orchard tract was sold by Sheriff George Groff, of Northampton County, as the property of Jonas Seely, on an execution issued at the instance of Isaac Levan, in the interest of the estate of Governor James Hamilton, deceased, and William More Smith, an attorney of Montgomery County, became the purchaser. But Wilson was not disposed to lose his title without a struggle, and on the 18th of March, 1790, when the sheriff was about to acknowledge in open court the deed to Smith, Joseph Thomas, Wilson's attorney, arose and asked for a rule to show cause why, upon James Wilson's paying to the representatives of Hamilton's estate his contributory part of Colonel Seely's debt to said Hamilton, a deed should not be made by the sheriff to the said Wilson, as the best and highest bidder. The court ruled that Mr. Thomas "take nothing by his motion," and, consequently, the 29th of April the deed was acknowledged to Smith, in whom the title to the tract was invested for about a year.

William Hamilton, of Bush Hill, Philadelphia (nephew of James), received a deed for the property from Smith on the 14th of April, 1791, the consideration being nine hundred and five dollars lawful money of Pennsylvania, who held it until his death, in 1813, after which Jason Torrey became the agent for the lands in Wayne County belonging to his estate.

Soon after William Hamilton became possessed of the property clearings began to be made upon some of the adjoining tracts, and settlers encroached upon his domain. After the erection of Wayne County, in 1798, and especially after the removal of the seat of justice to Bethany, this tract of land lying, as it did, near the county-seat, and along the main road to it from the south, naturally appreciated considerably in value. At this time the better portions of it were in possession of half a dozen individuals, either as squatters or under contracts with James Bell, Mr. Hamilton's agent and attorney. Three years later Bell's authority was revoked, and it became necessary for the parties holding under him to deal directly with the owner, which they did. On the 1st of March, 1810, deeds were acknowledged by William Hamilton for portions of the Indian Orchard tract, to Benjamin Kimble, Walker Kimble, Stephen Kimble, Dan Dimmick, Jonathan Brink and Mordecai Roberts.

He, to the last named man, transferred the site of Honesdale, or rather its southern half, as a portion of a tract of one hundred and fifty-two acres and fifty perches, the consideration for which was the modest, though then sufficient, sum of $229.08. The lot was described in the deed as "All that certain tract or piece of land situate on the waters of Lackawaxen creak, Wayne County, State of Pennsylvania, bounded as follows: Beginning at a Hemlock tree, the original northwest corner of the old Indian Orchard tract; thence north sixty-six and a half east one hundred and nineteen perches, to a heap of stones; thence south twenty-three and a half east eighty-two and three-quarters perches to a stone; thence north sixty-six and a half east seventy-five and a half perches to a post; thence south twenty-three and a half east thirty-eight, twenty-four perches to a stone; thence by Stephen Kimble's land south sixty-five and a half west seventy-six perches to a stone; thence south twenty-three and a half east eighty-three and three-quarters perches to a post; thence by the said Stephen Kimble's land south sixty-six and a half west seventy-eight perches to the place of beginning, containing 152 acres, 58½ perches, with the usual allowance of six per cent. for roads, being a part of a large tract of land known by the name of Indian Orchard."

Mordecai Roberts, a farmer, between the "Narrows" and the mouth of the Lackawaxen, held the land for twelve years (doing nothing, in the mean time, towards its improvement, except cutting off some of the heaviest timber) and then sold it to his son, Mordecai Roberts, Jr., of Dyberry township, for the nominal sum of one hundred dollars. He, in turn, sold the tract to Samuel Kimble, on June 30, 1823, the consideration being sixteen hundred dollars.

Mr. Kimble bought the property with a view of clearing it up and engaging in farming, and at once set to work chopping, to accomplish that intention. His purchase included all of the land embraced in the present borough limits, below, or south of, a line drawn east and west through the public square and extended a short distance on each side of the borough lines.

In 1825 he had partially cleared a few acres and erected a small plank house at a point on Second Street, as the town is now laid out, and here was residing, in the first house erected upon the site of the now thriving and beautiful town, when the operations of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company were begun. The projectors of that great enterprise were sufficiently farsighted to anticipate that a town would be built up here, at the western terminus of their canal and the eastern terminus of their contemplated railroad over the mountains, and they were, as a matter of course, anxious to obtain possession of Kimble's land. It being represented to him by the company's agents that the canal basin would be located beyond the limits of his purchase, and that the passage of the canal through his farm would be very detrimental to his interests, and also being advised by some of his friends to sell, he finally, on the 19th of September, 1827, conveyed to Maurice Wurts, of Philadelphia, all of his land lying west of the Lackawaxen, comprising "one hundred and seven acres, fifty-nine perches strict measure," Kimble reserving the right to maintain a dam across the river. The consideration was one thousand dollars in cash, a sum which seemed so small when active operations had been begun on the lands he disposed of and their true value was foreshown, that Kimble bitterly repented the transaction. On the 15th of October, 1827, Maurice Wurts sold the parcel of land to "the President, Managers and Company of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company," for the sum of four thousand dollars. By them it was laid out in building lots (except such portions as they reserved for their own use), and from that company all titles to lots in Honesdale, south of the line heretofore referred to, have been accordingly derived.

The chain of title to that portion of the town north of the centre of the public square remains to be described. It is much simpler than that pertaining to the southern part.

The Schoonover tract of over four hundred acres was surveyed on a warrant dated the 12th of March, 1803, to William Schoonover, and a patent for it was issued to him on the 27th of January, 1804, in which it was called "Monmouth" and described as containing four hundred and thirty-nine acres and thirty-nine perches.

He was from New Jersey and had settled on the Dyberry flats, about a mile above the confluence of the Dyberry Creek and the West Branch, in 1791 or the following year. His occupancy of the place was undisturbed for about ten years, but finally other persons who had obtained warrants from the commonwealth began to make their surveys and attempted to effect his removal on the claim that he was infringing on their territory.

Jason Torrey, who was then doing an immense amount of surveying, soon discovered that Mr. Schoonover's settlement far antedated the titles of the rival claimants, and advised him to take out a warrant and have the boundaries of his land definitely fixed and the title secured.

This, after considerable persuasion, he authorized the surveyor to do for him. The consideration for this service on the part of Torrey was agreed upon in advance, and was to be one-half of the tract secured. After it had been accomplished and the patent secured the question came up as to the division of the land. Schoonover naturally desired to retain that portion of the patent on which his clearing and house stood, and it was decided that Torrey should have the lower or southern portion, but as this part was poorer land than the northern, some of it being rocky and some of it marshy, the line was so run as to allow him about forty acres more than half. The deed for this portion of the land was executed by William Schoonover and Susannah, his wife, on the 23d of April, the professional services of the grantee being rated as consideration for the land to the amount of five hundred dollars. This deed described the possession as "a certain tract, or parcel of land . . . containing two hundred and fifty-nine acres and twenty-nine perches and allowance of six per cent. for roads, being part of an entire original tract of four hundred and thirty-nine acres and thirty-nine perches and allowance, surveyed on a warrant to William Schoonover," etc. This included all of the lands now within the borough limits north of a line drawn from east to west through the middle of the public square.

Torrey, who was then living at Bethany, made no attempt to improve the tract for over twenty years, but endeavored several times to sell it, particularly in 1817 to Benjamin Jenkins, who preferred to locate where Prompton now is and pay a greater price than was asked for the Honesdale property.[1] Thus Torrey remained in possession until the locality was selected as the terminus of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, and he then platted the northern portion of the village and placed his lots in the market, ultimately realizing from their sale a handsome profit.[2]

Beginning of the Town.—As soon as it became apparent that the "Forks of Dyberry" was to be the terminus of the canal, operations were begun for the building of a town. It appears that for a time it was Jason Torrey's expectation that the head of the canal would be located upon his land, and that he and the company should co-operate in laying out the town. Indeed, a contract to that effect was entered into between Mr. Bolton, the president of the company, and himself, which only needed ratification by the board of directors. They failed to approve it. The head of the canal was fixed on the lands south of Mr. Torrey's, which, as heretofore stated, had been bought by Mr. Wurts and conveyed to the company, and hence each of the parties began separate improvements, and two distinct hamlets came into existence, which were not merged for many years.

To Mr. Torrey belongs the honor of making the first break in the wild, almost impenetrable rhododendron and cypress thicket which clothed the site of the now thriving borough. The Kimble house, to be sure, was in existence, but that was not erected with a view toward further improvement. There was none other nearer than Schoonover's, when Stephen Torrey, acting for his father, superintended the erection of a boarding-house in the fall of 1826 for the prospective laborers who were to be on the ground the next season. This building, on the point between the West Branch and the Dyberry and about a hundred feet from each, in after-years came to be known as the "Tabernacle," from the fact that religious services were held within it. It was kept as a boarding-house by William R. McLaury, who was thus the first person to commence housekeeping in Honesdale. (He died at his residence, near the borough, on March 9, 1881.)

The next season (1827) vigorous operations were commenced in the way of clearing, north of the creek, and Jason Torrey surveyed and laid out his portion of the town. Half a mile up the West Branch his son Stephen constructed a dam and built a saw-mill, which was in operation early in 1828, and sawed the lumber for many of the first houses in the new settlement. The Forbes House, now the Wayne County House, was erected and taken possession of by Charles Forbes, and the Foster House was built across the street. I. P. Foster and Jason Torrey opened the first store in May, 1827, and were succeeded by Foster and John F. Roe in March of the following year.

The engineers of the canal company surveyed and laid out the portion of the town south of Mr. Torrey's land about the same time that he was engaged in platting the northern part.

From this time on improvements were carried forward with something like a rush, for gangs of men were set at work by the canal company, and tradesmen and citizens began to flock to the place. Speaking of a period a little later, the Rev. Henry A. Rowland thus pictures the prosperity which the great work of internal improvement brought to the locality and surrounding country,—

"The work was completed; coal began to float down the canal towards the sea-coast and a tide of immigration to set back through the same channel into this almost wilderness. Laborers, mechanics and merchants flocked in and established themselves along the line of the public work; and when those who had gained something from their industry preferred a different life, they purchased wild lands, subdued them by the plow and devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits."[1]

The settlement was named Honesdale in honor of Philip Hone, first president of the canal company, one of the chief promoters of the enterprise and "the courtliest mayor New York ever saw."

As has been before said, several years elapsed before the two settlements, planted respectively on the lands of Jason Torrey and of the company, grew together. They were commonly termed the "upper town" and the "lower town." The first step toward filling in the gap which separated them was the erection of Cornelius Hendricks' residence (where S. G. Cory now lives), on Third Street, that being the first house north of Ninth Street and below the West Branch. This was in 1833. There were then twenty houses, including the "Tabernacle," north of the stream mentioned. About this time the first edifice of the Episcopal Church was erected on the site of the present one by Charles Jameson. Prior to that time the society worshipped in the upper story of the building still standing on the southeast corner of Main and Sixth Streets. The post-office was then in the building now occupied by John Rehbein, and the postmaster was Thomas T. Hayes, who, although he had office under Jackson, was a stanch Whig. A mail was brought daily from Rileyville by a two-horse wagon, and tri-weekly from Carbondale.

The merchants of that time (1833) were:—above the bridge, or in the "upper town," Edward Mills, Thomas T. Hayes, Hand, Kirtland, Roe & Co.; and below the bridge were Hastings Frisbie (where the Stanton building now is), Z. H. Russell, Daniel B. Wilcox, Delezene & Beach, St. John & Perkins, F. R. Marshall, Calvin Earl and Edward Murray, the last three being located along the tow-path of the canal.

THE EARLY RESIDENTS.—The beginning of the town has already been outlined, some of the early settlers being incidentally mentioned, and the following list is, therefore, in some measure, a recapitulation, though most of the names have not heretofore been given. The list shows the order in which taxable residents arrived, from 1827 to 1831, inclusive,— 1827.—Daniel Blandin, Charles Forbes, Stephen W. Genung.

1828.—Alanson Blood, Jacob B. Bidwell, James L. Blackington, John Capron, Isaac P. Foster, Leonard Graves, Thomas T. Hayes, Edward Mills, Hiram Plum, John F. Roe, Zenas Russell, Russell Spencer, Timothy N. Vail, Russell Whitney.

1829.—Horace Baldwin, Simeon S. Chamberlain, Calvin Earle, Nathaniel B. Eldred, Henry Herington, Stephen Kelly, Martin Kellogg, Solomon Z. Lord, Ebenezer T. Losey, William Moak, John Osborne, Benjamin Rouse, Mary Stewart (widow), Abraham J. Stryker, Stephen Torrey, Daniel B. Wilcox, Joseph B. Walton.

1830.—Nelson Blood, Levi Bronson, Augustus Brown, Alonzo Bentley, Mortimer Chamberlain, Calvin Earle, Hastings Frisby, Ezra Hurlburt, Howell W. Hollister, Charles Jamison, Albert Jamison, Elias J. Kent, Jabez Lovejoy, David M. Mapes, Alexander Murray, Edward Murray, Henry Merwin, Elkanah Patmor, William C. Rose, Thomas L. Reese, Benoni B. Salmon, Christopher R. Smith, Manus Thompson, John Torrey, Abiram Winton, Hoel Wakefield, Alvah Wheeler.

1831.—Nathaniel Bartlett, Russell Blowers, Abel Barnes, John Bolts, William J. Cressy, John Calloway, William Chamberlain, William W. Culver, Henry H. Farnum, Jacob W. Griswold, Ezra Hand, James Hughes, Jonas Hanscomb, Samuel Kellogg, Brooks Levo, Russell F. Lord, James Morris, Christopher L. Morris, James Manning, John Maron, Seneca Mayhew, Jacob Moore, Levi T. Prescott, Jeremiah Platt, William Parminter, Charles K. Robinson, Julius Richards, George Stratton, Abram A. Stryker, George N. Styles, Silas Stephens, John Tyler, Phineas L. Tyler, Thomas H. R. Tracy, John B. Jervis.

Others speedily followed, and in 1833 the prominent residents of the infant town were as follows:

Rev. James Campbell.	R. F. Lord.
Rev. James H. Tyng.	S. Z. Lord.
E. Patmore.	Z. H. Russell.
D. Tarbox.	A. H. Farnham.

T. W. Vail.	C. K. Robinson.
T. L. Reese.	C. Jameson.
Dr. B. H. Throop.	J. Hunseum.
T. H. R. Tracy.	B. B. Salmon.

Isaac P. Foster, who is set down in the foregoing list as arriving in 1828, really became a resident in the preceding year, but was not upon the tax-list until the year mentioned.

He was destined to become one of the most active business men of the town. He was one of the proprietors (in company with Jason Torrey) of the first store, and, with John F. Roe, opened the second, as heretofore stated. In later years, with Roe, D. P. Kirtland and Ezra Hand, he was a pioneer in the tanning industry, which became an immense one in Wayne County.[1] He soon became the sole proprietor of the first tannery and carried it on for many years, as he also did his mercantile house. He was one of the original members of the Presbyterian Church and one of its most zealous and exemplary adherents, but was forced, when the slavery question assumed definite form, to retire from his office as ruling elder, because he was an Abolitionist. He lived to see the entire membership of the church, with, perhaps, two or three exceptions, adopt and uphold his views in regard to the wrong of slavery. He assisted in the organization of the first temperance society in Wayne County. He was an agitator on all moral topics, and his zeal in championing his convictions, however unpopular, was fully equaled by his benevolence. Deacon Foster, as he was commonly called, was born in Quogue, in the town of Southampton, Long Island, March 28, 1788. He went to New York in 1810, in quest of employment, and to Montrose in the same year. There he remained until he came to the "Forks of Dyberry," in 1827. In 1812 he married Miss Mary Howell, who bore him sixteen children, among whom was I. N. Foster, the well-known merchant of Honesdale. Deacon Foster died in the borough on November 18, 1876, in his eighty-ninth year, full of years and full of honor.

Stephen W. Genung also came to the settlement in 1827, and was the first blacksmith here. With his brothers, Ira and Lamock, he had settled in what is now Berlin township prior to 1822, and had owned a saw-mill at Genungtown. He spent all of the remainder of his days in Honesdale, and was a much respected citizen. He and his eldest son, Ezra, laid out an addition to the town upon the beautiful, gently-sloping hill, to the southwest. His other sons were Elisha, Merwin and Amzi. George Genung, station agent of the Delaware and Hudson Railroad, is a son of Ezra.

Alanson Blood, who is mentioned as arriving in 1828, began business as a cabinet-maker with his brother Nelson, who died and was buried at sea in 1837, while on a voyage from New Orleans to New York. In 1829 he built the dwelling-house on Upper Front Street, which he ever after occupied. He was born in Burlington, Otsego County, N. Y., March 26, 1806. October 9, 1830, he married Chloe Stone, who was born in Milford, Otsego County, N. Y., and died here June 10, 1882. He died September 12, 1885, in the eightieth year of his age. His residence here extended over the long period of fifty-seven years.

[1] See Chapter VIII.

"Mr. Blood was a person of excellent sense, a skillful and reliable workman, and thoroughly upright in all affairs. His success, measured simply by financial accumulations, was not large, and, primarily, because honest himself, he could not believe that all other men were not so. But he built up a character which steadily commanded universal confidence and esteem.

"Long before his wife died he was touched by paralysis, and thereupon commenced a certain decay of his mental as well as his physicial powers. He could not realize that the partner of his life was dead. He imagined that her absence was caused by a visit to distant relatives, and that she would come back again to bear him company as in former years. At length he failed to recognize even his children and grandchildren, but still the consciousness that his wife was absent, and the expectation that she would soon return, remained as a comforting hallucination. That indistinct and wavering recollection of his beloved wife was the last trace of memory in him." The late Mrs. Baker was a daughter. Two daughters are living,—Mrs. E. A. Penniman and Miss Mary Blood.

John F. Roe came from Long Island in 1828 and kept store with I. P. Foster in the old Tabernacle building, which stood near the forks of the river. He kept store in the Tabernacle about a year and then moved to a building now used as a dwelling, on the corner of Main and Park Streets, just opposite the Wayne County House. In 1833 he built the house and store where he now lives. He gave up active business in 1878, but is still living—the oldest resident of the borough. About ten years after coming here he married Ruth Sayer, of Montrose. He has a son, Henry, and two daughters —Mrs. W. W. Weston and Mrs. H. M. Atherton.

Zenas H. Russell was another arrival of 1828. He came from Madison County, N. Y., where he was born July 2, 1806. Very soon after his arrival he opened a store, and he continued in the mercantile business for many years. On the incorporation of the borough he was elected a member of the Council, and he served in that capacity about half of the time until his death. He was very active in bringing about public improvements. He was elected a director of the Honesdale Bank in 1836, vice-president in 1856 and president in 1863. Mr. Russell was married, September 17, 1830, to Lucy Ann, daughter of Charles Forbes, the pioneer proprietor of the Wayne County House. He died May 15, 1878. His wife is still living. They had three children—Henry Z., Mrs. Robert J. Menner and Mrs. Wm. H. Dimmick.

Stephen Brush came, in 1828, from Fairfield County, Conn., and resided here until his death, in January, 1860, aged sixty-eight years. He united with the Presbyterian Church in 1829 and was chosen ruling elder the following year.

John Kelly, a native of Ireland, arrived in 1828 and went immediately into the service of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, in whose employ he remained for thirty-two years. He was afterwards a contractor on the Honesdale Branch of the Erie Railroad. He was much interested in local affairs and served some time in the Council. He died March 28, 1880, aged eighty-two years. He had three daughters, the wives of Michael, Edward and the late James Brown.

Thomas H. R. Tracy, who came here in 1829, was born in Connecticut, and while yet in his childhood moved, with his parents, to Columbus, Chenango County, New York. His father was a farmer and blacksmith, dividing his time between his agricultural labors and those at the anvil, and his mother a true woman, performing the duties of her daily life with fidelity and affection. His youth was passed on the farm and in his father's shop, and his education limited to such rudimentary instruction as was afforded by the common schools of that day. His prompt, liberal and earnest public spirit placed his sound judgment and excellent business sense at interest for the benefit of his fellow-citizens, and much that tended to the prosperity of the town was born of his forethought and enterprise. Soon after coming to Honesdale he was appointed superintendent of the Pennsylvania Section of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, a post which he occupied until his death, which occurred May 4, 1856. Throughout his entire administration he so combined justice to the company and generosity towards its employees that he constantly enjoyed the confidence and respect of both. He was identified with the corporate existence of the borough almost from the beginning, and was for many years its chief burgess, and an active partisan of whatever should promote its prosperity. In 1856 he was chosen one of the associate judges of the county, and the discharge of his duties on the bench was marked by the same earnest appreciation of responsibility and desire to do equal justice to all, that marked his life as a private citizen. He had a son, Miles L. Tracy, who is deceased. The wife of Judge Henry M. Seely is a daughter.

Russell F. Lord was one of the early comers and one of the original engineers and managers of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company. His brother, Solomon Z., long in the employ of the company at Hawley, was cotemporary in arrival.

Charles P. Clark was among the early arrivals and one of the first school-teachers of the settlement.

Edward Murray, one of the earliest settlers, was born in the county of Fermanagh, Ireland, in 1788. He emigrated to America in early manhood in 1809; re-visited his native country in 1819, and remained there one year, returning to his adopted country in 1820. He came to Honesdale when the town was in its infancy. He helped to complete the Delaware and Hudson Canal, and immediately upon its completion commenced boating, and thus was one of its pioneer boatmen. He sold various kinds of goods along the canal, hence the title "Captain." He maintained a good standing in business for thirty years.

In 1846 his chief clerk, Mr. Henigan, inventoried his property and pronounced it worth one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, regardless of cash on hand, the amount of which was not known. He had many reverses, mostly caused by fires, which induced him to sell most of his real estate in Honesdale. Mr. Murray, to say the least, was a remarkable man. Although not educated, his good judgment and business tact enabled him to transact and carry on his large business enterprises successfully. He always subscribed to public enterprises, and was especially very liberal in his contributions for religious purposes, no matter what profession or sect. He bought and paid for the land upon which now stands the Irish Catholic Church, and the old grave-yard in Honesdale.

In his later years he removed to his farm in Cherry Ridge, and there he died July 4, 1868. He was twice married, both of his wives being daughters of Martin O'Reilly, of Cochecton. The second, Mary, is still living. Mr. Murray was the father of four children, one of whom is Philip R. Murray, county treasurer.

Joseph B. Walton came to Honesdale in the fall of 1829 and took charge of the Delaware and Hudson office as collector. He was prominently identified with the Episcopal Church from its organization, in 1832, until his death, in 1848. He was born in Ira, Rutland County, Vt., in 1785, but removed to Cherry Valley, N. Y., when a child and subsequently to Cooperstown, where he served as sheriff.

William W. Parmenter, of Poundstock, Cornwall County, England, came to the village in 1831, and lived here until 1854, when he removed to Ohio, where he died in 1882.

Ezra Hand, long prominently identified with the business interests of the borough, came in 1832. He resided here until his death, in 1875. His widow still survives, as does also a son, H. C. Hand, who is connected with the Savings Bank.

William Turner, who, as a boy, drove the horses which first brought the directors of the Canal Company by boat to Honesdale, came to the place and entered upon the business of building boats with James Pinckney in 1832. He afterwards started a boat-yard at Leonard's mill, and some years after Mr. Pinckney's death married his widow. He was elected sheriff in 1858. His death occurred in 1884.

Elkanah Patmore, who came from Orange County, N. Y., in 1830, was the first wagon-maker in the town and carried on that business for many years. He held the office of coroner for a long period and was also a justice of the peace.

David Cory and his son, Stephen G., were among the early comers and the latter worked for a time for Mr. Patmore. Stephen G. Cory came to this county in 1822 and lived with an uncle in what is now Texas township, until the settlement of Honesdale was begun. After learning the wagon-making trade of Patmore, he carried on the business for himself and built the shop at the corner of Second and Twelfth Streets, which he carried on until about 1870, since which time it has been leased. He is still living. His father remained a resident of Honesdale until his death, in 1864.

John D. Delezene and his son, Joseph C. (who is still living and one of the oldest residents of the borough), came from New York City in 1833. The former was the first merchant who ever started a dry-goods store above Chatham Street, in the metropolis, opening at Grand and Allen Streets in an attic, in 1821 or 1822. Shortly after coming to Honesdale he bought out the house of Hand, Kirtland, Roe & Co., at the site of the Herald office, and began a partnership with Benjamin B. Beach. In later years he became a cartman and was killed by a runaway in 1851. His age was fifty-eight years. Joseph C. Delezene has been engaged in merchandizing and other lines of business during the greater part of his life in the borough.

David Beers, commonly called "General" Beers, came in 1833. He was born in Morris County, N. J., and was a soldier in the War of 1812. He died in December, 1879. Mrs. S. G. Cory and Mrs. Bassett were daughters of "General" Beers.

David Tarbox, who was among the early settlers, was the first justice of the peace.

Gilbert Knapp, who came in 1834, from Sullivan County, N. Y., to Seelyville, and a few years later to Honesdale, opened the first hardware store here in 1847, and carried it on with A. H. Bowers, A. H. Neal, O. N. Spettigue and several other partners until he sold to his son Charles, in 1884.

Moses B. Bennett, a native of Bernardstown, Mass., came to the borough in 1834 from Port Jervis, N. Y. He was born in 1810 and died March 2, 1879. Two sons now reside in Honesdale.

Whitman Brown, a native of Rhode Island, who came in 1835 and was for thirty years an employe, in a trusted position, of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, was killed on one of the planes of the Gravity Railroad in 1865.

Samuel Dean, who was one of the pioneers and had led an eventful life, died here in 1870, in his eighty-seventh year. He was a seaman in the United States service in 1812, and in 1815 was one of the crew of the "Northumberland," selected by the British to transfer Napoleon to St. Helena.

Stephen D. Ward came to the borough in 1839, entered at that time the Honesdale Bank as a clerk and became cashier in 1842, which position he held until his death, in 1874.

B. B. Smith, of whom an extended biography appears in the department upon educational history, came also in 1839.

William Reed, who was born in Salisbury, Conn., July 5, 1802, came to Bethany in 1832 and to Honesdale in 1840. He was engaged in the mercantile business with John F. Roe until 1870, and died in 1879.

Edmund Power, a comparatively early comer, was a native of Grinstead, England, born September 12, 1785. He died in December, 1858. His son, of the same name, has long been a merchant of the borough.

Cornelius Hornbeck, who was long active in business affairs, came to Honesdale in 1841, as did also Isaiah Snyder and his brother Asa. They engaged in merchandizing and the former carried on a store here until recent years. He was elected associate judge in 1866. He died in Harrisburg in 1886, aged sixty-five years.

Henry Ward Stone, another prominent merchant, came to the borough in 1846 from Mount Pleasant, whither he had come in 1818 from Guilford, Conn., where he was born in 1791. He devoted himself exclusively to his store until 1850, when he purchased a tannery at Beech Pond, which, with different partners, he carried on until 1867, when he disposed of his interest and retired from business, from that time until his death, in 1881, living at the home of his son-in-law, Judge C. P. Waller. Mrs. H. C. Hand and Mrs. E. F. Torrey were his daughters by his wife, Catharine W. Niven, of Newburgh, N. Y., whom he married in 1823.

Many other prominent old-time residents of the borough will be found mentioned, and, in some cases, the subjects of extended notices in other chapters of this work and other department of this chapter.

WASHINGTON IRVING AND IRVING CLIFF.—The rugged and picturesque cliff rising three hundred and eighteen feet above the waters of the Lackawaxen, and forming the boldest and most beautiful object in the landscape of the region, was named in honor of Washington Irving, and will serve for all time as a reminder of the gentle and graceful man of letters, who "needs no monument" save his works. Irving visited Honesdale in the summer of 1841[1] (not in 1844), in company with the directors of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, among whom were his especial friends, Philip Hone and Mr. Brevoort.

It is not probable that the great author was here on July 4, 1841, as has been asserted by some, but that the time of his visit was later in that month, for he wrote a letter from Honesdale under date of August 1, 1841, which appears in the collection of his miscellaneous writings, and is reproduced in these pages. Further than this, the best account of Irving's visit, and the only circumstantial one, from Rev. Willard Richardson, does not mention an exact date, (as would undoubtedly have been the case had the day been the anniversary of independence,) and does not speak of any large or public celebration, but of an informal visit to the cliff and "Ladywood Lane" by a few gentlemen,—those named, besides the author of Knickerbocker, being Messrs. Hone, Brevoort and Richardson.

The account of Irving's visit and of the application of his name to the cliff, furnished by Rev. Mr. Richardson, who, in 1841, had a school in Honesdale, is as follows:

"I was not there in 1844, but was at the time of his visit in 1841, in company with the directors of the Del. & Hud. Canal Co., and took him in a buggy around Honesdale and up to Bethany.

"The next day he and Philip Hone and Mr. Brevoort visited my school and addressed the young ladies and gentlemen.

"We then strolled across the Dyberry, to a shady avenue named 'Ladywood Lane' by Mr. Irving.

"We had a lively time, and much pleasantry about Mr. Irving having climbed those rugged rocks the day before.[2] We came to a spring, and as I had a cup, a toast was called for. I gave—

"'LADYWOOD LANE—christened by the author of Knickerbocker, who will be remembered as long as an American lives, or a Dutchman smokes his pipe or drinks his beer.'

"The cup was then handed to Mr. Irving, who gave—

"'HONESDALE—a memento of an enterprising man of an enterprising age.'

"The cup was then passed to Mr. Hone, who gave—

"'IRVING'S CLIFF—the dignified and sleepless guardian of Honesdale, made famous by the weary footsteps of one who has charmed the world with his writings.'

"The cup was then handed to Mr. Brevoort, who gave—

"'IRVING'S CLIFF AND IRVING—the dignity of the one and the fame of the other destined to last until rocks shall melt and authors be no more.'"

The road christened by Mr. Irving as "Ladywood Lane" is the old abandoned turnpike which passed along the east side of Dyberry Creek and through what is now Glen Dyberry Cemetery, and the spring referred to was the "rock spring" in the cemetery, which still pours forth its refreshing waters.

Irving's letter from Honesdale heretofore alluded to reads as follows:

"HONESDALE, August 1, 1841.

"MY DEAR SISTER:

"I write from among the mountains in the upper part of Pennsylvania, from a pretty village which has recently sprung into existence as the deposit of a great coal region, and which is called after our friend, Philip Hone, who was extremely efficient in directing enterprise into this quarter. I came here along the Delaware and Hudson Canal, which extends from the Hudson River, near the Catskill Mountains, upward of a hundred miles into the interior, traversing some of the most beautiful parts (as to scenery) of the State of New York and penetrating the State of Pennsylva-

[1] It has been averred and pertinaciously argued by Dr. H. Hollister that the visit was upon the 4th of July, 1844, but that 1841 was the year of the visit has been fully proven.

[2] In view of Irving's ascent of the cliff the "day before," the pleasant occurrences of which Mr. Richardson writes, it may be inferred that the cliff was then named. Some writers upon this much-disputed topic say that the name was conferred by James M. Porter upon that occasion.

nia. I accompanied the directors of the Delaware and Hudson Canal in their annual visit of examination. [Among the directors are Philip Hone and my friend Brevoort.] I do not know when I have made a more gratifying excursion with respect to natural scenery, or more interesting from the stupendous works of art. The canal is laid a great part of the way along romantic valleys, watered by the Rondout, the Lackawaxen, &c. For many miles it is built up along the face of perpendicular precipices rising into stupendous cliffs with overhanging forests, or jutting out into vast promontories, while on the other side you look down upon the Delaware, foaming and roaring below you at the foot of an immense wall or embankment which supports the canal. Altogether it is one of the most daring undertakings I have ever witnessed, to carry an artificial river over rocky mountains, and up the most savage and almost impracticable defiles; and all this, too, has been achieved by the funds of an association composed of a handful of individuals. For upward of ninety miles I went through a constant succession of scenery that would have been famous had it existed in any part of Europe; the Catskill Mountains to the north, the Shawangunk Mountains to the south, and between them lovely valleys, with the most luxuriant woodlands and picturesque streams. All this is a region about which I had heard nothing—a region entirely unknown to fame; but so it is in our country. We have some main routes for the fashionable traveler, along which he is hurried in steamboats and railroad cars; while on every side extend regions of beauty, about which he hears and knows nothing. Some of the most enchanting scenes I have beheld since my return to the United States have been in out-of-the-way places into which I have been accidentally led.

"WASHINGTON IRVING."

INCORPORATION—CIVIL LIST OF THE BOROUGH.—The village of Honesdale was incorporated as a borough under an act passed January 28, 1831, the first section of which read as follows:

"Sec. 1. That the village of Honesdale, in the county of Wayne, shall be and the same is hereby erected into a borough, which shall be called the Borough of Honesdale, and shall be bounded and limited as follows, to wit: Beginning at the most southern corner of the first lock upon the Delaware and Hudson Canal, below the basin at the head of the canal; thence by a course south sixty-seven degrees west twenty-four rods to the western line of the Indian Orchard Tract; thence by the said line and an extension thereof north twenty-three degrees three hundred and forty-six rods to the line of the farm late Levi Schoonover's; thence by the last-named line north sixty-seven degrees east one hundred and five rods to Dyberry Creek; and thence southward by Dyberry Creek to its junction with the West Branch of the Lackawaxen River and by the Lackawaxen to the place of beginning."

Section 2 provided that the "inhabitants of the borough, entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly, having resided in the borough at least six months immediately preceding the election, and within that time paid a borough tax (if such tax shall have been assessed), shall have power, on the second Friday of May next, to meet at the house of Charles Forbes, inn-keeper, in the said borough, and annually thereafter, at such convenient place in the said borough as shall have been fixed upon by the by-laws of the corporation for that purpose, and then and there, between the hours of one and six in the afternoon, elect by ballot one respectable citizen residing therein, who shall be styled the chief burgess, one other citizen who shall be styled the assistant burgess, and five citizens to be a Town Council; and shall also elect, as aforesaid, one citizen as high constable," etc.[1]

The election was duly held Friday, May 13th, at the hotel of Charles Forbes, and resulted in the choice of David Tarbox as chief burgess, D. B. Wilcox as assistant burgess, Thomas T. Hays, Russel Spencer, T. M. Vail, Alanson Blood and Elam Woodward members of the Town Council, and Isaac P. Foster high constable.

Upon the 16th of May, the day being the first Monday after the election, the Council held their initial meeting at the house of David Tarbox, elected as their president Thomas T. Hays, and made the following appointments of minor officers, viz.: Town Clerk, John F. Roe;

[1] The act from which the foregoing is taken constituted in its entirety the borough charter. It has been, from time to time, supplemented by other acts, viz.: Act of April 15, 1835 (P. L. 371); of March 7, 1840 (P. L. 77); of June 13, 1840 (P. L. 669); of April 8, 1848 (P. L. 385); of April 21, 1852 (P. L. 384); of May 7, 1855 (P. L. 471); of February 12, 1862 (P. L. 26); of March 22, 1866 (P. L. 290); of March 9, 1867 (P. L. 377); of April 12, 1869 (P. L. 875); of March 27, 1872 (P. L. 589), and by some others.

Treasurer, Zenas H. Russel; Street Supervisor, Charles Forbes; Clerk of the Market, Alonzo Bentley; Collector, Leonard Graves. The first fathers of the new borough, upon the conclusion of their brief primal meeting, adjourned to meet at the house of A. G. Waldron on the 30th of May.

The second meeting was more extended and more important than the first. The Council passed several ordinances, called in its records "acts," and transacted some other business. It is probable that this session nearly exhausted the zeal of the body, for no record of further proceedings, except of two meetings of unimportant character, appears until 1832, when the annual election was held.

The Council was extremely economical. The first ordinance engrossed upon the record, entitled "An Act for the compensation of the Borough officers" provided "That the compensation of the several officers erected by virtue of an act entitled 'an act to erect the village of Honesdale. . . into a Borough,' shall be six cents for every day necessarily spent in the execution of the duties of their respective offices."

"An Act to prohibit horse-racing" was the title of the second ordinance passed. It read as follows: "Be it ordained . . . that from and after the fifteenth day of June next all racing, running, pacing or trotting of horses, mares or geldings, for money, goods or chattels, shall be and are hereby declared to be common nuisances and offenses against the Borough of Honesdale, and the authors, parties, contrivers and abettors thereof shall[1] of twenty dollars for each and every such offense."

"An ordinance prohibiting puppet shows" was the title of the third enactment. It decreed "That from and after the fifteenth day of June next all puppet shows, jugglery, slight of hand performances, rope or wire dancing, Balancing or other Mountebank feats and such performances and exhibitions are hereby forbidden and prohibited in this Borough."

It was to be the duty of the high constable "to make diligent enquiry after such exhibitors," who, upon a warrant issued for the purpose, should be brought before the chief burgess, and, upon conviction, be fined ten dollars for each and every offence.

Other ordinances prohibited the running at large of swine, exhibitions of fire-works,—"rockets, fire balls, crackers,"—etc.

The third and final meeting of the year was held at David Tarbox's house on June 20, 1831. Ordinances were passed prohibiting the burning of shavings, straw, etc., in the streets, and prohibiting horses and cattle from running at large. It was resolved at this meeting, "That a letter be addressed to Mr. John Torrey by the president, requesting Mr. Torrey, in his travels to Easton, Philadelphia, etc. (as we have understood he is going to those places soon), to obtain such information as he can, conveniently, respecting the arranging and laying out of streets, the proportions of the sidewalks with the breadth of the streets and such other information with regard to the regulations of Boroughs, as he shall deem necessary." Herein appears the earliest official action tending toward the beautifying of the town—a work which has ever since been well carried on.

It is worthy of note in this connection, that in 1847 the borough authorities ordered that "two or three hundred shade-trees should be set out, with proper protection, in the public square and burying-ground."

In 1853 the borough had so far progressed towards its present condition of embowered beauty that it had by actual count (made by some painstaking person) in its streets and park fourteen hundred and ninety-one shade-trees, of which three hundred and fourteen were upon Third Street. Commenting upon this fact in his paper almost a quarter of a century ago, Francis B. Penniman said,—

"We watch the growth of these trees from year to year, not only with pleasure, but with pride, for they are destined to be as well one of the chief ornaments of the town as a source of comfort and delight."

Fire Department and Fires.—The first fire in Honesdale of which there is any record, and certainly the first of any consequence, occurred in the summer of 1840. It was quite a disastrous fire—the more so from the fact that the people were destitute of any apparatus for fighting the flames, and without organization other than possibly a "bucket brigade." The loss occasioned by the lack of proper utensils led the citizens to consider their situation, and they came to the conclusion that the town should possess a fire-engine with which to meet future emergencies. A petition was consequently drawn up and presented to the Council, setting forth this view. The first names upon this petition were those of John F. Roe and Alanson Blood, and it contained many more signatures of the then prominent property-holders and active citizens. The Council appointed T. H. R. Tracy and T. J. Hubbell a committee to act in the matter, but they were unwilling to do so until they had tested the spirit of the people. They recommended that a memorial, authorizing the purchase of an engine and other apparatus, be circulated among the citizens for the reception of their signatures, which was accordingly done. It was duly signed by two hundred and nine out of the two hundred and forty-four tax-payers of the borough. Now the passage of a law authorizing the Council to borrow fifteen hundred dollars was found necessary, and was secured. The preliminary steps having been thus taken, Joseph Neal, cashier of the Honesdale Bank, and Mr. Tracy were appointed a committee to make the purchase; but they failed to do so, perhaps because they could not borrow the money needed on the credit of the borough. The matter was dropped and it was not until October, 1842, that John D. Delezene was appointed to go to New York and make the long delayed purchase. On November 22d he reported that he had bought a machine for seven hundred dollars. The hand-engine "Deluge" was duly received by a fire company of the same name, which had in the mean time been organized, and of which John D. Delezene was the foreman. It had to be repainted, and the company thought it necessary to procure resplendently decorated buckets and provide themselves with uniforms before they made a public demonstration, and so it was not until some time in 1843 that the little hand-engine was dragged out of its house and through the streets before an admiring populace, by a long line of red-shirted firemen. It was not long before the "Deluge" came to share the glory of the "Rescue."

Such was the beginning of the Honesdale Fire Department. Eventually other and larger hand-engines were procured, and it was many years before they were superseded by the steamers.

The frequent occurrence of fires in the summer of 1853 led the citizens to take measures for protection, through the better organization of the Fire Department. At a meeting held July 11th, there were present Colonel R. L. Seely, Stephen C. Cory, H. B. Beardslee, S. F. Dimmick, C. P. Waller, S. E. Dimmick, F. B. Penniman, Rev. Mr. Rowland, F. M. Crane, Esq., William Turner and many others. It was resolved "that a committee of five be appointed, with William Turner as chairman, to form a Fire Company to take charge of one of the engines, and that a like committee, with S. G. Corey as chairman, be appointed to form another, to take charge of the second engine, and that it be recommended to the Town Council to give the control of the engines and directions thereof at fires to said companies, when so formed, subject to such regulations as the companies may adopt under the approval of the Council."

A. Farnham was appointed as chairman of a committee to organize a hook-and-ladder company, and others were appointed to solicit citizens to become active or honorary members of the fire organization, those choosing to belong to the latter class to pay the sum of two dollars each per annum towards its support. The department was organized on this basis.

[1] Mr. Dimmick was town clerk or secretary of the Council from May 10, 1844, to May 4, 1863, except one year, 1853, when E. B. Burnham was elected, and he then served in Burnham's place.

In 1875 was purchased the first of the two steamers, a Silsby, for which the sum of four thousand seven hundred dollars was paid. This was placed in custody of the Protection Fire Company, which then disposed of its hand engine.

Fires have been of quite frequent occurrence in the borough, and several of them have been very destructive. The first of which we have any details happened one night early in December, 1844, and was the largest which had occurred up to that time. It originated in the store of Mr. A. J. Thorp, whose entire stock of goods was destroyed. The building belonging to Messrs. Dimmick & Cummings was totally destroyed, as were also others owned by N. M. Bartlett (occupied as a store by R. H. More), E. Rogers and George Brown. A blacksmith-shop and lime-house adjoining one of these were torn down to keep the fire from communicating with a large building owned by J. D. Delezene and occupied as a store and dwelling by Messrs. I. & O. Snyder, which at one time was in great hazard. A supply of water being obtained, it was put entirely out of danger, but the Messrs. Snyder suffered severely, probably to the amount of one thousand dollars, by the removal of their goods into the street.

A card published in the Democrat after this fire shows more completely who were the sufferers and affords grounds for the inference that they did not suffer very badly; for few of the signers were mentioned in the newspaper account of the fire:

"We, the undersigned sufferers by the late fire in this Borough, avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity of communicating our expressions of gratitude to all persons present, for their timely exertions to rescue and preserve property; and also to the 'Rescue Fire Company' we return many thanks for their important services.

During the night of Friday, April 25, 1851, one of the most destructive fires that ever occurred in the town broke out in the building owned by Edward Murray, and situated on the west side of Front, just south of the intersection of Eighth Street. At this time the fire apparatus of the town consisted of one hand-engine, and the effective service that it might do under favorable conditions was limited by dis organized effort. How the fire originated was never known. About half-past ten o'clock at night flames were discovered bursting from the roof of the building, and before the alarm had been communicated to a large part of the citizens, a most destructive conflagration had gained headway. It happened, too, that at this time some repairs which the canal basin was undergoing were incomplete, and when the engine was brought to the scene, nearly half an hour was consumed in waiting for a water supply. Meanwhile the flames were spreading in every direction, and the few lines of buckets which the more self-possessed citizens established were insufficient, even to save the goods and merchandise piled up in the streets. Men, women and children ran frantically hither and thither, watching the flames lick up fully one-third of the mercantile establishments of the town, and cover the heart of the town with blackened ruins.

The engine at last got water, was manned by scores of eager citizens, and the stream directed against the southern advance of the flames, held them in check, and saved further destruction.

Some sixty-four persons suffered losses by the fire, and the amount reached over one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, only about fifty-five thousand dollars of which was covered by insurance. To the northward, the flames communicated only to an adjoining building; but they crossed Front Street, and swept southward, on both sides of the avenue, to midway between Sixth and Seventh Streets. On the south side of Eighth Street, between Front and Second, everything was destroyed; and on both sides of Seventh, between Front and Second, all was burned except a dwelling-house belonging to Isaiah Snyder, on the southeast corner. Most of the property destroyed was only partially covered by insurance, if covered at all. The losses were as follows: A. Strong, $2500; Fox & Van Osdale; Edward Murray, $3000; J. & T. Grady, $2500; Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, warehouse, $6000; M. Morss, $1200; S. Z. Lord, $2000; J. D. Delezene, $3000; A. Cummings, $1200; William Weiss, $500; Bowers & Co., $6500; Isaiah Snyder, $3500 on building, $14,000 on stock; Isaiah Snyder, two shops and warehouse, $500; Reuben Berry, $200; William Shend, $200; John Goldsmith, $200; Peter Miller, shops, $1000; Francis Conley, $400; Lord & Dimmick, building, $1400; Hornbeck & Keator, $4000; Asa Snyder, building, $1000; Thomas Cornell, Empire Block, $6000; Wilbur & Patmore, $6500, including loss of packet "Fashion" and line-boat "Daniel Webster;" I. P. Foster & Sons, $2500; West & Plumb, $1000; Knight & Van Kirk, $600; John Hazen, $400; Johnson & Chittenden, $5000; Thomas E. Rogers, $1500; G. W. Delezene, $1400; G. W. Deverill, $400; Mr. Center, $150; Mr. Potter, $150; Masonic Lodge room, ———; C. H. Rogers, $500; Canal Basin bridge, $300; S. G. Throop, $500; Richard Henwood, $3000; Dr. Roskopf, $500; Mr. Brown, $200; M. B. Bennett, $1200; Bennett & Moore, $4500; G. P. Heap, $1200; Mr. Wonthall, $2000; W. H. & S. E. Dimmick, building, $1200; Mrs. Harrison, $1200; Mrs. Powell, $1200; Philip Slochbour, $3000; Mrs. Stunner, $1600; M. Levy, $2000; Thomas Cornell, $2000; Mrs. Murray, $600; Stone & Graves, $1000; Malone's smithy, $300; McLaughlin, wagon-shop, $300; S. G. Throop, law-office, $150; Mrs. Wilcox, J. B. Dennison, A. & E. Reed, Barnes & Harlen, Charles Schlager, Mrs. Loomis and many others, suffered damage by having their property wet or stolen.

At five o'clock on Sunday morning, December 26, 1852, a fire broke out in the second story of Mr. Isaiah Snyder's store on Front Street. The flames made rapid progress and soon reached the store of Messrs. Strong & Stilson, adjoining. Two fire-engines were brought into service and were worked with great efficiency, while the forcing pump of the Delaware and Hudson Company was also brought into requisition. The flames were speedily brought under control and prevented from entering Edward Murray's block, immediately contiguous, though the stores mentioned were entirely consumed. The building in which they were kept was the property of Dr. A. Strong, and was valued at about two thousand one hundred dollars. Mr. Snyder's loss was about seven thousand dollars over and above insurance, which was ten thousand dollars, and Messrs. Strong & Stilson's absolute loss was about fifteen hundred dollars. The origin of this fire was a mystery.

Early in the morning of July 12, 1853, a fire occurred on Sixth Street, which consumed a cabinet-shop, a blacksmith-shop, a large stable for the accommodation of canal horses, building known as Military Hall and an extensive bakery. The cabinet-shop belonged to C. P. & G. G. Waller, and was occupied by two Germans. All of the other buildings belonged to Mr. George Briteubacher, whose loss was from four thousand dollars to five thousand dollars. The fire was supposed to be the work of an incendiary, and an arrest was soon after made upon the charge of arson, but the person so charged was not convicted.

The stables on Second Street, in the rear of the Mansion House, were burned on Friday morning, September 22, 1853. The fire caught accidentally in the livery stable of Allis Whitney, and six horses belonging to him were burned to death. He had no insurance and suffered a loss of fifteen hundred dollars. From Whitney's stables the fire spread to the hotel and stage stables, but from these all of the property was removed.

An incendiary fire occurred at five o'clock on the morning of Monday, December 18, 1853, in the store and stable of Hannigan & White, on Front Street, which entirely destroyed the building, and also the dwelling, store and stable of George Whitney, occupied by Thomas Coyne, the buildings owned by James Moylan, and occupied by several tenants, and badly damaged the property of Frederick R. Marshall. The total loss was about ten thousand dollars, one-half of which was sustained by Hannigan & White, who lost not only their buildings and stock of merchandise, but four valuable horses, harness, hay, grain, etc. There was no doubt that this fire was the work of an incendiary. Two unsuccessful attempts to burn other buildings were made by the miscreants the same morning.

The house and stable of Mrs. Hughes and the German hotel and bakery kept by William Wefferling were burned on Sunday night, September 23, 1854, causing a total loss of more than five thousand dollars. Only a few days later, September 30th, a fire occurred in the lower part of the town, which was known to be of incendiary origin, the Delaware and Hudson watchman having seen two men run from the building just as the fire broke out. The fire was first seen in a barn owned by William Finnerty from which it spread in several directions, destroying various dwellings and other buildings. The Council offered a reward of one thousand dollars for the detection of the incendiaries.

A fire which broke out in the stable of Mr. Schrifer, on Front Street, April 11, 1855, spread quickly beyond control, both north and south, there being no water in the canal basin, and destroyed Francis Von Beck's store and stable, the former occupied by Mr. Schrifer as a grocery; M. A. Bidwell's building, in which were two stores occupied by John Hannegan and Mrs. A. Miller, and some dwellings; M. & J. O'Neil's store and stable; E. M. Genung's blacksmith-shop, and the building owned by John Kelly and James Baker, in which were the stores of J. & M. Brown and William Holland, and a number of families residing in the upper rooms. The aggregate damage was not less than ten thousand dollars, almost entirely covered by insurance. The fire was universally believed to be the work of an incendiary.

Another disastrous fire broke out in a large building known as Cornell's Hall, located on Front Street, near the canal basin, on the evening of December 3, 1855. The flames were first discovered in a long passage about six feet wide that ran between two stores and corresponded to the entrance to the hall, and almost as soon as the alarm was given the fire burst out and spread in every direction. The firemen were on hand promptly, but their labors were directed chiefly at saving buildings to which the flames had not already communicated. The damage done amounted to about thirty thousand dollars and the principal public hall of the town was destroyed. This was owned by T. Cornell & Co., and the building which contained it had been completed only three years before, at a cost of seventy-five hundred dollars; it was insured for five thousand dollars. Among the other sufferers were P. W. Slochbouer, $2000, $500 insurance; Judah Levi, $5000, uninsured; John Grady, $5000, insured; T. Cornell & Co., warehouse, $400; Hard, Gilbert & Palmer, hides, $5000; S. G. Throop, $1000; Patrick Burns, $100; Miss Langes, $900, insured; G. L. Cooper, $1600, insured. Several other properties were injured.

On Wednesday following the fire Timothy Grady, Michael Grady and Patrick McCasey were arrested on the charge of incendiarism and held in three thousand dollars bail each to answer for setting fire to Cornell's Hall.

About four o'clock on the morning of August 12, 1856, a fire broke out in Russell's Hall, and spread rapidly in both directions. The building and contents were destroyed. The building was the property of Z. H. Russell and cost two thousand dollars, about half of which was covered by insurance. The upper floor contained the lodge-rooms of two orders of Odd-Fellows, and each lost two hundred dollars. J. H. Dunny, the Mansion House, Mr. Peterson, Thomas Hocker, G. W. Deverell and Hand & Kirtland were all losers, but had some insurance.

On Tuesday evening, May 16, 1871, at about a quarter of eight o'clock, as the row of buildings from Reed's Arcade on the south to the lateral basin of the canal on the north were, as usual, thronged with customers, fire was discovered in the rear of the second story of Aaron Cummings' building. It spread rapidly and, although the engines were soon on the ground, caused a damage of over one hundred thousand dollars. The sufferers were Judge Isaiah Snyder (the best and largest store in town), on building and goods, to the amount of $48,000; R. J. Menner & Co, on stock, $8000; Miss Lavina Dimmick, on building, $2000; A. Cummings, on building and goods, $5000; Knopp & Jenkins, on building and stock, $14,000; Gilbert Knapp, $8000; W. W. Weston & Co., $10,000; W. W. Weston, personally, $10,000; F. H. Rockwell, on household furniture, $2000; Salmon & Delezenne, $1500; Freeman, Barents & Co., $1750, and numerous others in smaller amounts.

On December 12, 1871, occurred another fire which destroyed the Commercial Block, a handsome brick structure, erected two years before by W. B. Holmes, upon the east side of Main Street, nearly opposite the Delaware and Hudson Company's offices. The origin of the fire was unknown. Mr. Holmes' loss was approximately twenty-one thousand dollars, one-third of which was upon the building and two-thirds upon his stock of groceries. J. M. Bauman, who owned one-half of the block, lost about seven thousand dollars, and Hartley & Rogers, who kept a hardware-store in that portion of the block, suffered to the extent of twelve thousand dollars or thereabouts, which was nearly covered by insurance. Durland & Torrey were heavy sufferers from damage by fire, water and removal. Dr. Brady's drug-store was also consumed, and a number of other business men experienced minor losses, the aggregate probably reaching fifty thousand dollars. The damage to Jadwin & Terrill's building, and the loss entailed by their forced removal, amounted to twenty-five hundred dollars.

A most destructive blaze swept a portion of the business district on the 8th of January, 1875, when fifteen buildings were left in ruins, twenty business firms or individuals burned out, and nearly or quite two hundred thousand dollars damage caused. This time the fire had its origin in what was known as the "Old Throop Building," owned by S. G. Throop, of Stroudsburg, and occupied by William Seeman, jeweler. It had evidently been communicated to the floor by a defective stove, and although it had assumed an apparently small headway when discovered at half-past two in the morning, by people returning from an entertainment at the Casino Club-rooms, it was not so easily put out as they thought it could be, but, on the contrary, got beyond control and very quickly wrapped the whole building in flames. The building stood on the east side of Main Street, adjoining the lateral canal basin, and nearly opposite the Herald office. The fire spread from it through the entire block, burning everything as far south as Sixth Street. The fire companies were promptly on hand, but were greatly crippled by lack of water. The principal losses (most of them wholly or partly insured) were as follows: S. G. Throop, building, $1500; Mrs. John Sheffler, millinery, etc., $1200; William Seeman, jewelry, etc., $10,500; W. J. Katz & Co., merchandise, $9000; F. Dittrich, building, $8000, hats, caps and furs, $3000, furniture, $1600; Hartung & Morrish, meat market, $1000; Isaiah Snyder, building, $12,000, stock, $38,000; M. B. Bennett, building, occupied by Baker & Bennett, $3000; J. Bloomingdale, dry-goods, $3000; Freeman Bros., building, occupied by Freeman, Barents & Co., $2500; Freeman, Barents & Co., clothing, trunks, etc., $8000; William Weiss, groceries, building, $4000, stock $3500, furniture, etc., $3000; Mrs. Powell, building, occupied by S. Levi, $2500; S. Levi, clothing, etc., $4000; Mrs. Edward Taeubner, Casino building, $4000; Casino Club, $1000; Isaac Schloauker, clothing, $1000; Samuel Bros., clothing, building, $3000, stock, $7000; Mrs. Frankel, furniture, etc., $2000; Isaac R. Schenck, groceries, building, $2000, stock, $4000; James Matthews, harness, building, $3000, stock, $2000; Thomas Coyne, estate, brick hotel, $15,000, stock and furniture, $3000. There were many others who suffered smaller losses, quite a number of them being owners of property upon the west side of the street, where the buildings were in some cases badly scorched, glass broken, etc.

The Snyder building, on Front Street, opposite Jadwin's drug-store, owned by Mrs. Julia Snyder, formerly of the borough, but more recently of Harrisburg, was burned on the evening of September 1, 1882. Bunnell & Deming, who had the store on the ground-floor of the building, and also storage-rooms above, lost a large proportion of their stock, which was valued at about twenty thousand dollars, on which there was nine thousand dollars insurance. The Grand Army Post, which had rooms in the building, lost everything in them. The fire originated from the explosion of a lamp. It was at least the third fire on this site.

Several fires, less destructive than these, have occurred in the borough, and on March 11, 1885, there was another of extensive character, which, originating in a saloon north of the Foster Block, on Front Street, swept away several stores and caused large losses.

THE POST-OFFICE. — The post-office in Honesdale was established in 1828, previous to which time the few early settlers of the village received their mail at Bethany.

Following is the succession of postmasters, with approximate dates of appointment:

Charles Forbes	April, 1828
Thomas T. Hayes	February, 1833
Jos. B. Walton	June, 1838
Wm. F. Rogers	June, 1841
T. H. R. Tracy	October, 1842
John A. Gustin	June, 1849
John Y. Sherwood	May, 1853
H. B. Beardslee	December, 1858
Isaiah Snyder	August, 1859
Marshall Wheeler	January, 1861
Ralph L. Briggs	May, 1861
Robert A. Smith	January, 1862
F. B. Penniman, Jr.	February, 1870
Robert A. Smith	September, 1870
H. J. Tarbell	March 2, 1883

BANKING.

THE HONESDALE BANK.—The Honesdale Bank was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed March 18, 1836. The act provided that the amount of the capital stock should be one hundred thousand dollars, in shares of fifty dollars each, to be disposed of by auction, at not less than par, to the highest bidder, but no purchaser to be allowed to take more than twenty shares, or one thousand dollars, on one bid; the entire capital to be paid in before commencing business and the bank to pay to the State a bonus of five thousand dollars, and at least eight per cent. on all dividends declared.

The number of directors was fixed at thirteen. The records of the bank show that it was organized for business in November, 1836, by the election of Richard L. Seely, Isaac P. Foster, Zenas H. Russell, Joseph B. Walton, John Torrey, A. D. Williams, Thomas T. Hayes, Ephraim W. Hamlin, Edward Mills, Daniel P. Kirtland, Alexander H. Farnham, Joseph Benjamin and John Roosa as directors.

These gentlemen were all annually re-elected and continued to serve as directors until November, 1844, with the following exceptions:

At the election in November, 1838, Thomas Fuller was elected in the place of John Roosa, and, as E. W. Hamlin had been elected to the Legislature, and was thereby ineligible as a director, Butler Hamlin was elected in his stead; but, in November, 1840, E. W. Hamlin was again elected in place of Butler Hamlin. Upon the organization of the board Richard L. Seely was chosen president, and John Neal, of the Moyamensing Bank, Philadelphia, was appointed cashier. The first meeting of the board of directors, after being fully organized, was December 24, 1836, and Thursday morning of each week was designated as the time for subsequent regular meetings; and Ebenezer Kingsbury was appointed notary. January 17, 1839, Stephen D. Ward was appointed clerk. October 31, 1842, John Neal resigned as cashier and Stephen D. Ward was appointed in his stead.

On the 8th of April, 1843, an act of the Legislature was passed, rendering directors (except the president) who had served four years successively ineligible to a re-election until after being "out" one year.

The precise object of the law does not appear, but the rigidity with which it was observed indicates the very high regard that was felt toward the "combined wisdom at Harrisburg," even in those days.

The records of the bank do not show that any election for directors was held in November, 1843, but it was allowed to go by default and the old board continued to serve. In November, 1844, however, that the majesty of the law might be vindicated (and a legislative committee avoided), a new board was duly elected, consisting of Richard L. Seely, Ezra Hand, Stephen Torrey, Albert H. Russell, Gaylord Russell, Josiah

Foster, Butler Hamlin, Amzi Fuller, Henry M. Fuller, William H. Foster, N. B. Eldred, Joseph B. Walton, Jr., and J. C. Gunn.

These gentlemen immediately qualified, and, at their first meeting, adopted a resolution requesting the members of the old board to meet with them regularly to advise in relation to the business of the bank, and that the president and cashier be a committee to make discounts.

The year of "outing" having expired, in November, 1845, a new board was elected, as follows: Richard L. Seely, Zenas H. Russell, Isaac P. Foster, E. W. Hamlin, John Torrey, Daniel P. Kirtland, Ezra Hand, Joseph B. Walton, George F. Knapp, Jeremiah C. Gunn, Amzi Fuller, Daniel Blandin and Jos. Benjamin.

November, 1846, the above were all re-elected, and in March, 1847, the legislative restriction as to the re-election of old directors was repealed so far as related to the Honesdale Bank.

November 26, 1846, Ezra Hand tendered his resignation as director, which was accepted, and T. H. R. Tracy was chosen by the board to fill the vacancy.

November, 1847, the above directors were re-elected, with the exception of Henry M. Fuller in place of Amzi Fuller, deceased, and Ezra Hand in place of Daniel Blandin.

November, 1848, the old board were all re-elected, and also in November, 1849, with the exception that James Archbald was chosen in place of Joseph B. Walton, deceased.

April 5, 1849, the Legislature passed an act extending the charter fifteen years from the expiration of the present charter, and requiring the bank to pay a further bonus of two per cent. (two thousand dollars) to the State treasurer, and not to become a law until accepted by the stockholders.

December 27, 1849, the stockholders resolved to accept the charter.

January 17, 1850, a plan and specifications for a new banking-house and cashier's residence were reported, and the proposition of Colonel Richard L. Seely to erect it for six thousand five hundred dollars was accepted. Messrs. Z. H. Russell, Isaac P. Foster, Thomas H. R. Tracy and the cashier were appointed a building committee.

November 18, 1850, the old board were all re-elected. January 2, 1851, the board held their first meeting in the new banking-house.

This was the same one now occupied; prior to this they had occupied the building now owned and occupied by Dr. Charles Brady, and the banking-room was the small front-room of that building.

November 17, 1851, the following were elected directors for the ensuing year: R. L. Seely, Isaac P. Foster, Zenas H. Russell, John Torrey, Daniel Blandin, D. P. Kirtland, Ezra Hand, W. H. Foster, Gaylord Russell, Butler Hamlin, George F. Knapp, Joseph Benjamin and Jeremiah C. Gunn.

At the election November 13, 1852, R. L. Seely, I. P. Foster, John Torrey, Z. H. Russell, D. P. Kirtland, J. Benjamin, J. C. Gunn, Thomas Sweet, R. F. Lord, Daniel Blandin, Nicholas Overfield, Edward O. Hamlin and Henry M. Fuller were elected directors. November 21, 1853, the old board were re-elected, and November 20, 1854, they were all re-elected, with the following exceptions: Samuel E. Dimmick in place of Joseph Benjamin, William H. Foster in place of Nicholas Warfield, Stephen Torrey in place of Henry M. Fuller and Ephraim W. Hamlin in place of Edward O. Hamlin.

For the past three years Ephraim W. Hamlin, having been elected to the State Senate, had been ineligible as a director.

March 16, 1855, an act was passed authorizing (by a vote of the stockholders) an increase of capital to $200,000, subject to a bonus to the State of $2000, and at a stockholders' meeting April 5, 1855, it was resolved to so increase the capital; but at a subsequent meeting, held May 1, 1855, it was "resolved to increase the capital only $50,000 at this time."

November 19, 1855, the old board were re-elected for the ensuing year, and November 17, 1856, the old board were all re-elected, with the exception of Gaylord Russell in place of Stephen Torrey.

September 26, 1857, the board was advised that the Philadelphia banks had all suspended specie payments, involving the suspension of the other banks in the State, and unanimously resolved not to suspend as long as the New York City banks did not suspend.

They were enabled to do this from the fact that their principal reserve balance was kept in New York, and their Philadelphia account was comparatively small, while nearly all of the banks of this State kept their balances in Philadelphia, and of course were obliged to suspend with Philadelphia.

October 13 and 14, 1857, the New York City banks were obliged to suspend, but the records of the bank do not show that any further action was taken by the boards in regard to the matter, or that any demand was made upon them for specie that was not honored, and if they did not formally suspend after the suspension of the New York banks, it was simply because no demand was made to afford any occasion for suspension. At the elections held November 16, 1857, and November 15, 1858, the old board were re-elected.

November 21, 1859, the following persons were elected directors for the ensuing year, viz.: R. L. Seeley, Z. H. Russell, John Torrey, D. P. Kirtland, R. F. Lord, J. P. Foster, J. C. Gunn, S. E. Dimmick, E. W. Hamlin, W. H. Foster, Daniel Blaudin, Franklin A. Seely and Gaylord Russell. November 19, 1860, and November 18, 1861, all of the above were re-elected.

The Bank's War Record.—The threatening clouds which had been gathering in darkness and power in our horizon at length burst with fury over Fort Sumter on the 12th of April, 1861, and the surrender of the garrison on the 13th of April excited a strong patriotic feeling throughout the North, with a determination to put down the Rebellion.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania being then in session, on the 13th of April passed a war bill, appropriating half a million of dollars for the purpose of equipping the militia of the State, and the Governor soon after called for volunteers.

April 20, 1861, a public meeting of the citizens of Honesdale was held at Liberty Hall, in response to this call, and a finance committee was appointed, of which S. D. Ward was made treasurer, to receive and disburse funds contributed for the support of the families of those who should volunteer. At the next meeting of the board after the citizens' meeting, the following appears upon the records of the bank:

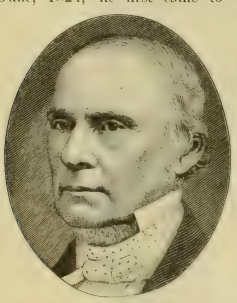
"April 25, 1861, it was unanimously resolved that the Honesdale Bank hereby subscribe one thousand dollars to the fund now being raised in Wayne County for assistance to the families of those of our fellow-citizens who shall volunteer from this county for their country's defense,—the amount to be paid to S. D. Ward, treasurer of the Finance Committee, appointed at a public meeting held on the 20th inst."

June 20, 1861, an application was laid before the board from the State treasurer, requesting a subscription to the State War Loan, and on motion,—

"Resolved, That the cashier be and is hereby instructed to take five thousand dollars of said loan."

August 7, 1862, the board met to consider the proposition of advancing funds, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, to pay a bounty of fifty dollars to each person who should volunteer to make up the quota of Wayne County in the twenty-one regiments of volunteers required of Pennsylvania, under the recent call of the President of the United States, as specified in the proclamation of the Governor of the State, and as the county commissioners of Wayne County proposed to issue to those who would advance the funds for that purpose bonds or certificates of indebtedness bearing six per cent. interest, in the name of the county, subject, however, to the same being legalized by the Legislature, it was on motion unanimously

"Resolved, That the Honesdale Bank hereby agrees to subscribe and pay to the Treasurer appointed by the Commissioners to receipt and pay out said fund, an amount which shall be equal to what all of the citizens of Wayne County shall, in their individual capacity, subscribe and pay to said Treasurer towards said fund."



August 13, 1863, the cashier was authorized to forward one thousand five hundred dollars to the committee of the banks of Philadelphia for the purpose of paying the militia of the State, called out by the Governor to repel invasion.

In addition to the foregoing the bank was a liberal subscriber to all of the government loans from the time the first loan was offered to the public to the final closing out of the "four per cents.," and for the placing of these bonds

(the four per cent.) in the hands of the people it was appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury a government agent.

Colonel Richard Lewis Seely, one of the organizers and the first president of the Honesdale Bank, was a son of Dr. John W. Seely and grandson of Colonel Sylvanus Seely (of whom notice appears elsewhere). He was born in Greene County, Pennsylvania, December 23, 1796. About 1803 his father and family removed to Holland, near Warren, Trumbull Co., O. When a young man he was commissioned colonel in the Ohio militia, and so received the title by which he was so well known through his life.

In June, 1824, he first came to Wayne

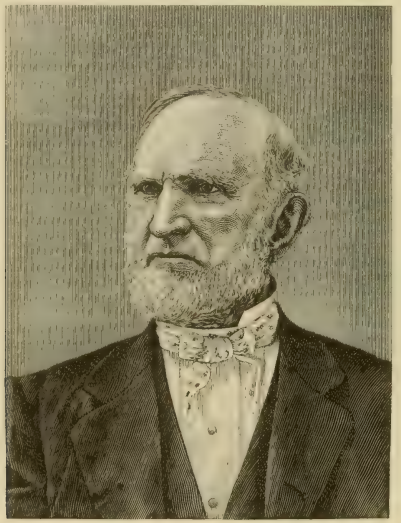
RICHARD LEWIS SEELY.

County, Pennsylvania, to look after property of his recently deceased grandfather, and in August, 1825, he came again to Wayne County and settled upon that property, at what was then known as "Seely's Mills," now Seelyville. He was married, August 17, 1828, to Maria, daughter of Major Jason Torrey, of whom a sketch has been already given.

He was a man of great energy of character and public spirit. He exerted himself to the utmost to foster such enterprises as would tend to develop the resources and promote the prosperity and growth of the community. (This will appear from the history of Seelyville, as found in this volume.) Without ability to interest himself financially in the construction of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, which so greatly served in an early day to open up this region, his willing heart, ready hand and personal influence did much to facilitate the progress of this work. He was prominent in the movement which resulted in the chartering of the Honesdale Bank in 1836, and as president of that bank, from its organization until his death, contributed largely toward fixing the safe, conservative, financial policy which carried it safely through all business crises, and gave it an established and almost national reputation. He took an active part in the organization of the Honesdale Academy (chartered in 1838), the property of which was subsequently donated to the borough for public school purposes.

March 7, 1832, he was commissioned justice of the peace by Governor Wolf, and continued in that office for several years. He united with the Presbyterian Church October 11, 1829, and was chosen ruling elder in that church October 15, 1842, which office he held during the remainder of his life.

In the spring of 1847 he removed from Seelyville to the borough of Honesdale, where he continued to reside until his death, Dec. 8, 1863.



December 8, 1863, the bank sustained a great loss in the death of Colonel Richard L. Seely, who had been its only president since its organization, in 1836, and on the 31st of December, 1863, Zenas H. Russell was unanimously elected president, and John Torrey was unanimously elected vice-president in place of Mr. Russell.

March 17, 1864, the cashier laid before the board the voluntary resignation of Horace C. Hand, teller of the bank (after a service as clerk and teller of nearly sixteen years), to take effect March 31st, to enable him to enter into active business.

The Honesdale National Bank.—On the 10th of November, 1864, pursuant to previous legal notice, the stockholders of the Honesdale Bank convened at the banking-house to consider whether it was advisable to convert the Honesdale Bank into a National Banking Association under the general banking laws of the United States. It was unanimously resolved to make the change, and on the 1st day of December, 1864, the stockholders and directors of the Honesdale Bank unanimously adopted the articles of association and organization certificate of "The Honesdale National Bank," with a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, with authority to increase the same to not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, under the provision of the 10th Section of the National Bank Act.

The articles of association also provided that the following persons, directors of the Honesdale Bank, should be the directors of "The Honesdale National Bank:"

John Torrey

Zenas H. Russell, John Torrey, Isaac P. Foster, Jeremiah C. Gunn, Ephraim W. Hamlin, Wm. H. Foster, Daniel P. Kirtland, Daniel Blandin, Samuel E. Dimmick, Franklin A. Seely, Henry M. Seely.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Honesdale Bank, held December 29, 1864, the certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency, authorizing "The Honesdale National Bank" to commence business, was received, bearing date December 24, 1864, and it was unanimously resolved by the board that "as Monday will be observed as a legal holiday, the Honesdale National Bank will commence business on Tuesday, January 3, 1865."

On the 10th of January, 1865, an election for directors of the Honesdale National Bank was held, at which all of the old directors were elected except Daniel Blandin, who was succeeded by Joseph Benjamin, and at a meeting of the new board, held January 12, 1865, it was unanimously resolved to increase the capital stock of said bank from one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to three hundred thousand dollars, and that a stock dividend of thirty-three and one-third per cent., or fifty thousand dollars of said increase, be made to the present stockholders.

July 6, 1865, Coe F. Young and Edwin F. Torrey were appointed directors to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Jos. Benjamin and Franklin A. Seely.

January 9, 1866, the following persons were elected directors for the ensuing year:

Zenas H. Russell, John Torrey, Isaac P. Foster, Jeremiah C. Gunn, Ephraim W. Hamlin, Daniel P. Kirtland, Wm. H. Foster, Henry M. Seely, Samuel E. Dimmick, Coe F. Young, Edwin F. Torrey, and were continued by re-election as directors during the year 1874, when a vacancy was occasioned by the death of Daniel P. Kirtland, which was filled on August 6, 1874, by the appointment of Henry Z. Russell.

January 14, 1875, the old board was re-elected, with Henry Z. Russell in place of D. P. Kirtland.

On the 14th of October, 1875, another vacancy was occasioned in the board by the death of the Hon. Samuel E. Dimmick, in Harrisburg, while attending to his duties as attorney-general of Pennsylvania.

This vacancy was not filled until the annual election, January 11, 1876, when the other members of the board were re-elected, and Mr. Elias Stanton in place of Hon. Sam'l E. Dimmick.

November 18, 1876, another vacancy occurred in the death of Isaac P. Foster, who had been connected with the bank ever since its organization, and which vacancy, instead of filling, the stockholders, at their annual meeting, January 9, 1877, so amended the by-law as to make the board of directors consist of ten stockholders instead of eleven, and at the annual election, held that day the ten surviving directors were re-elected.

January 10, 1878, the old board were re-elected, but as Zenas H. Russell, on account of failing health, and John Torrey, on account of impaired hearing, both declined re-election to the office of president and vice-president respectively, on motion, Coe F. Young was unanimously elected president and Henry M. Seely vice-president.

May 11, 1878, another vacancy in the board was occasioned by the death of Zenas H. Russell, who had been connected with the management as a director since its first organization, in November, 1836, as its first vice-president from July 17, 1856, to December 31, 1863, when he was elected president to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Colonel Richard L. Seely, and which he held without interruption until he retired on account of failing health, January 10, 1878, only four months and a day before his death.

This vacancy was not filled until the annual election, January 14, 1879, when the old board were re-elected and Robert J. Menner vice Zenas H. Russell (deceased).

January 13, 1880, old board all re-elected, but on March 8, 1880, another vacancy was occasioned by the death of William H. Foster, which was filled on the 25th of March by the election of Horace G. Young. January 11, 1881, the old board was all re-elected, and Horace G. Young vice William H. Foster (deceased). January 10, 1882, the old board was all re-elected, viz: C. F. Young, John Torrey, E. W. Hamlin, J. C. Gunn, Henry M. Seely, E. F. Torrey, H. Z. Russell, Elias Stanton, Robert J. Menner and Horace G. Young. January 9, 1883, and January 8, 1884, the old board was all re-elected except that in the latter year Hon. Henry M. Seely, having been elected president judge of this judicial district, declined re-election as vice-president and also declined to qualify as a director.

January 10, 1884, on motion, Henry Z. Russell was unanimously elected vice-president in place of Hon. Henry M. Seely, and February 7, 1884, Edward O. Hamlin was unanimously appointed a director in place of Judge Seely.

On April 3, 1884, another vacancy in the board was occasioned by the death of Hon. E. W. Hamlin, the last but one of the directors who have been connected with the management of the bank since its first organization, in December, 1836.

July 10, 1884, the cashier presented to the board the following statement:

"The dividend declared to-day is the fortieth semi-annual dividend of five per cent., declared by the Honesdale National Bank.

"Our charter expires by limitation December 1, 1884. During our existence as a National Bank we have earned and paid to our stockholders, including the dividend of to-day.....$600,000.00

We have now on hand of surplus and profits	135,650.49
Net earnings as National Bank	$735,650.49
During the same time we have paid State and National taxes amounting to	102,864.13
Making gross earnings after payment of all expenses	$838,514.62"

On motion, Messrs. John Torrey, Henry C. Russell and E. F. Torrey were appointed a committee to take such steps as are necessary for the extension of our charter. October 2, 1884, the committee reported, through E. F. Torrey, that they had forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency, under date of October 1st, the application of stockholders representing four thousand nine hundred and ten shares of the Honesdale National Bank, that the sixth article of the articles of association of said National Banking Association be so amended as to read as follows:

"This association shall continue until close of business, December 1, A.D. 1904, unless sooner placed in voluntary liquidation by the act of its shareholders owning at least two-thirds of its stock, or otherwise dissolved by authority of law," which action was on motion approved, and the committee discharged.

December 4, 1884, the cashier presented to the board the renewal certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency extending the charter for twenty years, or until December 1, A.D. 1904.

January 13, 1885, at the annual meeting of stockholders held for the election of directors, the by-laws were so amended as to make the board of directors consist of nine stockholders instead of ten, leaving the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. E. W. Hamlin unfilled and re-electing the surviving directors, so that the directors and executive officers of the bank to-day are as follows:

Directors.

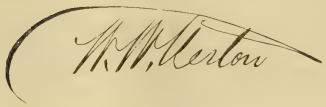
Coe F. Young, president; Henry Z. Russell, vice-president; Edwin F. Torrey, cashier; Samuel J. Foster, teller; Grant W. Lane, clerk.

THE WAYNE COUNTY SAVINGS BANK was organized November 1, 1871, under a charter granted by the State Legislature, with an authorized capital of one hundred thousand dollars, of which fifty thousand dollars was paid in. At the first election of directors and officers the following were chosen, to wit: Wm. W. Weston, Wm. H. Dimmick, Isaac N. Foster, Richard Henwood, Wm. Wefferling, Robt. J. Menner, Lorenzo Grambs, Wm. H. Ham and Gilbert Knapp. President, Wm. W. Weston; Vice-President, Wm. H. Dimmick; Cashier, Horace C. Hand.

The present board of directors is as follows: Wm. W. Weston, Isaac N. Foster, Lorenzo Grambs, George G. Waller, Wm. Wefferling, H. J. Conger, J. Howard Beach. President, Wm. W. Weston; Vice-President, Isaac N. Foster; Cashier, H. C. Hand; First Teller, H. S. Salmon; Second Teller, Wm. J. Ward. The last annual statement furnished to the auditor-general, shows the deposits to be $722,943, and the total assets $816,265. The building in which the bank is located was built especially for it, and was first occupied November 1, 1875. The success of this financial institution has been almost wholly due to the energy and sound business judgment of Mr. Weston, its first and present president.



WILLIAM W. WESTON is a son of the Rev. Horace Weston, born at Simesbury, Hartford County, Connecticut, in 1792, and who removed to Ulster County, New York, in 1814. He early became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was the pioneer preacher of that denomination in the western part of Ulster, and in Sullivan County, extending from Ellenville to Monticello. The distance covered by his ministrations comprised about fifty miles, and his labors were arduous and trying. Owing to the severity of his ministerial tasks his health finally gave way, and he was compelled to locate, which he did, at Ellenville, Ulster County, New York, about 1826. In 1829, as the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company was about beginning operations, he began the manufacture of stone-ware at Ellenville, and engaged in that secular occupation until his death, in 1848, although he performed ministerial functions at irregular periods until the close of his life.

He supplied stone-ware along the entire length of the canal as far as Scranton, and as Eastern Pennsylvania was then rapidly developing under the operations of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, he finally decided to locate at Honesdale, Wayne County, and in the spring of 1848 purchased land with a view to establishing a branch factory at that place. But "man proposes but God disposes," and the execution of his plan was prevented by his death from fever, in July of that year. His wife was the daughter of Daniel Briggs, of Wawarsing, Ulster County, New York, one of the early settlers from Westchester County. Of eight children, seven are still living, including Caroline, wife of Rev. Wm. G. Wiggins, of Paterson; William W., Daniel, who resides in Honesdale, Minerva, wife of H. Y. Lazar, of Chicago; Elnora, wife of George H. Dutcher, Ellenville; Marilla, wife of N. T. Childs, of Binghamton, New York; and Loren, who also resides in Chicago.

William W. Weston was born at Ellenville, New York, November 7, 1828. He received only a common-school education, and at fifteen years of age entered the employ of his father in the manufacture and sale of stone-ware. Upon the death of the latter, in 1848, pursuant to the plan and advice of his father, he commenced the erection, at Honesdale, of the factory contemplated. The building was finished in the fall and winter, and in the spring of 1849 he began to manufacture at that place. He took charge of the new factory himself, while his brother looked after the Ellenville plant. In 1854 he placed his brother Horace in charge of the works at Honesdale, and he himself embarked in mercantile pursuits, dealing in heavy goods, such as flour, grain and provisions, and, in connection with C. W. Requa and Smith Requa, under the firm-name of Requas & Weston, operated a line of canal-boats from Albany, New York, in connection with a store at Ellenville and one at Honesdale.

This plan of operations continued until the spring of 1857, when the building of the Erie Railroad made a change necessary, and the firm dissolved, the Requas taking the canal business and the Ellenville store, and Mr. Weston the Honesdale business. Since that time he has carried on the mercantile business alone, with the exception of five years, during which period his brother Loren was associated with him.

In 1867, in connection with Hoyt Brothers, of New York, and F. H. Rockwell, of Honesdale, he operated a tannery at Little Equinunk for seven years, the firm being known as Weston, Rockwell & Co. He subsequently disposed of his interest to Hoyt Brothers, of New York. In 1873 he, with others, organized the Honesdale Glass Company, which has since been in successful operation, with Mr. Weston as vice-president and manager. In addition to these enterprises he has been active in other directions, and closely identified with all movements tending to develop the interests of the community in which he resides. He was one of the organizers of the Wayne County Savings Bank in 1871, and has since been president of that institution. He has taken an active interest in church work, and is a member of the Honesdale Presbyterian Church. His first wife, whom he married October 1, 1857, was Anna E., daughter of Deacon Isaac P. Foster, of Honesdale, who passed away September 15, 1876.

His present wife, Mrs. Mary E. Weston, is a daughter of John F. Roe, an old resident of Honesdale. His children born of the first marriage were Nellie, (who died in infancy,) Bessie B., Harriet Rowland (wife of H. S. Battin, of Chicago), William Foster, Charles Wesley and George Childs Weston.

INVENTIONS.—That the borough has not been lacking in inventive ability is readily appreciated when one takes into consideration that here was first worked out the problem of the sewing-machine and here lived a man who later achieved a great success in the same line of mechanism, and whose name was given to one of the many machines now in use—the Secor.

More than fifty years ago, in the mind of Dr. Otis Avery, originated the first plan for constructing a sewing-machine for the relief of burdened seamstresses. After years of vigilant attention and almost constant toil he accomplished the solution of the problem which he had imposed upon himself. His machine made a much stronger seam than any of the later ones, and the examiners at the World's Fair, in 1853, awarded him the highest premium for the best seam. So much tact and skill were demanded, however, for the working of his machine that it failed to meet the popular demand.

The Avery machine, patented in 1852, was thus spoken of by the New York Tribune in December of that year,—

"Dr. Avery's machine was first exhibited here at the recent fair of the American Institute. It is completely original, its features and arrangements not being borrowed from those of other inventors. It operates with two needles and two threads, which it interlocks in something like a tambour stitch. We have examined its work with great care and have cut every other stitch on one side of the cloth and still have found the seam quite as strong as any other having none of the defects of the ordinary tambour stitch. It uses more thread than either of the other American machines, but less than the French. In respect to the rapidity of the work, we think there is no great difference. The great advantage of Avery's machine are its more simple mechanism and its greater cheapness. For household use these are of great importance."

The Avery machine sold for twenty-five dollars; the others at from fifty to one hundred and twenty-five dollars, that of the Wilson being the former and the Singer the latter amount.

The doctor's machine was introduced by him in England in 1854, and also sold to Louis Napoleon.

A company was formed in New York for manufacturing this invention, but lacking sufficient enterprise and strong rivals being in the field, its wares were superseded by others more ably pushed upon the market.

H. C. Gunn

At the time Dr. Avery was laboring to perfect his machine so as to bring it into use, a lad by the name of Jerome B. Secor was living in Honesdale, whose father was a gun-smith. He exhibited a high degree of mechanical ingenuity, which was encouraged by his father, and in time he became the deviser of several useful appliances and mechanisms. He was called to the work of improving the Singer sewing-machine, which he did so effectually that the company manufacturing and controlling its sale became the wealthiest in the United States.

While thus engaged Mr. Secor was impressed with the idea that, by proceeding on his own foundation, he could elaborate a machine that would surpass in utility either of those in use, and acting upon this thought, he eventually brought out the familiarly known Secor sewing-machine.

In June, 1856, Marshall Wheeler invented an automatic governor for marine steam-engines, that was regarded as a very valuable device by the best authorities of the country. It consisted of some simple mechanism to regulate the opening and closing of the throttle valve by means of steam pressure.

Hiram Plum, in 1858, invented a machine for turning tool handles.

MANUFACTURES.

Wood's Planing-Mill—The Old Axe Factory.—The ground on which is located Wood's planing-mill is one of the oldest manufacturing sites in Honesdale. In 1832 Cornelius Hendricks bought ten acres of land, including this site, and also secured the right to the water-power of the Lackawaxen, and established there an axe and scythe factory. After a few years the property was sold by the sheriff and bid in by S. G. Cory for thirty-two hundred dollars, for Daniel Hendricks, an Eastern gentleman, for whom the manufactory was carried on by James Hendricks and one Cottrell. Again the establishment was sold to David Beers, S. G. Cory and I. J. Bassett, who fitted up the works for wood-turning, and rented them to Ten Eyck Depui. This was in 1857, and a year later we find Eliphalet Wood associated with Mr. Depui and carrying on the first planing-mill in Wayne County. In 1857 Mr. Wood assumed the sole ownership of the mill, and when he died, in 1860, it was sold to E. T. Beers, William Reed and David Beers, who carried it on under the firm-name of Beers, Reed & Co. In 1864 B. L. Wood bought out Mr. Beers, but the style of the firm was not changed. In 1874 Wood and Beers bought out Reed, and the business was then conducted by them until 1880, when Wood became the sole proprietor. Up to that time water-power had been used, but Mr. Wood introduced steam. Mr. Wood carries on a saw-mill, planing-mill and sash and blind factory. He sends much lumber to the Stephensons, the car builders in New York.

Honesdale Flouring-Mill.—This establishment dates from 1838. It was built by J. C. Gunn & Co., the unnamed partners being Richard L. Seely and John Torrey. The mill was finished, and the first wheat received for grinding in November, 1839. Mr. Gunn was the practical miller, and the control of building and operating the mill devolved upon him. He made it a success from the start, and maintained the reputation of the establishment steadily from year to year. In 1849 he withdrew from the firm, and as Mr. Seely had previously retired, John Torrey remained the sole proprietor. Mr. Torrey leased the mill successively to various parties, and finally, in 1876, to Peter J. Cole, who has since operated it and made many improvements. It is now supplied with the best improved milling machinery, and is second to no establishment of its kind in Northeastern Pennsylvania.

J. C. Gunn, who may justly be considered the founder of the above industry, is descended from a family of English extraction, which early emigrated to this country and established themselves in Connecticut. Simeon Gunn, the father of J. C. Gunn, was a farmer by occupation and removed from Bedford, Conn., where he was born, to Lee, Oneida County, N. Y., where he passed the greater part of his life engaged in agricultural pursuits. He married Rhoda Ann Burton, daughter of Jeremiah Burton, a native of Connecticut, who performed active service in the Revolutionary War, and who also located in Oneida County, N. Y. Their children were Jeremiah C. (our subject), Phebe (who married William Burton and resides in Iowa), George (who died at Fox Lake, Wis., November 26, 1879) and Eunice A. (wife of Frederick Farnham, of White Mills, Wayne County).

J. C. Gunn was born in Woodbury, Conn., July 31, 1804. His boyhood was passed upon his father's farm in Oneida County, N. Y., during which time he acquired an ordinary English education at the district schools of the neighborhood. At an early age he developed a taste for the milling business, and set himself to work to acquire a knowledge of the mechanical construction and operation of a mill. He subsequently operated a mill at Bowmanville, Canada, and at various other places, and in 1834 removed to Utica, N. Y., where he had charge of the City Mills, owned by Rutgers B. Miller, for four years.

In the fall of 1838 he was solicited by Richard L. Seely and others of Honesdale to erect a mill at that place, and at once went to work to break the ground and prepare the way for millwrights, who arrived from Vermont in May, 1839. The mill was completed and set in operation in November of that year, and was owned by Richard L. Seely, John Torrey and J. C. Gunn, who did business as Gunn & Co.

Colonel Seely subsequently withdrew from the concern, but the remaining members of the firm continued to operate the mill until 1849. After that time the old concern was dissolved, and Mr. Gunn devoted his attention to private business. He has proven successful in all of his ventures, and has acquired a comfortable estate by the exercise of that persistency of purpose, energy and integrity of character which is the only basis upon which a substantial and lasting success can be established.

Mr. Gunn has been a director of the Honesdale National Bank since 1844, and has always taken great interest in that institution. Ever since he located in Honesdale he has been a consistent member of Grace Episcopal Church, was a member of the building committee on the erection of the present church edifice, in 1853, to which he subscribed liberally, and for thirty-eight years has represented the church in the Diocesan Conventions of Pennsylvania, which met at various places. He was a warm supporter of the war for the preservation of the Union, assisted actively in the enrollment and fitting out of the various companies raised in Wayne County, and accompanied the first company to Harrisburg. He spent three days upon the battle-field at Gettysburg, picking up and caring for the dead and wounded and assisting in alleviating the sufferings of those who fell in their country's cause. After the close of the war himself and his wife were among the most active of those through whose patriotism and energy the beautiful monument, which now stands in the public park, was erected to the memory of those who had proven in their deaths the truth and beauty of that saying of Horace, dulce et decore est pro patria mori,—it is a sweet and becoming thing to die for one's country.

Mr. Gunn married, February 25, 1835, Achsah Melissa, daughter of Rev. Whiting Griswold, who died while pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Hartwicke, Otsego County, N. Y. His widow, whose maiden-name was Achsah Tyler, of Harford, Susquehanna County, Pa., subsequently became the wife of Major Jason Torrey, of Wayne County, and the mother of two sons—James, a young man of more than ordinary promise, who died at the age of sixteen, and Rev. David Torrey, D.D., a well-known native of Wayne County, resident at Casenovia, N. Y.

Peter J. Cole, the present proprietor of the Honesdale Mills, is a grandson of Peter Cole, a native of Sussex County, N. J., where the Cole family has been prominently represented since an early period. In 1813 he removed to Wayne County, Pa., where he took up government lands, to which he subsequently added by purchase, until he had acquired about one hundred and thirty acres. He was one of the pioneers of the county and a man of industrious habits and good character. He married a lady by the name of Schoonover, and had two children,—Josiah, an only son, and a daughter, who married Charles Kimble, formerly of Wayne County, and who removed to Michigan in 1836, where her descendants still reside.

Josiah Cole was sixteen years of age at the time of his father's settlement in Wayne County, and was a valuable aid to him in his pioneer enterprises. Upon the death of his father he succeeded to the ancestral glebes and spent his life in agricultural labor. He was an influential and useful man and occupied various township offices in Texas township, where the family seat was established. He married Charlotte Brown and had four children,—Eliza A., who became the wife of Reynolds Cole, formerly of Sussex, but later of Wayne County, a civil engineer on the Delaware and Hudson Canal; Eleanor S., who married Charles H. Peck, of Preston township; Peter J., the subject of this sketch; and Lewis K., who was wounded at Fort Fisher during the late war and died in Wilmington Hospital.

P. J. Cole

Peter J. Cole was born on the old homestead, in Texas township, Wayne County, Pa., February 14, 1827. He was reared upon the farm, attending the district schools during the winter season, and subsequently completed his education at the University of Northern Pennsylvania, Bethany, Wayne County. From 1844 until 1853 he taught district school in the winter. After his marriage (in March, 1852) the family tract was divided between his brother and himself, and he engaged in farming until 1864, when he removed to Honesdale, the county-seat, and operated the large flouring-mill at that place for Edwin F. Torrey. He continued in this relation until 1876, when he bought the stock and good-will of the concern, and has since operated the mill on his own account. It is calculated to do both merchant and custom-work, and, under Mr. Cole's management, has enjoyed a wide reputation. The latter is recognized as one of the successful business men of Honesdale, and is a man of character and influence. He has long been an active and useful member of the Honesdale Baptist Church, assisted in the erection of the present house of worship, and has been a member of the board of trustees and a deacon of the church for many years. His first wife, whom he married in March, 1852, was Mary E., daughter of Rev. C. C. Williams, at that time pastor of the Baptist Church of Honesdale, of whom was born Mary E., wife of Herbert E. Gager, of Lebanon township. His first wife died January 9, 1853. On November 9th of the same year he married Rebecca, daughter of John H. Brown, of Darby township, Delaware County, Pa., by whom he had five children, all of whom are living,—viz., Frank E., who is with Babbitt & Co., soap manufacturers, of New York; Henry W., engaged in the milling business with his father; Anna A., Nettie J. and Bertha A. Cole, residing at home.

The Honesdale Iron Works were started in 1841 by Gilbert Knapp as a foundry and machine-shop. He took into partnership his brother-in-law, Andrew J. Bowers, and after a short time sold his own interest to Zara Arnold. The works were burned, but subsequently rebuilt, and in 1847 passed into possession of Knapp, Bowers & Neal. James F. Knapp afterwards bought the property, and took into partnership Thomas Charlesworth, the firm-name being Knapp & Charlesworth. They carried on the works up to 1876, when they failed and Gilbert Knapp again became their proprietor and operated them until 1883, when he sold out to M. B. Allen, the present owner.

William Skelton carried on a machine-shop and foundry for a short time subsequent to 1860.

M. F. Van Kirk's Stick Factory, in which are manufactured umbrella and parasol sticks, cigar boxes, etc., has been carried on by him since 1856. The business has been in existence in Honesdale since 1832, its pioneer having been L. T. Presscott, who was followed by Captain Emory Presscott and one Phillips, who brought it down to Van Kirk's time.

Breweries.—Krantz's, or the "upper brewery" was started in 1853 by George Burkhart. After passing through the hands of numerous persons it became, in 1868, the property of August Hartung and Peter Krantz. Up to this time the brewery had been a small affair, but the new proprietors made extensive improvements in 1869, 1872 and 1874. The partnership was dissolved January 1, 1883, Mr. Hartung becoming sole proprietor.

A year later Peter Krantz bought the stock, and renting the buildings, operated the brewery on his own account. He produces about five thousand barrels of beer per annum and also brews ale in considerable quantity. The brewery is run by steam-power and contains all of the best modern appliances and apparatus.

John Guckenberger's brewery, known as the "lower brewery," was bought by him in 1883. It was started in 1857 by John Heinicke and eight or ten years later sold to Jacob Lauer, who carried it on for many years and erected the present brick structure. Mr. Guckenberger has made many improvements since taking possession of the property and now, with steam-power applied in the most improved ways, the brewery has an output of five thousand barrels of beer and two thousand of ale per year.

Durland, Torrey & Co.'s Boot and Shoe Factory is one of the most extensive and prosperous manufacturing establishments of the borough. It was started in 1868 by Colonel Coe F. Durland and Robert N. Torrey, over the present stores of W. B. Holmes and W. H. Krantz. In 1872 Andrew Thompson became a partner, and the firm moved into its present quarters, a building erected by Mr. Torrey, at the corner of Front and Tenth Streets. This building is three stories in height, and fifty by ninety feet. The specialties of manufacture are men's, boys' and youths' kip and calf boots, and women's, misses' and children's oil grain calf and kip shoes. The firm also carries a line of fine goods for the jobbing trade. About seventy-five hands are employed, and the value of the manufacture is not far from three hundred thousand dollars per year. The goods find a market all the way from New York to Oregon.

Glass-Cutting.—An interesting industry is the manufacture of rich cut-glass, which has been carried on by T. B. Clarke, of Meriden, Conn., since March, 1884. He employs about forty men. The process is exactly like that in vogue at Dorflinger's White Mills Works, of which a full description appears in the chapter upon Texas township.

Glass decorating is carried on here also by N. A. Ray & Co., who established themselves in this business in 1885.

FURNITURE was first made in the borough in 1829 by Alanson Blood, an old-time "cabinet-maker," of whom mention is made elsewhere. He continued at his trade until recent years. John Brown engaged in the business in 1850, and removed into the building now occupied by him, in 1869. John Loercher and Moore & Rittenhaus have also been engaged in this trade.

MANUFACTURE OF CIGARS AND TOBACCO.—The pioneer in this line of manufacture was John N. Conger, who began some time between 1835 and 1840.

His successor was Lorenzo Grambs (of whom we give a sketch). Mr. Grambs, or Judge Grambs, as he is now commonly known, came to Honesdale in 1851, and worked a few months for Conger, and the latter then retiring, Grambs started in business for himself where Menner's store now is. He began in a small way, and gradually worked up to the management of a large and lucrative business. From 1860 to 1879 he manufactured and dealt heavily, employing fifteen or twenty men in the former line. Quite recently he retired, placing his business in the hands of his sons.

Lorenzo Grambs

His son George, in company with A. Eberhardt, established the cigar manufactory now successfully carried on by the latter alone.

LORENZO GRAMBS was born at Fischbach, Bavaria, January 28, 1825. His parents were John and Margaretta Grambs, who emigrated to this country in 1839, with their three sons,—Frederick, who subsequently died in California;

Lorenzo, the subject of this sketch; and George, who resides in Scranton, Pa. The father was by trade an architect, and soon after landing in this country located at Rondout, N. Y., where he followed his vocation. In 1840 he resided in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and later in Rochester and New York City. In 1848 he purchased a farm in Sullivan County, N. Y., which he tilled for a number of years, and finally removed to Honesdale, Wayne County Pa., where he died in 1879.

Lorenzo Grambs was fourteen years of age at the time of the family emigration to this country. He had already received an excellent common-school education in his native land, and being in poor circumstances at the time of his arrival in America, he was obliged to enter upon the performance of the ordinary duties of life at once. His first month's work was in driving on the tow-path of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, between Rondout and Honesdale. In 1840 he was apprenticed to learn the trade of a shoemaker, but not finding the occupation congenial, continued at it only one year. He then went to Rochester, where he labored at brick-laying and masonry, and then to New York City, where he learned the trade of a cigar-maker, and worked as a journeyman for three years. In 1846 he was married, and established business for himself in Delancey Street, New York. Here he remained until 1849, when, at the breaking out of the gold-fever that year, he sailed for California around Cape Horn. By an accident on ship-board his leg was broken, and he was confined two months in California, but later proceeded to the gold-mines, where he worked until 1851. Having acquired about two thousand dollars' worth of gold-dust, he located in Honesdale, Pa., on May 1, 1851, and for a year worked at his trade as a journeyman for John N. Conger, of that place. He then started in business for himself, and has since successfully engaged in the manufacture of cigars and the sale of tobacco and cigars at that place. The firm, as at present constituted, consists of Judge Grambs and his son Edward G., and is known as L. Grambs & Co.

During the period that Judge Grambs has resided in Honesdale he has been closely identified with the growth of the place, and held various positions of trust and responsibility. On August 5, 1859, he was commissioned, by the Governor, inspector of the Second Brigade, Tenth Division Uniformed Militia of Susquehanna and Wayne Counties, with the rank of major. In 1862 he was elected treasurer of Wayne County, and filled that office for two years. He has also served as chief burgess of Honesdale, as a member of the Town Council and treasurer of the borough. He was elected in 1882 associate judge of Wayne County, and duly commissioned by Governor Hoyt on December 13th of that year, for five years from January, 1883. He also resigned, however, in June, 1884, and was succeeded by Judge Strong, of Starrucca. He was one of the organizers of the Wayne County Savings Bank in 1871, and has since served on the board of directors of that institution. He has also been prominently connected with the cause of Odd-Fellowship in Wayne County, and is a past-officer of that order. In 1873 he visited the old country accompanied by Thomas J. Ham, of the Honesdale Herald. He has always been interested in church-work, and for twenty years was connected with the German Lutheran denomination of Christians, but is at present a regular attendant of the Presbyterian Church.

Judge Grambs was married, June 30, 1846, in New York City, to Kunigunda Rech, daughter of Adam Rech, a native of Unterlangenstadt, Bavaria, and has had a family of eighteen children, of whom twelve are now living, viz.: Sophie D., Bertha M. (who married William H. Krantz, of Honesdale), George J. (who lives at Honey Brook, Pa.), Henry W. (who resides in Dakota), Tilly M., William J. (connected with the United States Geological Survey), Edward G. (of L. Grambs & Co.), Lorenzo O., Frank G., August B. (in his father's store), B. Louis and Albert A. Grambs.

Boat Building in Honesdale and Wayne County.[1]—Although the grass grows luxuriantly in most of the boat-yards on the line of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, the time was when they were the busiest spots in our county. Owing to the practice of the company latterly to build their own boats at Rondout, N. Y., the ship-caulkers' occupation hereabouts is nearly gone, and from being as at present, a lost industry, it will soon become a lost art. The building of the canal (1825 to 1828) called for a large number of laborers and mechanics, and its effect in stimulating all branches of business, directly and indirectly, extended far beyond the strip of canal from Honesdale to Pike County on the line of the Lackawaxen.

Its western terminus being located, a town necessarily grew up about it, which was appropriately named in honor of the president of the corporation to which it owed its existence, and we understand that a mutual admiration between Philip Hone and his namesake, Honesdale, was ever kept up.

The canal was first opened in 1828, and was intended to hold four and one-half feet in depth of water; but, owing to the nature of the ground in many places and weakness of the banks in others, it was found impossible to realize these expectations, and consequently the few boats used that year in bringing up supplies of iron, engines and the like, and to carry back coal, were with great difficulty poled, pushed and pulled up and down with cargoes of from ten to twenty tons each. The one hundred and eight locks on the line of the canal were made at first seventy-five feet long and nine feet wide. As the canal was soon strengthened and deepened to five and a half feet, boats were built carrying fifty tons. During the years 1848 to 1853 the locks were enlarged to one hundred feet in length and fifteen feet in width and the depth of water made six feet, admitting boats of one hundred and fifty tons burden.

The number of boats required to do the transportation upon the canal grew rapidly as the mining facilities increased. In 1829 a dozen of the little tubs were sufficient to carry off the seven thousand tons of coal delivered at Honesdale, but the next year six times the number were in use, and in 1833 three hundred boats worked hard to get away with one hundred and eleven thousand tons. In 1834, owing, perhaps, to the business check given by the cholera in 1832 to all industries, the transportation dropped down to forty-three thousand tons, the same amount as in 1830. The lost ground was more than recovered, however, by 1837, when the financial panic sent the figures down to seventy-eight thousand tons in 1838. Since then the tonnage has mounted steadily upwards, the production of the Lackawanna coal being in 1840 one hundred and forty-eight thousand tons; in 1845, two hundred and seventy-three thousand tons; 1850, four hundred and thirty-two thousand tons; and 1855, five hundred and sixty-five thousand tons. From 1855 to 1860 was another depressed period, and the production remained about stationary, 1860 showing but five hundred thousand tons. In 1850 the Pennsylvania Coal Company began transporting their coal from the mines at Pittston to Hawley, where their own boats received it and carried it down the canal to tide-water, averaging year by year about the same number of tons as the Delaware and Hudson. Since 1860 the business has steadily grown until the gross tonnage often crowds closely upon two millions of tons.

The small or fifty-ton boats generally were built for from four hundred to five hundred dollars each. The one hundred and twenty-five ton scows, or "lemon squeezers," built in two parts and hinged in the middle, were worth about one thousand dollars, while the boats of the same capacity, which were decked over so as to go upon the Hudson River, brought from fourteen hundred up to eighteen hundred dollars, as the price of gold fluctuated up and down from 1862 to 1870.

The boat-builders of the early days had no easy life of it. They worked from sunrise to sunset up to 1848, when the ten-hour system was adopted, and often the emergencies of the business would require, during the repairing season, the use of lanterns before day and after nightfall. Your boatman having two horses to feed, wages running on and his larder to supply, wants to keep his boat in motion every possible moment; consequently, he is always in a hurry to have his repairs completed. In former times, and, indeed, down to within ten years past, the boat-builders were pretty sure of steady work at good wages, building new boats in the winter and repairing old ones in the summer, but of late, as stated, the new work being done at Rondout, the workmen have nothing to do winters and consequently drift off into other occupations, where they remain.

When the canal was young, saw-mills were few and far between and were generally such little, short-waisted concerns, that the builders preferred sending out into the woods hereabouts for long oak logs, which were brought into the boat-yards, raised by a windlass upon high benches or "horses" and then sawn into the required planks by two men with a whip-saw, one standing upon the log and the other upon the ground. The limbs of the oaks furnished the "knees" or "crooks" and the little saw-mills furnished the scantling.

The frame or skeleton was erected on the keel and the planking spiked on; then came the bracing, knee-fitting, bolting, caulking, cabin and paint, and the vessel was launched upon sliding ways into the canal, the occasion generally drawing a crowd of people to witness the event.

Good boat-yard sites are not common, as there must be a space fairly level upon which to build new boats. Near enough to the canal for launching, and connected with it, must be a place where a dry-dock can be built so as to be filled with water from the canal, allowing a boat to float into it when full and also permitting, when the gates are closed, the egress of the water under or away from the canal, leaving the boat high and dry upon the stocks, where the workmen can get at it for repairs. When the business was flourishing such sites were held at high prices; now they are but a burden and a care.

A boat-yard "gang" was generally limited to about the number that could find steady work at repairing during the summer. In the winter months they built as many new boats as they could, or were able to contract for, which number was generally from three to six.

Ship-building and boat-building requires the same kind of skill; in fact, the sharper turns and bends upon the latter are more difficult to manage than the long lines of the ship. Naturally, when the canal was first opened and boats were required, the ship-carpenters from New York and other seaports sought opportunities upon it, and in general they became the first owners of the boat-yards. The first that came to Honesdale was a man by the name of Rowland. He was followed in 1830 by a Mr. Silkworth, who built boats, and Mr. James Pinkney, who repaired them, but who afterward purchased Mr. Silkworth's interest and continued the whole business for many years. His dry-dock was located on the same spot now occupied by the Delaware and Hudson dry-dock, at the lower end of the basin. There being but little room for building at that point, the new boats were put up at the lower end of Main Street and were launched into the river. Mr. Pinkney also had a dry-dock at Leonardsville, a mile below Honesdale. The late Thomas Ham entered Mr. Pinkney's employ in 1833, and the late William Turner a few years later. Mr. Pinkney losing his health in 1841, his business was conducted by Mr. Ham in one of the yards and by Mr. Turner in the other. In 1842 Mr. Horace Tracy took the "basin" dock, and Mr. Turner acted as his foreman until 1848, when the dock was leased to him until about 1870. Mr. Turner's foreman for many years was Mr. William Pragnell, whose father built some of the first boats used on the canal in Rondout, in 1828 or 1829. Mr. Pragnell leased the new dock opposite Fourth Street when that point was made the lower end of the basin, but when the lock and dock was changed to its present site it was leased to Hoyt & Bishop, afterward to Bishop & Haley, and latterly to S. B. Haley. In 1843, Thomas Ham built a way-dock, or slides, in the Lackawaxen, near the Guard Lock, some of the old timbers being yet discernible, where he continued the business until 1862, when he sold the property to William H. Ham, his son, who also became the purchaser of the flat adjoining and upon which he built the dry-dock opposite Kimble's mill. Up to 1863 all the work, such as getting planks to proper width and thickness, planing the edges to proper bevel, dressing knees, drilling iron and the like, had been done by hand. The high price and scarcity of labor, however, and the greatly increased demand for boats during the war, induced Mr. W. H. Ham to avail himself of the water-power upon the premises.

He put up a mill alongside the grist-mill, twenty-four by one hundred and twenty feet, running a railroad from the yard through its centre, and, with the aid of heavy planers, saws, drills and the like, was enabled to turn out greatly increased quantities of work, reaching in 1868–69 sixty-odd boats for the year, sufficient in number to nearly fill the present basin, and which, if placed in line, would extend more than a mile in length. Since then the same, or a similar system has been adopted in the company's yard, at Rondout, where they now turn out about forty boats per year, being about equal to the present requirements of their business.

Mr. Andrew Coar now occupies the dry-dock, but the flat that once was covered with boats in process of erection has been used for years as a base-ball ground.

Mr. Christopher C. Lam, who graduated from Mr. Turner's yard, purchased the dock at Leonardsville and for many years carried on a successful business in building and repairing, but he, like the rest, has grown weary watching his lonely dock, and has moved himself and family into more cheerful quarters in Honesdale.

The Pennsylvania Coal Company had the most of their boats built off from the line of the canal, mostly on the Susquehanna at Lewisburgh and Northumberland, but they have generally managed to keep Mr. Levi Barker pretty steadily employed for the past thirty years on their docks at Hawley. Mr. Jno. Baisden, a couple of miles below Hawley, has also contributed a fair share of the boats to the canal.

It may well be believed that the building of three thousand boats in the past forty years at a cost of nearly five millions of dollars, the lumber for which was largely taken from Wayne and Pike Counties, added much to the prosperity of this section, as it necessitated quite an army of mechanics, woodsmen, sawyers, teamsters, blacksmiths, wagon-makers, harness-makers, boarding-house-keepers, tailors, merchants and the like to do the work. The industry may return to us some day, for the conditions for building boats are, as ever, better here than elsewhere upon the line of the canal. The lumber, the mills, the docks are still here, and the boats, when built, are close by the cargo they are to take away.

Thomas Ham, who was long and prominently identified with this business, was born at Limsworthy, Kilkhampton parish, Cornwall, England, on the 25th day of December (Christmas day), 1805, and died at his farm residence at Seelyville, near Honesdale, February 21, 1886. His parents, William and Ann Ham, were respectable farmers, the maiden-name of his mother being Ann Barrett. Other families with which he was closely allied by blood and marriage were Greenway, Rogers, Lyle, Yeo and others of local prominence, the record of whose long and honorable residence in Cornwall is written on hundreds of tombstones in Kilkhampton and Launcells.

At an early age the subject of this sketch was apprenticed to learn the business of carpenter and cooper with a relative, Mr. Philip Greenway, of Kilkhampton. He patiently served a term of seven years, at the end of which time, being a thoroughly competent workman, he purchased the business at Butsper, then carried on by the late John Upright, who died some years since at Bethany, in this county. On the 5th of May, 1830, he was married to Miss Elizabeth Bellamy, daughter of Humphrey and Grace Bellamy, of Jacobstown parish. The ceremony was performed in the beautiful church in Kilkhampton, where he had been christened, and the baptism of the young pair's first child, the late Mrs. John E. Dudley, born June 26, 1831, was solemnized at the font of Launcells Church, in the adjoining parish.

About this time an emigration fever broke out in Cornwall, and many of Mr. Ham's friends and acquaintances left their homes to seek their fortunes in America. Several of them located in and near Honesdale. In June, 1832, Mr. Ham joined the tide, sailing in a packet ship from Plymouth with his wife and child, and accompanied by several members of his wife's family. Landing in New York in August, in the very height of the cholera epidemic of that year, they hastened into the country, reaching Honesdale via the Hudson River to Rondout and thence up the Delaware and Hudson Canal. Soon after his arrival Mr. Ham was employed by Bentley, Humphreys & Berger, building contractors, to erect a mill for Nathan Skinner, at Cochecton Falls, on the Delaware, a short distance below Milanville. He spent the winter of 1832–33 in that work, returning to Honesdale in the spring of 1833, where he first found employment in the turning factory of the late Amory Prescott, and soon afterward as a carpenter on the Delaware and Hudson Railroad, under the late Judge Phineas Arnold and his brother David. He remained in the company's employ for three years. In the mean time Messrs. Pinckney & Rowland had established boat-yards and dry-docks in Honesdale, and in 1836, after having had a little experience in the yards of Silkworth & Bloomer, he accepted a situation under Mr. James Pinckney, a thoroughly competent ship-carpenter. About 1842 Mr. Ham and the late William Turner commenced building boats for Mr. Pinckney by contract, which association was kept up until some time in 1843, when Mr. Ham rented what was known as the Leonardsville Dock, now owned by C. C. Lane. Two years later he built a dock for himself on the bank of the Lackawaxen, directly opposite the foot of Main Street, and for many years carried on a large and fairly remunerative business, being finally succeeded, in 1862, by his son, W. H. Ham. About 1855, in company with Mr. Turner, he bought the well-known Kimble Mill property, including all of the land lying between the plank-road and the river and canal, from the covered bridge to a point some distance below the mill. The mill was thoroughly overhauled and fitted up with improved machinery, and under the charge of Hon. Thos. E. Grier, now of Pittston, did for some years a very profitable business. Mr. Ham and Mr. Turner were both individually largely engaged in boat-building and repairing during this time, and in 1856 they opened a wholesale and retail flour, provision and grocery-store on lower Main Street, which was a fairly successful venture. This branch of his business having been abandoned in 1859, Mr. Ham devoted himself to, and for the most part has lived on, his farm situate near Seelyville and purchased by him shortly after he arrived in this country. Up to 1864, however, with the exception of two or three years, his residence was continuously in Honesdale. In 1834, while working for the company, he purchased a lot on Fourth Street, and as indicative of his natural energy of character and versatility in mechanical gifts, it may be recalled that he dug the cellar for his house with his own hands, hewed the timber for the frame, made the lath and shingles and built and plastered the dwelling from cellar to garret. In that house his sons William H. and Thomas J. were born. He subsequently sold the place to Thomas Kellow and bought himself a lot adjoining that occupied by Mr. Pinckney, near the covered bridge, where he erected the cottage which was the home of the family for more than a quarter of a century, and where his younger sons,—Charles W. (who died in childhood), Robert W. (of the firm of G. White & Co.) and Frank A.—were born, and where his wife died, universally beloved and mourned, on the 15th day of March, 1867.

In politics Mr. Ham was an active and uncompromising Democrat. He never had a desire for office, but took the keenest personal interest in the promotion of his friends. From time to time he filled some important local positions, such as member of the Town Council, burgess, etc., always discharging the duties faithfully and satisfactorily. He was repeatedly elected a delegate to county conventions, and in all ways open to him sought to advance the interests of the party to which he had allied himself.

Mr. Ham's continuous residence in Honesdale for fifty-three years justly entitles him to a place in these records, not only as one of the pioneers of the borough, but as one whose active and honorable business career, covering nearly the whole period of the town's existence, could not fail to leave a beneficial impress upon the material interests of its people.

HOTELS.

Charles Forbes (who was the father of Mrs. Zenas H. Russell) had the honor of being the first keeper of a public-house in Honesdale. He came to the infant village in 1827 with his family, and became landlord of what is now the Wayne County House, and remained in that capacity until a short time previous to 1840. His successor was Henry Wright, but he was superseded in 1841 by Aaron Green. C. M. Wise was landlord in 1842, and N. Hill in 1844. In the following year Henry Dart took the house and he carried it on in an admirable manner for quite a term of years. Others who presided over the fortunes of the hotel were Foster & Seely, —— Hazelton, D. O. Jones, William H. Cushman, Messrs. Eldred, Skeels, Braman, Henry Brown and E. Reed. John Brown became the owner of the property in 1859. Messrs. E. Reed and Henry Ball became the landlords in 1865, and the latter has for several years conducted the old hotel alone in a manner which extensive patronage indicates is approved.

The Mansion House, which stood where Petersen's store now is, was the second hotel. It had various landlords, among them Thomas L. Reese and Major Eliakim Field, who was a very popular Boniface and widely known. David Abel purchased the property of Field in July, 1846, and not long afterwards the house was destroyed by fire.

The Union Hotel for many years occupied the site of Liberty Hall building. It was called, for a number of years, the Jakway House, after its landlord, Myron Jakway. Among its earlier hosts were A. J. Stryker, Henry Green, Mr. Crawford and Jerome B. Case; and, after Jakway's time, which expired in 1858 or 1859, William J. Fuller was for a short time landlord. Miles L. Tracy became the owner of the property about that time, and erected upon the advantageous site Liberty Hall.

The Sliter House occupies an old hotel site. The original house upon that ground was a small tavern, built by Captain Hiram Plum about 1835. Its best known early landlord was Augustus Sacket, by whose name the house was generally known. Others in succession were Mr. Murray, Joseph Barton, of Waymart, and Patrick Burns. Thomas Coyne finally became the owner and landlord, and was succeeded by his son Michael, who erected the present brick building in 1876. W. J. Sliter, whose name the house now bears, became proprietor in 1883.

The Kiple House, once well known, but now a thing of the past, was built by Robert W. Kiple in 1862. It was, several years since, bought by M. B. Allen and converted into stores.

The Allen House, the chief place of entertainment for the "wayfarer and the stranger," in the borough, was built by the late popular Samuel Allen—a prince of landlords—in 1857, and opened with a great reception in June, 1858. The building is substantial, spacious and conveniently arranged. In 1862 Mr. Allen associated with himself in the management of the house his son, M. B. Allen, who afterwards took the house under a lease. Samuel Allen, however, was again the landlord from 1873 until his death, in 1875, after which M. B. and W. R. Allen became joint managers of the house. In 1878 M. B. Allen bought the entire property. He has since been the landlord and a popular and progressive one, too. He built an addition to the house in 1881, and has introduced many improvements.

The National House was built in 1868 by William Weaver, who was its landlord until his death, in 1873. It was then kept for a time by his widow, and latterly has been carried on by his sons, John H. and Otto Weaver.

Irving Cliff Hotel.—The eligibility of Irving Cliff as a site for a summer hotel had entered many minds in the past few years, and often been casually spoken of, but it remained for William H. Dimmick, Esq., to carry into practical execution the project which others had only dreamed of. The large, handsome, substantial structure which, from its vantage-ground, over three hundred feet of sheer ascent above the waters of the Lackawaxen, now overlooks the beautiful borough and a vast expanse of the fields and "hills of Wayne," is the result, for the most part, of his enterprise and energy. The huge building was commenced in August, 1884, and completed almost exactly a year later. In April, 1885, a stock company was organized to assume ownership of the property. This company, incorporated under the laws of the State, consists of George G. Waller (president), Elias Stanton, William W. Weston, Robert J. Menner, August Hartung, William H. Dimmick, William G. Schenck (New York City), H. Z. Russell (treasurer), and Homer Greene (secretary.) The Irving Cliff Hotel and lands adjacent is now in the control of this corporation, which will, doubtless, after overcoming some difficulties, put the house into the successful operation which its excellent situation and ample accommodations warrant the anticipation of.

Gas Works.—The Honesdale Gas Company was chartered May 17, 1854, the corporators being Richard L. Seely, Henry Dart, E. W. Hamlin, F. M. Crane, F. B. Penniman, H. B. Beardslee, R. M. Grenell, T. H. R. Tracy, R. F. Lord, James R. Dickson, Wm. H. Dimmick, Isaiah Snyder, William Crane and H. B. Hamlin. At a meeting on June 26th, at Jakway's Hotel, F. M. Crane, Esq., was elected president; James R. Dickson, treasurer; and F. B. Penniman, secretary. The stock of the company, amounting to thirty thousand dollars, was taken by R. F. Lord, T. H. R. Tracy, F. M. Crane, W. H. Dimmick, S. E. Dimmick, Charles P. Waller, G. G. Waller, Coe F. Young, Richard L. Seely, John Torrey, James R. Dickson and Francis B. Penniman. On the 12th of May, 1855, the company concluded a contract with S. R. Dickson & Co., of Schuylkill County, for the construction of gas works at a cost of thirty thousand dollars, to be completed by December. The contract was substantially carried out, and the company operated the works until 1881, when they were leased to A. O. Grauger & Co., of Philadelphia, who have since supplied what is termed water gas.

Private gas works were built by John Torrey before the public works were commenced, and he successfully lighted his house and office for about three years, but the works were burned in 1858.

Water Supply.—Honesdale's water supply is from the Glass-Factory Pond and the First and Second Ponds in Dyberry. The first movement towards the introduction of water was made in 1850, when an act was passed incorporating a company for that purpose, consisting of the leading citizens of the place. The movement was not at once successful, but finally the project was realized and a supply of good, pure water brought into town. The pipe system has been gradually extended until it ramifies pretty thoroughly through the thickly-settled part of the borough. The stock of the company is now almost entirely owned in Wilkes-Barre by one or two individuals.

The Telegraph was first introduced to Honesdale, in 1842, by Ezra Cornell, who ran a single line of wire from Montrose to Carbondale, thence to this borough and on to Narrowsburg.

In 1861 Honesdale was put in telegraphic communication with Scranton via Carbondale.

In 1862 Charles Petersen ran the first wire owned by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company—an experimental line from Honesdale to Lackawaxen—obtaining permission from the superintendent, R. F. Lord. It proved successful, and its great value being immediately recognized, it was quickly extended to Rondout, on the Hudson, and then west to Carbondale. Mr. Petersen has been superintendent of the company's lines ever since.

THE PRESS.

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF WRITERS IN HONESDALE AND ELSEWHERE IN THE COUNTY.

Damascus, the scene of the earliest organized settlement in Wayne County, was also the locality in which the first printing-press was set up, but there is no logical connection between these facts. Probably no particular reason other than its easy accessibility influenced the proprietor of the pioneer printing-press to locate it in Damascus. He was one Daniel A. Wilson, who came from Dutchess County, N. Y., as early as the spring of 1811. Doubtless he intended to publish a newspaper, but he did not do so and his intention is only attested by traditional information that he issued a prospectus for one and printed a half-sheet specimen to accompany it, in 1811. It was to be called The Organ of the Woods, had it ever become an entity, and the fact that it did not is undoubtedly to be attributed to lack of sufficient patronage by the few scattered and poor settlers of the region.

Wilson's printing-office was near the ferry, where is now the Cochecton bridge. It was primitive and meagrely supplied with type and the appliances of the art, and still the proprietor was able to secure and execute some work, for it is known that in October, 1811, he was employed by the county officers to print for them two hundred and fifty treasurers' deeds, fifty blank bonds and five hundred jurors' summons. His press was of the kind known to old printers as the "Ramage," one of the best of the early varieties of hand-presses. It had two wooden posts about two or two and a half feet apart, connected near the top by a strong wooden beam, to which was secured the iron nut (or cylinder screw) for the thread of a strong iron screw to work in perpendicularly. The lower end of this screw was attached to the "platen," which presses the paper upon the type when printing, and the swinging of the handlever, attached to the screw thus raised or dropped the platen at pleasure. Ink was applied to the type by hand, with buckskin balls stuffed with wool and secured to wooden handles.

In the latter part of the winter of 1811–12 Wilson engaged David Wilder, of Bethany, to transport the press and the type and appurtenances of the office to the county-seat. Asa Stanton, then a boy and living with his parents in Bethany, assisted in the removal and informed Mr. John Torrey that the whole establishment was transported from Damascus to its new location on pack-horses.

It is clearly ascertained that in March, 1812, the printing establishment of Mr. Wilson was in Bethany, with Increase Hinshaw as printer, and occupied a small building erected for a shoe-shop, which stood where the Dr. Roosa building now stands. Soon after its removal to Bethany it became the property of Jason Torrey and Solomon Moore, who were merchants. On the 14th of March, 1814, Torrey & Moore dissolved partnership, and in their agreement of dissolution it was stipulated that the "printing-office" should be taken by Mr. Moore.

The first newspaper in Wayne County—The Wayne County Mirror—was issued here in Bethany, the then busy, flourishing county-seat, on the 7th of March, 1818. The printing establishment about the first of the year had passed into the ownership of James Manning. He associated with himself a partner, for the paper appeared as owned and edited by Manning & Leonard Loomis, and was printed by Increase Hinshaw, in their employ. The Mirror was printed on good paper and was made up of four columns to the page without head or column rules. It was a folio, about one-quarter the size of the present Wayne County Herald, but its price was fully as large as that of the more ample publications of to-day—"$2.00 per annum, exclusive of postage, payable in advance." The first issue set forth, in addition to the foregoing, the following information for patrons:

"Advertisements not exceeding one square inserted three times for a dollar; every after continuation twenty-five cents; larger ones in proportion.

"No paper will be discontinued until arrearages are paid up.

"Letters to the editors must be post paid."

Mr. Loomis withdrew before the close of the first volume, and the paper was continued by J. Manning. The length of time he continued its publication is not ascertained, but it evidently did not continue longer than the year 1821; for in the summer of 1822 the citizens of Bethany decided to try again to publish and maintain a weekly paper in Bethany. An association was formed for the purpose, and John K. Woodward, Ephraim Torrey, Jr., and Jacob S. Davis, were made a committee, or managers of the association, to edit and arrange for the publication of such a paper, to be called the Republican Advocate.

The old press and types were procured from J. Manning, and William Sasman, a young, thoroughly-trained printer, who had recently completed his apprenticeship in Philadelphia, and whose parents had removed from Philadelphia, and then resided in Dyberry, was engaged to do the printing. The Advocate was a folio sheet (four pages), the printed surface on each page being ten and one-half by seventeen and one-half inches The first number was issued on the first Friday in December, 1822.

At the end of the first year Jacob S. Davis purchased the press and types, and he and W. Sasman continued the publication of the Republican Advocate. For how many years it was thus continued has not been ascertained; but the printing-office having been removed to a room in Mr. Davis' house, and a large addition made to the assortment of type, Davis & Sasman continued to do "job printing" until November, 1829. On the 29th of November, 1829 (which, if the Advocate was thus long continued, was the close of its seventh volume), Mr. Davis sold out the printing establishment and all its appurtenances to Mr. Sasman for six hundred dollars.

Mr. Sasman immediately made arrangements for the publication, in Bethany, of a weekly paper to be called the Wayne Inquirer. The first number was issued on the 12th of January, 1830, the size of the printed page being ten and one-half by seventeen inches. In the second volume the size was increased to eleven and one-half by seventeen inches. The Enquirer was thus published by Mr. Sasman a little more than three years, or until about March, 1833, when Sasman sold out the Enquirer to Peter C. Ward and Asa G. Dimock, who had a few months previously commenced the publication in Honesdale of the Wayne County Herald, soon to be spoken of at length.

The old "Ramage press" subsequently became the property of Paul S. Preston, but the time when he purchased it is not ascertained. In September, 1834, it was in Bethany, and Earl Wheeler then proposed to publish a weekly newspaper there, the first number of which was to be issued in the last week in September. In politics his paper was to "oppose executive usurpation." He did not obtain sufficient assurances of support to warrant its publication.

The Wayne County Herald came into existence in 1832, and it is therefore the oldest newspaper in the county. The frequent changes in its name, style, ownership and editorship and its vicissitudes of fortune during the early period of its career make a marked contrast with the long continued proprietorship and even prosperity and unwavering policy of its later years.

In the summer of 1832, as will appear by a glance at the foregoing matter of this chapter, the only newspaper published in the county was the Wayne Inquirer, a Democratic journal, printed at Bethany, by Wm. Sasman. During that summer Peter C. Ward, formerly of New Milford, Susquehanna County, but then a resident of Honesdale, arranged with Asa G. Dimock, of Montrose, a practical printer, to become a partner with him in the enterprise of publishing at Honesdale a weekly newspaper to be independent in politics.

They procured a new press and type, and under the firm-name of Ward & Dimock, upon the 5th of October, 1832, issued the first number of a paper called the Wayne County Herald.

The office of publication was in the south part of the building next north of John F. Roe's store. Early in 1833 they purchased from Sasman the Inquirer, and merging it with, the paper they had established, called it The Wayne County Herald and Bethany Inquirer, which, as the county was strongly Democratic, they made an organ of the party.

In March, 1833, Mr. Dimock purchased the interest of Mr. Ward and took, as a new partner, Leonard Graves, of Honesdale, and, under the firm-name of Graves & Dimock, they continued the publication of the Herald until the close of 1833.

During the autumn of that year E. Kingsbury, Jr., of Montrose, purchased the paper, and, in connection with Isaac Fuller, a practical printer, also of Montrose, after procuring a new press and type, issued it under the firm-name of Kingsbury & Fuller. They published their first paper on January 3, 1834, as Vol. I. No. 1, thus beginning a new series of volumes, but the name of the paper was continued as formerly, viz.: The Wayne County Herald and Bethany Inquirer. They occupied the same office as Ward & Dimock. The size of their printed page was thirteen and one-half by eighteen inches. Mr. Fuller states that it proved a very unprofitable enterprise to him, and at the end of their first volume, January, 1835, he retired, and the entire establishment was left under the charge of Mr. Kingsbury, and he (Mr. Fuller) is unable to give with accuracy any of its subsequent history. E. Kingsbury, Jr., continued the publication from January, 1835, as editor and proprietor, until early in 1838, with the title of the paper and the size of the printed page unchanged.

On the 1st of April, 1836, Mr. Kingsbury contracted for the purchase of the lot on Main Street, next south of the store late Wm. Reed's, and erected thereon a small building two stories high, the lower floor of which was his business office, and the second floor used as a printing office for the Herald. This building, long known as the "Herald Office Building," was lately occupied by H. Metzger as a drinking saloon, and was destroyed by the large fire in the spring of 1885, which originated in it.

In the early months of 1838 the name of Warren J. Woodward appeared as that of editor, but the name of the proprietor or publisher was not given. This was soon followed by another and more extensive change, whereby on May 1, 1838, a second new series was commenced, and the name of John H. Steck & Co. is given as publishers, but the name of the editor is not given. Probably Mr. Kingsbury was the "Co.," of the firm of John H. Steck & Co."

In October, 1838, Mr. Kingsbury was elected to the Senate for a term of four years, and in November he gave notice that "he had placed his unfinished business in the hands of Thos. J. Hubbell, who would have charge of the same during his absence in Harrisburg."

Early in 1840 the name of Thos. J. Hubbell appeared as editor of the Herald, but no name was given of either publisher or proprietor. The title of the paper and the size of page remained unchanged, but the style of type for printing the title was altered. On the 22d of September, 1840, a third "new series" was commenced, with Thos. J. Hubbell editor and publisher. The size of the printed page was enlarged to fifteen and one-half by nineteen and one-half inches, a new and larger type introduced, and the words and Bethany Inquirer in the title printed in very prominent, heavy-faced black letters. On the 1st of January, 1842, a fourth new series was commenced, with John I. Allen as editor and proprietor. The size of the paper remained the same as under Mr. Hubbell's enlargement, but the title-page was changed by leaving out the words and Bethany Inquirer. Thus with the first number of the tenth year of the publication of the Herald it commenced its fifth series of volumes. Mr. Allen continued as editor and publisher through 1844. In December, 1844, he relinquished the editorial charge to John W. Myers, but retained the proprietorship of the paper. Articles subsequently inserted as editorials, which were written by him, had the signature of "A." appended to them. Mr. Myers soon after had the aid of Charles E. Wright as associate editor and printer, and they continued in charge until the end of July, 1845.

On the 5th of August, 1845, the Herald again appeared under the editorship of John I. Allen, with a card from Messrs. Myers & Wright, stating that circumstances render it necessary for them to resign the editorial charge of the paper. Mr. Wright continued as printer under Mr. Allen.

In December, 1845, another change occurred. Mr. Allen came out with a long valedictory, announcing the termination of his connection with the Herald, both as editor and proprietor. In a subsequent card he stated that he sold out the press, type and material to William H. Dimmick, and the Herald building and lot to Charles E. Wright. The paper was thereafter issued with the name of C. E. Wright as editor and publisher until about the 1st of August, 1847.

In the papers of May and June, 1847, is the business card of "James Norton, attorney-at-law, office in the Herald office."

About the 1st of August, 1847, H. B. Beardslee became the owner of the entire concern, including press, type, materials, office and lot. For a short time thereafter the Herald was published anonymously, or without information to its readers as to the name of either editor, publisher or proprietor. Soon thereafter the names of Beardslee & Norton were given as editors, but no publishers were named.

In the issue of the 15th of March, 1848, the names of Beardslee & Norton were given as publishers. For how long a period Mr. Norton was thus associated in the editorship has not been ascertained, but in the early part of 1849 the name of H. B. Beardslee alone is given as the editor. From such copies of the Herald as have been accessible it is inferred that Mr. Beardslee was the sole editor, publisher and proprietor from this date until 1860.

In March, 1860, the name of Thomas J. Ham is given as assistant editor, and H. B. Beardslee, publisher. In 1860 Mr. Beardslee enlarged the paper, making printed surface of each page fifteen and a half by twenty-two inches.

In September, 1861, Charles Menner and Thomas J. Ham became the proprietors and publishers, and under the partnership name of Menner & Ham edited and published the Herald four years. They enlarged the paper to seventeen and a half by twenty-four inches of printed surface on a page.

In September, 1865, Mr. Ham purchased the interest of his partner, and has since that date published the paper as sole editor and proprietor. May 14, 1868, he further enlarged the sheet, making the printed surface on each page nineteen by twenty-five and a half inches—being just double the size as issued in 1834. Mr. Ham has now been connected with the paper as editor and proprietor about twenty-five years consecutively.

We follow the account of the Herald with biographical sketches of the late H. B. Beardslee and Thomas J. Ham, its best known editors.

Howkin B. Beardslee was born in Mount Pleasant township May 28, 1820. His father, Bulkley Beardslee, was a New England man of remarkable force of character, who came to Wayne County in its early days, and soon became one of its leading citizens. He married Lucretia, daughter of Walter Kimble, a sturdy pioneer, and shortly after the birth of Howkin, having bought the property of his father-in-law, removed to Indian Orchard, where for forty years or more he carried on an extensive business in lumbering and farming, in the mean time filling several local offices of importance, among them that of county commissioner. Howkin proved to be a bright boy, and was given such educational advantages as the county at that time afforded. At a suitable age he entered the law-office of Charles K. Robinson, and in due time was admitted to the bar. Soon afterward he was elected district attorney, then register and recorder, and it was while serving in the latter capacity—in 1847—that, in company with J. H. Norton, he purchased the Wayne County Herald. He subsequently bought Mr. Norton's interest in the paper, and continued its editor until September, 1861, when he sold the establishment to Menner & Ham.

While proprietor of the party organ Mr. Beardslee was a political power in the county, and he was entitled fairly to all the influence and esteem he gathered up. The elements of his power were not obscure. True, he was not an orator. Before assemblies of the people he was not specially effective. There was no charm of manner nor brilliancy of rhetoric in his speeches. He was not an elegant writer. What he accomplished was in virtue of his character, which eminently fitted him to guide and control. Both his intellectual and moral perceptions were clear. He had strong convictions, and never hesitated to pursue the course his convictions pointed out as right and proper. He did not ask what other people thought, or what inconveniences particular lines of policy might involve. He was ready to make almost any sacrifice rather than yield or evade a point he conceived to be fundamental. Of course, such attributes made him obnoxious to opposing partisans, while they made him deservedly strong with his associates and followers. They felt he was not actuated by mercenary motives; that his judgments, perhaps instinctive rather than the product of elaborate cogitation, were just and safe, measured from the stand-point he occupied; and, consequently, that his leadership, instead of being degrading, was essentially elevating.

This quality of chieftainship that was in him was inexplicable to men of lower organization than that which made him conspicuous. Despising moral elevation, particularly in politics, they had no accurate rule by which to measure him, and hence rated him much below his actual merits. This blunder was inevitable to men who rate expediency as the wisest guide of conduct. To them his power and influence were inexplicable; but his potentiality was none the less real. In both branches of the Legislature, in competition with men possessed of more brilliant mental gifts, he readily acquired and steadily held the same ascendency he maintained at home.

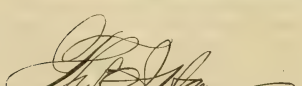
He was almost continuously a member and frequently chairman of the Democratic County Committee, and was sent to nearly all of the conventions and conferences, State and district, in which Wayne was entitled to representation. Twice he received the county indorsement for Congress, but failing to secure the conference ratification, was never elected to that body. He received, however, many substantial proofs of the confidence of his party in his integrity and ability and its appreciation of his services. He acted as deputy for Treasurers Chase and Seaman, and was appointed postmaster at Honesdale by President Buchanan. In 1859 he was elected to the State Legislature. In 1863 he was elected to the State Senate, and in 1869 was appointed district attorney to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Hon. W. H. Dimmick.

One result of these activities was that the legal profession became distasteful to him, and he ceased to pursue it. He gave himself up to journalism as a life-work. But therein he was kept at disadvantage by the serious impairment of a physical constitution at best not robust; but nevertheless executed a large amount of work.



In 1871 he removed to Wilkes-Barre, having purchased an interest in the Luzerne Union. In 1883 he dissolved that connection, and started the Luzerne County Herald. His health was not adequate to the burdens he carried. Domestic bereavements followed. In January, 1886, he was constrained to relinquish business. In February he came over to his old home at Indian Orchard, where he expired on March 11th. He was buried, near his parents, in the rural cemetery which is a conspicuous feature of that vicinage.

Thomas J. Ham was the third child of Thomas and Elizabeth Bellamy Ham (of whom see sketch elsewhere), and was born in Honesdale, February 20, 1837. His elementary education was received in the district schools taught by the late Benjamin W. Dennis and William G. Arnold, after which he was sent to the Honesdale Academy, and subsequently to the Wyoming Seminary at Kingston, Pa. Being a pupil at the academy when the late B. B. Smith relinquished its management, he accepted a position in the new book-store of the latter, and for some time, in connection with his duties as clerk, pursued his studies under the direction of that thorough educator. When fifteen years of age he spent one winter as teacher of a district school at Beach Pond, after which he re-entered the academy, where he remained for about one year, his hours out of school being spent as a clerk in the Honesdale post-office. In 1853 he entered Wyoming Seminary, and while in that institution defrayed a considerable proportion of his expenses by acting as private secretary to the principal, Rev. Dr. Reuben Nelson, and teaching the writing classes. In June, 1855, the second commencement honor was accorded him—that of writing the colloquy for the annual exercises. In 1856 he was given charge of the mercantile business of his father and partner, in which position he remained for three years. During this period he spent his spare moments in writing for newspapers and periodicals, including the Wayne County Herald, and in 1860, on the election of Hon. H. B. Beardslee to the Legislature, he accepted an engagement as assistant editor of that journal, at the same time filling a clerkship in the Honesdale post-office under the late Hon. Isaiah Snyder. In 1861, with the change of administration on the accession of President Lincoln, he visited Prince Edward's Island with a view to locating there in the practice of journalism, but returned in the fall, and in September, in company with Charles Menner, who had been for many years foreman of the office, purchased of the late Hon. H. B. Beardslee the Herald printing establishment. In 1865 he bought Mr. Menner's interest, and since that date has been sole editor and proprietor of the paper. Mr. Ham is a writer of unusual talent, versatility and range of attainments, bringing to his profession a mind broadened and enriched by extensive travel both in Europe and America. In the various fields that engage the attention of the journalist he has won distinction and success, and under his management the Herald has held high rank, both as a local journal and political organ. His ability is widely known in the newspaper world, and he has had frequent opportunities of forming a connection with the editorial staff of some of the leading metropolitan publications, but has uniformly declined them, though acting as an occasional contributor. He was the pioneer in the field of historical research in Wayne County, and in 1870 published an outline of local history of much interest and value, a summary of which was embodied in Dr. Egle's "History of Pennsylvania," published in 1876.

Mr. Ham has ever been an ardent Democrat, and for the past quarter of a century has been almost continuously a member of the Democratic Executive Committee of the county, besides being frequently a delegate to the county conventions, district conferences and State conventions of the party. He held the office of bank assessor for the Senatorial district for three successive terms immediately preceding the change in the law for the collection of the tax on banks.

In 1874 he was nominated for the Legislature in the Wayne and Pike District. Local dissensions between the Democracy of the two counties, however, originating in 1871, and followed in 1873 by an almost fatal difference, broke out in open rupture soon after his nomination. A portion of the Democracy of Pike placed E. B. Eldred, of that county, in nomination as an opposing candidate, and this division of the party vote proved fatal to Democratic success, Thomas Y. Boyd, of Wayne, the Republican candidate, being elected by a small plurality. With these exceptions, and occasional local preferment, he has never held nor sought political office.

For twenty-two consecutive years, Mr. Ham has been secretary of the Wayne County Agricultural Society, and for nine years has also been its treasurer. In these positions he has shown an efficiency that has contributed much to its success.

March 5, 1863, Mr. Ham was married to Laura E., daughter of the late Zachariah Paddock, D.D. Eugene P., aged twenty-one, and William W., aged fourteen, are the surviving children of this union. A daughter, Lizzie, died in 1871, in the fourth year of her age.

Appended are two specimens of Mr. Ham's verse,—

THE FAITHFUL HEART.

An eagle, soaring to the sky,
Feels in his breast the archer's dart;
He flutters, wounded, down to die:
So sinks my heart!

The thrush, forsaken by his mate,
Shrinks from the gleesome flock apart,
And silently bewails his fate:
So pines my heart!

The timid deer stops in the chase:
He bleeds from ev'ry cruel smart;
No more for him the wild-wood race:
So bleeds my heart!

The famished camel sees, at last,
Oases green or Arab mart;
Yet sinks he 'neath the Simoon's blast:
So longs my heart!

The faithful hound falls on the sands;
His blow defies the healer's art:
He crawls and licks the smiter's hands:
Thus true my heart!

Let eagles die, and throstles mourn;
The deer no more from hunters start:
Oh! perish all; but do not scorn
My faithful heart!

NOTHING IN VAIN.

I stood amid a throng. There came
A wrinkled crone adown the street;
Unknown to me the poor thing's name,
Or whither bent her ill-shod feet.

I only saw her weary form,
Her down-cast eyes, her furrowed cheek;
Her shoulders, bent by many a storm,
Her trembling footsteps, slow and weak:

I noted how the well-dressed crowd
Withdrew their skirts to pass her by;
I caught the insults of the proud;
I heard the poor old mother's sigh.

Then hot within my heart I felt
The fires of scorn and anger glow:
Why thus, thought I, has Fortune dealt?
Why should the saints be martyred so?

I had no gift of gold to dole—
A hard and pinching life I live—
And so I gave the poor old soul
A smile—the best I had to give.

'Twas little, and it cost me naught:
Think you the smallest gifts are vain?
I know that simple impulse brought
The richest blessings in its train.

For, though the gray-haired mother took
No seeming notice of my eye,
A low "God bless you for the look!"
She whispered, as she passed me by.

And since that day 'tis mine to know—
Through something sacred in me stirred—
That the Eternal Book will show
The martyr's grateful prayer was heard.

Reverting from the present, whither we have followed the Herald, to the cotemporaries of its youth, we find them upon the Whig side of politics. An abortive attempt was made to start a Whig journal in May, 1836, when a prospectus was issued by E. C. McCray, of Doylestown, to publish the Wayne Telegraph, in Bethany. It was to advocate the election of Harrison and Granger for President and Vice-President. A sufficient number of subscribers was not secured to encourage him to commence its publication.

In the summer or autumn of 1837, as the Herald, which was conducted wholly in the interest of the Democratic party, was the only paper published in the county, Paul S. Preston decided to have a paper published in Bethany which should sustain the policy of the Whig party. He either had previously procured, or then procured, a supply of suitable type, and arranged with Richard Nugent, an experienced printer, who, with Richard Mogridge,[1] (a nephew of Mrs. Preston), were to publish a paper entitled The Wayne County Free Press and Bethany and Honesdale Advertiser. The first number was issued on the 2d of January, 1838.

The size of the printed page of the Free Press when its publication was commenced was only twelve and one-half by eighteen inches, being as large as could be printed on the old Ramage press. In July, 1838, Mr. Preston procured a new press, and the size of the page was then increased to fifteen by nineteen and one-half inches.

Mr. Nugent continued in charge of the paper to the end of the second volume, January, 1840, when he went to Stroudsburg. The Free Press was then published by William F. Rogers, with P. G. Goodrich to assist in the editorial department.

In April, 1840, the publication office of this paper was removed to Honesdale, and located in the old hotel building where Liberty Hall now stands.

During the Presidential campaign of 1840 it was active and efficient in the support of General Harrison, who was elected.

In the formation of President Harrison's Cabinet, Francis Granger was made Postmaster-General; and in June, 1841, he appointed Mr. Rogers postmaster of Honesdale, and the emoluments of that office together with those of the newspaper enabled him to continue the publication of the Free Press.

President Harrison died a few weeks after his inauguration, and Vice-President Tyler succeeded him as President. Mr. Tyler soon thereafter affiliated with the Democrats, and changed his entire Cabinet, giving the office of Postmaster-General to Charles A. Wickliffe, who, in October, 1842, removed Mr. Rogers from his office of postmaster, and appointed a Democrat in his stead. The publication of the Free Press thereafter ceased.

The Beechwoodsman was the successor of the Free Press. In November, 1842, Edward L. Wolf, of Easton, a son of ex-Governor Wolf, arranged to join Mr. Rogers, and they issued a prospectus for publishing, in Honesdale, a paper to be called The Beechwoodsman, to be independent in politics. Under the name of Rogers & Wolf they commenced its publication on January 1, 1843, and so continued it until the spring of 1844, when Mr. Rogers withdrew, and Mr. Wolf alone continued its publication a few months longer, and it was then suspended. At the outbreak of the late war Mr. Rogers raised the Twenty-fifth Regiment of New York Volunteers, marched to the front from Buffalo, and afterward became brigadier-general of volunteers. He still resides in Buffalo.

This paper was published from the same office that had been occupied by the Free Press.

Mr. Preston furnished the press and types for both the Free Press and Beechwoodsman as long as they were published; and without doubt he made greater effort and expended more of capital to sustain a Whig paper in this county than any other citizen of Wayne County.

The Honesdale Democrat, which by process of evolution became the Citizen of the present, was issued first in 1844 as a Democrat-Whig journal. After the nomination of Clay and Frelinghuysen by the Whig Convention, in 1844, as their candidates for President and Vice-President, it was deemed advisable by some of the active Whigs of Wayne County to have an arrangement made by which articles in the interest of their candidate could be placed before the people, and a committee was appointed to make arrangements for that purpose.

The Herald was then published by John I. Allen as the Democratic paper. The committee entered into negotiation with Mr. Allen for the use, each week, for six months, of not exceeding two columns of his paper, in which he should print such articles as the Whig Committee should furnish, but none of these articles to be abusive in style. The sum to be paid to Mr. Allen was agreed upon, and the committee supposed the contract satisfactory on both sides. But when the terms of the contract were written out to be signed by the parties, Mr. Allen insisted on being allowed to use his discretion as to the printing, in his paper, of the articles thus furnished to him. This resulted in the entire failure of the proposed arrangement, and the committee recommended that an effort be made immediately to have a Whig paper started.

Mr. Francis B. Penniman, then of Binghamton, N. Y., was recommended to them as a suitable person to conduct such a paper, and a messenger was at once sent to Binghamton to lay the matter before him and request him to come to Honesdale and see what could be done. His visit to Honesdale resulted in his concluding to issue a prospectus immediately, for the publication, in Honesdale, of the Honesdale Democrat, to commence in September.

To indemnify him against loss for the first year, conditional subscriptions were made by sundry of the patrons, amounting, in the aggregate, to several hundred dollars, and Mr. Preston agreed that for that year his press and type might be used for the printing without charge.

The room used for the printing was the lower floor of R. H. Dunning's building, on Main Street, third door above the Honesdale National Bank, and second door below what is now C. A. Cortright's store.

The first number of the paper was issued on the 17th of September, 1844, the printed surface of each page being fifteen by twenty and a half inches. It contained a brief but characteristic declaration of the editor's views in the following

"SALUTATORY.

"Custom has made it necessary for an editor, at the commencement of his labors, to state what principles he will advocate, and what measures uphold. I shall do so briefly.

"I am a Democratic Whig in thought, feeling and purpose. The distinctive measures of the Whig party are, in my opinion, essential not only to the prosperity of the country but the perpetuity, of its institutions. So believing, I shall use all fair and honorable means to commend them to the acceptance of my readers.

"I shall aim to make the Democrat a useful family paper—a welcome visitor to all circles.

"A stranger to all but a few of the inhabitants of this county, it does not become me to say more of myself. The public will make its own judgment of my course as an editor, as time shall afford opportunity.

"F. B. PENNIMAN.

"Sept. 17, 1844."

After the close of the first year Mr. F. B. Penniman continued to edit and publish the Democrat on his own responsibility until the close of the thirteenth volume, and he had the credit, among his Whig contemporaries, of making it as respectable and efficient as any country paper in the State, and, in fact, in giving it a prominence and weight in moulding public opinion and affairs such as is seldom equaled by a journal outside of a State metropolis or political centre. The editor exercised the same ready, wide knowledge, the same devotion to principle and the same clear, incisive quality in writing which years afterwards became better known when he was the editor of the Pittsburgh Gazette, and a man of marked force in State and national politics.

In 1856 Mr. Penniman purchased the building in which his paper was printed, and it remained the publishing office of the paper until the removal into the office now occupied as the Citizen office.

At the commencement of the fourteenth volume, on the 2d of September, 1857, his son, Edward A. Penniman, who had, in his father's office, been obtaining a thorough knowledge of the art of printing, was admitted as a partner in the business, and the fourteenth volume was published by F. B. Penniman & Son.

At the close of the fourteenth volume, on 25th August, 1858, E. A. Penniman purchased his father's interest in the concern and became sole proprietor, editor and publisher, and so continued, with no change in the name or size of the paper, until January, 1864. On the 18th of January, 1864, he changed the name of the paper to The Republic, and enlarged it by increasing the length of each column one inch, making the printed surface of each page fifteen by eleven and one-half inches, and it so continued to June, 1868.

To this date all the printing had been done on the press purchased by Paul S. Preston, thirty years previously, for use in Bethany.

In June, 1868, a large addition was made to the capital invested, in office material for printing, and a new, larger and greatly-improved power-press was procured, and a larger assortment and greatly-increased stock of type and other material purchased. On the 18th of that month the name of the paper was again changed to the Wayne Citizen, and the size of the sheet increased to twenty-eight by forty-two inches, and the printed page to nineteen and one-quarter by twenty-five and three-quarters inches, which are its present dimensions.

When C. C. Jadwin and S. A. Terrel erected their brick stores on the corner of Main and Eighth Streets, in 1868, an arrangement was made with them to furnish large and convenient rooms on their second floor for the publication of the Citizen, and on the 1st of May, 1869, the publishers removed into the rooms thus provided.

On the 12th of June, 1873, the name of the paper was once more changed to the Honesdale Citizen, and it has since been edited and published under that title by Henry Wilson and E. A. Penniman.

While undergoing several changes of name the paper has remained entirely unchanged in political tone, espousing Republicanism as a natural progression from Whig principles.

Francis Blair Penniman, the founder, and for many years the editor, of the Democrat (now the Citizen), is a representative of the seventh generation of a family which settled in New England over two hundred and fifty years ago. His paternal ancestor, James Penniman, born in England in the year 1600, arrived, with his wife, Lydia, in Boston, in 1628. He was one of the first men of the colony, not merely in the chronological sense, but in steady independence of thought and principle, in power of action and in worth and prominence of character, for he was one of the fifty men proscribed by the General Court, May 17, 1637, in what is known historically as the Antinomian controversy,—one of the fifty men whom Bancroft characterizes as "the first apostles on this continent of the right of private judgment in matters of religion,"—and he was one of the founders of Braintree and the town of Mendon.[1]

On his mother's side, Mr. Penniman is descended from Robert Parmenter who was born in England in 1626, and immigrating to America, settled in Braintree in 1648, and was admitted a freeman May 2, 1650.[2]

His parents were William Penniman (of the sixth generation from James) and Arethusa Parmenter, his wife (of the sixth generation from Robert Parmenter). They were married December 6, 1801, and resided at Utica, N. Y., where our subject, their fourth son, was born November 13, 1812.

The boyhood and youth of Francis B. Penniman were spent in his native town, and in 1826, when he was fourteen years of age, he entered a printing-office (Hastings & Tracy's) and began in the humblest way the career he was to follow, actively and long and effectively. In 1834 he removed to Cleveland, Ohio, and was

[1] Of the first generation of Mr. Penniman's ancestors in America was James Penniman, who was born in England in 1600, and settled, with his wife, Lydia, in Boston, in 1628. Admitted a freeman March 6, 1631. He was one of the fifty men proscribed by the General Court, May 17, 1637, in the Antinomian controversy, led by Anne Hutchinson, of which Bancroft gives a full account in the first volume of his history. (He says those fifty men were the first apostles on this continent of the right of private judgment in matters of religion.) Soon after that proscription he, William Cheesebrooke, Alexander Winchester and Richard Wright made a bargain with the General Court, whereby they surrendered their lands in Boston for the right to lay out a new plantation, ten miles square, between Dorchester and Plymouth, to be known as Braintree. From this town were afterwards set off the towns of Quincy, Holbrook and Randolph. James settled in the part now known as Quincy, and at his death left three tracts of land, one of which passed to John Adams, the year of his marriage, and in the old house, still standing, was born his son, John Q. Adams. May 10, 1643, he was appointed justice of the peace for Braintree. "Colonial Records," vol. iv., Part I., p. 455, states that he, with Gregory Belcher, Theodore Mekins, Robert Twelves and Peter Brackett were the men to whom permission was given to lay out the town of Mendon. He died December 26, 1664. Will dated December 18, 1664, and probated January 1, 1665.

Second Generation.—Deacon Joseph Penniman, fourth child of James and Lydia, born in Braintree August 1, 1639. Married, in 1664, Waiting Robinson, daughter of William Robinson, of Dorchester. She died August 20, 1690, and, May 10, 1693, he married Widow Sarah Stone, daughter of Deacon Samuel Bass, of Braintree. He died November 5, 1705, while his wife, Sarah, survived to be one hundred years old.

Third Generation.—Moses Penniman, fourth child of Joseph and Waiting, born in Braintree February 14, 1677. Married Mary ——. His will dated July 19, 1718, proved August 28, 1718, and provides for son Moses to be brought up at college.

Fourth Generation.—Moses Penniman, sixth child of Moses and Mary, born in Braintree June 1, 1715. He was married, April 17, 1737, by Rev. Dr. Cutler, of Christ's Church, Boston, to Rebecca Edmunds.

Fifth Generation.—William Penniman, fifth child of Moses and Rebecca, born in Braintree July 10, 1743. He was married, June 12, 1769, by Rev. William Walter, of Christ's Church, Boston, to Catharine Hivell. He died in North Adams, Mass., 1809.

Sixth Generation.—William Penniman, third child of William and Catharine, born in Braintree April 12, 1771. Married, December 6, 1801, Arethusa Parmenter, daughter of John Newton Parmenter, of Chester, Mass. She died August 17, 1837. He died January 10, 1856.

Seventh Generation.—Francis B. Penniman.

[2] On his mother's side Francis B. Penniman is descended as follows:

First Generation.—Robert Parmenter, born in England in 1626. Admitted a freeman May 2, 1650, after settlement in Braintree, which was in 1648. He married Leah Sanders, daughter of Martin Sanders, of Braintree. He died June 27, 1695, aged seventy-four years, and she March 24, 1706, aged eighty-six years.

Second Generation.—Deacon Joseph Parmenter, first child of Robert and Leah, born in Braintree, October 22, 1658. Married Mary Marsh, November 17, 1675. He fell dead in the pulpit, during Sunday service, February 20, 1737, aged eighty-two years.

Third Generation.—Benjamin Parmenter, fourth child of Joseph and Mary, born in Braintree, September 9, 1680. He married Hannah Newtown, daughter of Ephraim Newtown, of Milton, Mass.

Fourth Generation.—Benjamin Parmenter, son of Benjamin and Hannah, born in Braintree, December 16, 1712. Married, May 25, 1747, Hannah Bigelow, of Weston, Mass.

Fifth Generation.—John Newton Parmenter, son of the last Benjamin and Hannah, born in Newport, R. I., in 1742. Married, first, October 25, 1764, Lydia Baldwin, daughter of Samuel and Elizabeth Baldwin, of Winchenden, Mass. She was born January 16, 1746, died November 29, 1773. Second marriage, September 27, 1774, Hannah Abbot, of Chester. She died March 2, 1802. Third marriage, February 19, 1806, Dolly Blair, of Blandford. He died December 6, 1828.

Sixth Generation.—Arethusa Parmenter, daughter of John N. and Hannah Abbot, his second wife, and Wm. Penniman, the second. She was born February 13, 1778; married December 6, 1801; died, August 17, 1837.

Seventh Generation.—Francis B. Penniman, fourth son of Arethusa Parmenter and William Penniman, her husband.

engaged for a number of years mainly in book and job printing. The Oberlin Evangelist, (organ of the Oberlin Institute), the Ohio Observer (organ of the Presbyterian Synod of the Western Reserve) and The Agitator (one of the earliest anti-slavery newspapers), were, however, for a considerable period, issued simultaneously from his presses.

In 1844 he came to Honesdale and, as we have already seen, established the Democrat, which was an advocate of Whig doctrines and principles, and was ultimately rechristened the Citizen. Mr. Penniman soon became an active and aggressive force in politics and although only the editor of a small weekly paper in an unimportant town, his ability and zeal won recognition and commanded respect in far wider circles than those which limit the influence of the majority of men similarly situated. He became a factor successively in county, Congressional and State affairs, merely through the natural expansion of the circle of his public acquaintance and a constantly increasing knowledge of his convictions, comprehensive grasp of leading public questions, and his general intellectual strength. To the influence he exerted through his journal—and many of its issues during the momentous years preceding and during the great Civil War contained editorials no whit below those of the metropolitan press, in form or thought—he added that of a popular public speaker, and one who, unlike many, had thoughts to promulgate as well as words to utter. Notwithstanding his intimacy with politics and politicians, his constant activity, the power he exerted through his journal and from the platform, he never held, and probably never desired to hold, political office, unless that of the associate judgeship of Wayne County, to which he was appointed by Governor Pollock, on May 15, 1856, might, by a stretch of propriety, so be denominated. But he was frequently called upon to fill positions of trust and honor, some of them involving difficult and delicate duties. Thus he was appointed by Governor Johnson, in January, 1851, a member of the committee for Pennsylvania, to facilitate the International Exhibition at London; was appointed by Governor Curtin, on March 6, 1862, a trustee of the State Lunatic Hospital, at Harrisburg, and reappointed by Governor Curtin in 1865, and by Governor Geary in 1868; upon the creation of the Board of Public Charities, was made a member thereof, in December, 1869, and held various other similar stations. He was a delegate to the Whig National Convention in 1852, and to the first Republican National Convention in 1856. He was on the Republican Electoral Ticket in 1860, and helped to cast the vote of Pennsylvania for Abraham Lincoln.

Just after the close of the war, in 1865, he entered upon a period of greater activity, and a work involving more labor and responsibility, than he had before experienced. He then became one of the owners and the editor-in-chief of the Pittsburgh Gazette, which, under his able management, absorbed the rival Commercial and achieved a higher reputation than it had ever before or has ever since enjoyed. While presiding over the editorial interests of the Gazette he was unquestionably one of the leading forces in the politics of Pennsylvania. He performed a tremendous work, journalistically and as a platform speaker, and under the strain, too great to be borne by any man, his health became so impaired that he found it necessary to relinquish all employments in which he was engaged. This he did in October, 1870, and since then he has lived in Honesdale, in comfortable retirement, relieved by occasional exercise of pen and voice, as inclination suggests.

When Mr. Penniman retired from the Pittsburgh Gazette, it was written of him in that journal:

"Among the eminent journalists of this State none have been more deservedly prominent for intellectual power or dignified courtesy, and none more distinguished for the range and compass of subjects with which he was conversant, and the fullness and accuracy with which he discussed them."

A competent critic at that juncture wrote of him:

"When writing he concentrated his whole mind on his subject, and in his treatment of it explored its profoundest depths, with every possible aspect available and familiar to him. He was always ready to discuss all topics with the pen of a master."

Both as writer and speaker Mr. Penniman seems to possess that peculiar facility and felicity of expressing his thoughts which is happily characterized in the homely colloquial saying, "he can say anything that he wants to," —whether treating of the simplest facts or discoursing in realms of abstract thought, either with tongue or pen his command of language—of exactly the right language—is really phenomenal. And he has usually had things to say which were worthy of going forth on the wings of the best words.

Mr Penniman was married early in life—May 11, 1835—to Jane W. Broadwell, daughter of Ara Broadwell, of Utica, N. Y., who is still living. Their children are Edward A. (one of the owners and editors of the Honesdale Citizen), Francis B. Penniman, Jr., and Mary (wife of W. K. Dimock).

The next in order of succession of the papers started in Honesdale was the Tribune, a small, four-page weekly, each page being about eight by ten inches. It was edited by Peter H. Miller (colored), and the first number issued on 14th February, 1847. Its publication was continued but a short time. Peter H. Miller afterwards went to Port Jervis, and in January, 1850, started the Port Jervis Express, a small sheet, which was the first newspaper published in that town.

In April, 1848, George M. Reynolds and Francis Drake issued a prospectus for publishing in Honesdale a paper to be called The Weekly Cutter and Wayne County Reformer. The first number was issued on June 1, 1848, and entitled The National Reformer. In politics it advocated the election of Van Buren for President in opposition to Cass, the regular Democratic nominee, and in opposition to General Taylor, the Whig nominee. They had their own type, etc., but the press-work was done in the office of the Democrat. It was published until after the Presidential election, and discontinued in December, 1848.

Mr. Reynolds removed the type and other materials to Carbondale and started a Whig paper, then called the Lackawanna Journal, the first number of which was issued on the 19th of January, 1849. Mr. Drake died in Honesdale in 1849 or 1850. Mr. Reynolds removed West, and died in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in 1880.

The New Dawn was a weekly newspaper started in Honesdale in 1852 and was edited and published by M. H. Cobb. The first number was issued December 1, 1852. Mr. Cobb had his own type, etc., but the press-work was done in the office of the Herald.

When started it claimed to be independent, or neutral, in politics, and was so conducted until after the Democratic nominations were made for the election in 1853. It then became the advocate of the election of James M. Porter as president judge, in opposition to M. M. Dimmick, the regular candidate of the Democrats. It was during that campaign a spirited paper and efficient as a party organ. Soon after the election (at the close of its first volume) it was discontinued, and Mr. Cobb removed the type to Wellsboro', in Tioga County, and started the Tioga Agitator.

In February, 1859, a German paper was started in Honesdale, entitled the Honesdale Wochenblatt. It was edited by Carl Schmidt, and the first number was issued on the 26th of February, 1859. The size of the sheet was twenty-eight by thirty-eight inches.

The fourteenth number of the paper stated that the late editor (C. Schmidt) had run away, and that his real name was Christian Nonnenmacher.

L. Grambs, C. Petersen, F. Schuller, J. Appert and W. Seaman were made a committee to arrange for continuing the publication. Charles K. Beardslee, of Texas, was put in charge as editor and publisher. No. 26 contained his valedictory.

Charles Kolbe then became its manager, and it was continued under his supervision a little more than a year. The eighty-sixth number informed its readers that as the paper had suffered greatly from the neglect of Mr. Kolbe, it would thereafter appear under the management of Morris M. Wiseman. It was continued under his charge to number 103.

After this it was edited and managed by A. Ludwig for a few months, and then, for want of support, in 1861, publication was finally suspended, and Mr. Ludwig removed to Scranton to conduct a German paper there. The paper was printed by or under the supervision of Charles R. Beardslee. In September, 1863, the press and other printing materials were removed by Mr. Beardslee to Hawley to be used in starting the Hawley Free Press.

In March, 1866, the press and types, which had been returned to Hawley to publish the Hawley Free Press, were removed to Honesdale and again put to use there in starting the Eleventh District Monitor. It was edited and published by F. A. Dony and J. H. Dony, and in politics claimed to be Democratic. The first number was issued March 24, 1866, and it was continued until December 13, 1867. It was folio in form, each page being sixteen by twenty-one inches. F. A. Dony is now a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and J. H. Dony a clerk in the War Department in Washton.

The Semi-Weekly Democrat was started in Honesdale by Leroy Bonesteel in 1869. The first number was published on May 28th, and it was thus continued until 22d October, 1869. It was a four-page paper, each page measuring thirteen by twenty inches. In October, 1869, directly after election, it was changed to a weekly publication, and its size enlarged to twenty by twenty-six inches per page, being just double its previous size.

Mr. Bonesteel continued as its manager until December 20, 1870, when he sold out to A. P. Childs. It was continued under Mr. Childs' management until April 28, 1871, when Richard Sandy became associated with him, and under their joint names it was published until 25th of August, 1871, when Mr. Childs withdrew. From that date to the end of 1871 it seems to have been published anonymously.

On the 5th of January, 1872, the name of Mr. Sandy again appeared at its head, and was thus continued to May 3, 1872, when its last number was issued.

The Honesdale Morning Chronicle was the first, last and only venture in the way of a daily newspaper ever attempted in Honesdale. E. H. Mott, now of the New York Sun and the talented teller of its widely-quoted and picturesque Pike County lies, was the editor and proprietor. The size of each printed page was nine and one-half by twelve inches. The type-setting and press-work were done in the Herald office, the first number being issued September 5, 1876, and the last December 20th of the same year, making just one hundred numbers. November 6th the name of the paper was abbreviated to the Morning Chronicle. It was a newsy and sprightly journal, but its owner was compelled to abandon its publication owing to a lack of support and encouragement by the citizens of Honesdale.

THE WAYNE INDEPENDENT.—In the autumn of 1877 very many of the citizens of Wayne County were greatly dissatisfied with the decision of the county commissioners to proceed at once to the erection of a new court-house, especially upon so large and expensive a plan as they had adopted. The people thus dissatisfied, which comprised nearly all of the people of Wayne County, outside of the borough of Honesdale, and many within the borough, after consultation on the subject, decided to oppose and, if practicable, prevent, the erection of so costly a building, unless the matter was first submitted to, and approved by, a vote of the people; and to enable them more easily to keep informed of the state of the case, and to encourage them to persevere in their opposition, it was concluded to issue a weekly newspaper, that should give voice to the people in this and in other matters pertaining to the general welfare of the county, wherein the farmers and others dwelling in the rural districts might be heard in relation to all matters affecting their interests as members of the body politic of Wayne County, with especial reference to the appropriation of the moneys drawn from them by taxation. To this end arrangements were made with B. F. Haines, who was then publishing the Herald at Hancock, N. Y., to remove to Honesdale, and publish a paper to be called The Wayne Independent. Rooms for a printing-office were engaged in the brick store building of J. M. Bauman, and the first number of the paper was issued on the 7th of February, 1878, as a seven-column folio, each page being fifteen and one-half by twenty-one and one-half inches.

Its office of publication was soon afterward removed to the building erected by A. B. Miller for a hotel, and in 1882 the office was again removed to the Peterson & Smith building, where it now remains.

Miles Beardsley, of Cold Spring, N. Y., became associated with Mr. Haines in February, 1879, and so continued until January, 1881, when he left, and the entire management has since devolved upon Mr. Haines. After the first volume the paper was enlarged to an eight-column folio, and in 1882 it was again enlarged to a nine-column folio. The paper has been progressive in every way since its first establishment in the county, and has so faithfully and ably represented the cause of the people that it has constantly increased in circulation and public favor. It now has a circulation of two thousand four hundred copies weekly.

Benj. F. Haines

Benjamin Franklin Haines, the editor of the Wayne Independent, is descended from an English ancestry. His earliest paternal ancestor to emigrate to this side of the Atlantic settled at Salem, Mass., in the seventeenth century.

About the same time his first maternal ancestor in this country, a sea-captain, settled on Gardiner's Island, near New York. About 1735 several of the descendants of these early families removed to Orange County, N. Y., where they were among the pioneers of that now populous and interesting section of country. Among these early settlers were the ancestors of the subject of this sketch. His father, R. R. Haines, was a Quaker, and a hard-working and industrious farmer, a great reader, intelligent, pious, gentle in disposition, but possessed of great firmness of character. He married, in April, 1844, Mary F. Goldsmith, of Coldenham, N. Y., and immediately removed to Maryland, where he purchased a farm in Montgomery County, in that State, twenty miles up the Potomac River, from Washington, D. C. His wife, who accompanied him, was an intelligent Christian woman, possessing an exceedingly cheerful disposition, and a heart filled with kindliness and affection. Her presence in the home ever cast a bright halo around it, and no matter how dark the cloud was that hovered over the family, she always saw the sun shining behind it, exposing to view the silver lining of hope and bright anticipation. There were born to her two children,—a daughter, Susie A. Haines, and Benjamin F. Haines, to whom this sketch is inscribed.

The elder Haines continued to engage in agricultural pursuits in Maryland until the breaking out of the late Civil War, at which time the strong feelings incited by the conflict compelled him to leave the scene of violence and disorder. During the summer of 1861 the Union troops entered the neighborhood, and in November of that year General Banks, with forty thousand men, encamped between the Potomac River and Mr. Haines' farm. After remaining about two weeks the army moved up the river on the Maryland side, leaving the neighborhood behind exposed to the incursions of the Virginia guerrillas. Mr. Haines, being a pronounced anti-slavery man, and known to entertain strong Union sentiments, thereupon disposed of his horses, cattle and grain to General Banks' quartermasters, and packing his most valuable goods in boxes, aided by two friendly neighbors, started on the night of December 12, 1861, on his journey northward, in two wagons, one conveying his household goods and the other his family. After thirty miles of travel by this method a station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was reached, whence the family left for the North in safety, and there spent the remaining years of the war. In May, 1866, the father died, and was buried in the Goodwill Church Cemetery, Orange County, N. Y., three miles from the place where he was born. Not wishing to return to Maryland, the members of the family disposed of the farm there after the close of the war, and remained in the North.

Benjamin F. Haines, as has been intimated, was born in Darnestown, Montgomery County, Md., October 2, 1849. He was early inured to a life of labor and hard work, and from the time he was able to handle a hoe was compelled to labor industriously on the paternal farm. His early schooling advantages were exceedingly limited, but careful educational training at home, supplemented by attendance at a private school, taught by a Massachusetts lady, named Merriam, in connection with the plantation of John L. Dufief, a wealthy planter of his neighborhood, put him in possession of the fundamental principles of a sound English education prior to the removal of his father to the North. In the autumn of 1866 he entered the academy at Montgomery, N. Y., and in 1868 was graduated from that institution, passing an examination by and receiving a diploma from the regents of the Albany University. After teaching school a short time in the town of Hamptonburg, Orange County, N. Y., he was tendered and accepted a situation as purser on a passenger and freighting steamer, the "Isaac P. Smith," running between Savannah, Ga., and Jacksonville, Fla. In 1870 the steamer was taken off the route, and the owner secured places for nearly all the members of the crew, the position of assistant purser on a transatlantic steamer being offered to Mr. Haines. But, owing to the solicitation of his mother, he determined to abandon a sea-faring life, and returning home, decided to adopt the profession of journalism as his life-work. He served a three years' apprenticeship at the printer's trade in the Republican and Standard office, at Montgomery, N. Y., and in 1874, having contributed articles to various journals, in the mean time became editor of the Hancock (N. Y.) Herald, at that time owned by an association. After successfully managing the paper for a year he became its owner by purchase, and continued its publication until January, 1878. At that time, being urged by many prominent citizens of Wayne County, Pa., among them being Hon. W. M. Nelson and George S. Purdy, Esq., to establish a paper at Honesdale, the county-seat, in opposition to the project of building a new court-house at that place, he removed there, and in the middle of January, 1878, he issued the prospectus of the new paper, and on the morning of February 7, 1878, just at the break of day, the force, editor and all, having worked all night, the first copy of the Wayne Independent was given to the world. It was a small, seven-column quarto, but what it lacked in size it made up in force, piquancy and enthusiasm. The paper began with a subscription list of nine hundred, and its career has since been marked by a healthy, steady growth. In 1879 it was increased in size to eight columns, and in 1884 to a nine-column quarto, its present size. The circulation in 1886 is a little over twenty-four hundred copies.

Besides doing the entire work of his own paper, he is a regular contributor to the columns of the New York Herald and Philadelphia Times.

Mr. Haines is still the owner and editor of the Independent, and one of the representative newspaper men of Northeastern Pennsylvania. He wields a graceful and facile pen, making his points with force and precision, and managing the executive or business part of his paper with rare skill. He lays no claim to brilliant endowments, gifted literary talents or superior abilities in any direction, but has achieved his present place in life by persistent labor and close application. He rejoices in his early home-training, and in the fact that his success is due to the rigid industry to which he was early inured, and to the guidance of scrupulously devout and thoroughly practical Christian parents. He has not abandoned the industrious habits of earlier years, but may be found in his office, surrounded by his assistants, early and late. He is a man of abstemious habits, regular and systematic in all that he does, of strict integrity and of wide influence in the place in which he has established his home.

May 25, 1875, Mr. Haines was united in marriage to Mrs. Dr. James Low, née Margaret Eager Millspaugh, of Montgomery, N. Y., a woman of superior qualities, a most careful housekeeper and admirable home-maker. The economy and systematic routine of her management are the foundations on which the beauty and serenity of her home rest, and in it the simplest and most spontaneous hospitality dwells.

VARIOUS WRITERS OF POETRY AND FICTION.—Wayne County has been prolific of writers out of all proportion to population, educational advantages and literary stimulus or "literary atmosphere." They have, as a rule, been writers of poetry of the minor class, and several of them have displayed a very high order of merit. One of these writers (Emma May Buckingham) says,—

"AUTHORS OF OLD WAYNE.

"There is something in the sterile soil of old Wayne which favors the growth of talent and literary culture, judging from the number of authors who have been raised in this county.

"'Stella, of Lackawanna,' née Harriet Hollister, now the widow of the late L. Watres, of Scranton, was born and educated in Hollisterville. She ranks high as a poetess, and is a contributor to several newspapers and periodicals. (She was born January 27, 1821, in Salem, and is the daughter of Alanson Hollister.)

"Dr. H. Hollister, her brother, and author of the history of Luzerne and Lackawanna Counties, is a native of Wayne. David W. Belisle, of Camden, N. J., and editor of the Saturday Evening Express, also author of 'The Parterre,' a volume of poems, a novel and 'The History of Independence Hall and Its Signers,' published in Philadelphia in 1859, and other works written conjointly with his gifted wife (née Orvilla Gleason, of Wayne County), was a resident of Paupack township, this county.

"Hon. Truman H. Purdy, of Sunbury, Pa., a lawyer of note and ex-member of the State Legislature, the author of a two-hundred page poem, entitled 'Doubter,' and many short poems, is a native of Paupack, Wayne County. Mr. Purdy was educated at Lewisburgh, Pa. This University conferred upon him the title of A.M. Mrs. Harriet Purdy Cochrane, of 925 Melon Street, Philadelphia, née Harriet Purdy, was raised and educated in Purdytown, Paupack township, and is one of Wayne County's most gifted children. She is the author of a beautifully written book entitled 'Drift from the Shore of the Hereafter,' a work issued in pamphlet form by Anvil & Co., Philadelphia, in 1883, who writes under the nom de plume of 'Amaranth.' Alma Calder (now Mrs. Johnson, of New York City), of Equinunk. Alma Calder is a talented as well as popular writer, and indisputably one of the authors of the 'Saxe Holm Stories.' She is the daughter of the Rev. Alexander Calder."

Besides the writers mentioned in the foregoing remarks, there are quite a number of others. Mary Ashby Townsend has sung sweetly of the "Hills of Wayne," and written a most plaintive lyric, entitled "A Woman's Wish," both of which we reproduce. It is to be regretted that nothing of interest can be learned of this writer, for a few facts concerning one who can write such meritorious verse as "The Hills of Wayne" should be preserved among the people of the county she has expressed such love for.

Most widely and well known among the writers who are natives of Wayne County is Homer Greene, Esq., the author of "What my Lover Said," "My Daughter Louise," "Kitty," and many other poems, and of the very realistic and touching story of "Dick, the Door Boy,"—an episode of life in the anthracite coal region—the prize story of the Scranton Truth, published in its issue of Christmas, 1884. This is the chief example of Mr. Greene's ability in prose composition, and notable as its merits are, it cannot be regarded as testifying so strongly to his genius as do his poems. These have already won for him no small measure of fame, and must constantly bring more, for no fugitive poems have more constantly occupied the newspaper corners, and appealed stronger either to the popular heart or critical brain than have "What my Lover Said" and two or three others of his productions. They are chaste and dainty in diction, delicate and subtle—the very essence of poetry. We reproduce them further on in these pages, and give here a brief biographical sketch of the author.

Homer Greene was born at No. 19, in Salem township (now Ariel, in Lake township), Wayne County, January 10, 1853. He attended the district school until thirteen years of age, and in the spring of 1867 went to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., to attend the Riverview Military Academy, and remained there two years, holding a position both years in the "honor grade" among the first three. In the summer of 1869, he entered the corps of civil and mining engineers of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, with headquarters at Pittston, Pa. He remained there until the winter of 1871–72, doing land surveying, railroad engineering, mining engineering and drafting.

In the spring of 1872 he entered the engineering class of '74 at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., and was graduated with the degree of C.E. in the spring of 1874, and immediately entered the class of '76 for the purpose of completing a four years' course in the Scientific Department; was graduated in June, 1876, with the degree of A.B. At graduation he took the first Blatchford prize medal for oratory, the first Clarke prize, the first president's prize and the second Ingham prize for essays on literary subjects. In the fall of 1876 he went on the "stump" in Wayne County for the Republican Presidential ticket.

In November, 1876, he entered the Albany Law School and was graduated therefrom with the degree of LL.B. in 1877, and admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the State of New York. In the fall of 1877 he began a course of study under H. M. Seely, Esq., at Honesdale, and was admitted to practice in the court of Wayne County at December Term, 1879. In 1881 he was elected district attorney on the Republican ticket by a majority of seventy-eight, the Democratic majority for State officers the same year being over five hundred, and all other Republican candidates for county offices being defeated.

His first literary effort was a story entitled "The Mad Skater" published in Mayne Reid's magazine Onward for June, 1869. While at college he was correspondent for the New York Evening Post, Albany Evening Journal, Albany Argus and Troy Whig. He has contributed in poetry and prose to the New York Evening Post, Christian Union, The Continent, Lippincott's Magazine and The Critic.

Mr. Greene was married September 20, 1883, to Matilda E. Gilbert, who died August 22, 1884. On the 30th of June, 1886, he was married to Miss Catharine F. Gaines, of Albany, N. Y.

Emma May Buckingham was born in Paupack, Wayne County, Pa. She early evinced a desire for an education, studied faithfully at home and in the district school, and, after teaching a select school in Salem (now Lake township) for a year, entered Wyoming Seminary in 1855. She graduated at the close of her second year.

Another year was occupied in study in Fair Haven Seminary, New Haven, Conn., in art studies, which were continued a year longer in Wyoming Seminary, at Kingston, Pa.

In 1860 she accepted a situation in the Hazelton (Pa.) graded school, where she remained seven years, when ill health induced her to resign her position. She subsequently taught in the city of Scranton, in Westbrook Academy, Connecticut, and also in the Honesdale graded school—three years each in the last two places.

While teaching in Honesdale she completed her first book, entitled "A Self-Made Woman; or, Mary Idyl's Trials and Triumphs," a work of three hundred and forty-three pages, which was published by the firm of S. R. Wells, now Fowler & Wells, of 753 Broadway, New York. The first edition was issued during the winter of 1874, and before the close of that year it reached its third edition, and a seventh edition will soon be printed. The book was very favorably received, both by the press and public.

In 1877 her second book, a poetical romance entitled "Pearl: a Centennial Poem," was issued by the same publishers. It was very favorably received, and a third edition is already needed. The notices of the press were kind and complimentary without an exception. A miscellaneous collection of poems, for a companion volume to "Pearl," was published by S. R. Wells & Co. in 1878. It is named after its leading poem "The Silver Chalice," and contains eighty pages. It also received a very wide, as well as flattering, notice from the press throughout the United States, and has reached its third edition.

Miss Buckingham's fourth book, a seaside story, "Parson Thorne's Trial," was published in 1880 by George W. Carleton & Co., of Madison Square, New York. This work contains three hundred and sixty-four pages. It is the authoress' favorite of all her printed compositions, and, like her other works, although wearing the garb of fiction (as far as names of characters and places are concerned), is drawn mainly from real life and actual circumstances. This book was popular from the first. The notices and reviews from the American press, as well as the press of Great Britain,—for "Parson Thorne's Trial" was published also by S. Lowe & Co., in London, England,—were exceedingly favorable. This book has also reached several editions. We copy the following extracts from the National Press.—Ed.

A temperance poem entitled "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" will soon be issued in pamphlet form for the benefit of the Wayne County temperance work, and the author is at present engaged on a new work entitled "Lilian: A Sequel to 'A Self-Made Woman.'"

Emma May Buckingham is a contributor to the Pennsylvania School Journal, the New York Phrenological Journal, The Wayne Independent, as well as many popular magazines and periodicals. She has won a reputation as an essayist on æsthetic educational matters, moral culture and temperance reform.

The subject of the above sketch resides with her widowed mother in Hamlinton, Wayne County, Pa. Her ambition is to do better work in the future, to win a reputation as an American writer of both prose and poetry.

Other than these writers of whom more or less extended mention has been made, there are several others, who, if not natives of Wayne County, have been of its people and well known among them.

L. Carroll Judson, author of "Lives of the Signers of the Declaration" and "the Moral Probe," was an early settler in Bethany, and for a number of years principal of the academy there. His son, the well known Col. E. Z. C. Judson, the well-known story writer, spent his youth in Bethany.

Belinda Cramer was for several years a frequent contributor of verse to the local papers and sometimes to the metropolitan press and magazines.

"Lucy Linden," or Mrs. Dr. W. W. Sanger, for a number of years a resident of Honesdale, was a prolific and meritorious writer of both prose and verse.

Rev. Henry A. Rowland, long time pastor of the Honesdale Presbyterian Church, was the author of two popular religious works, "Light in a Dark Alley" and "The Way of Peace."

Harrison Gray Otis, Jr., of Boston (a grandson of James Otis, of Revolutionary fame), who long made his summer home in a rambling old house, still standing, in Bethany, was a very frequent contributor to the Wayne County Herald, under the nom de plume of "Sito,"—a reversion of Otis.

Marshall Wheeler (now of Warren, Pa.), while in Wayne County, wrote "The Lost Hunter Found," and "My Ada."

M. H. Cobb, now of the Philadelphia Mint, and formerly editor of the New Dawn, at Honesdale, wrote considerably in verse while here, and so also did D. W. Belisle, now of the Camden (N. J.) Democrat, and so also did J. Willis Westlake (now a professor in the State Normal School at Millersville) when he lived a few years ago at Seelyville.

Appended are poems by Homer Greene, Mary Ashby Townsend and Harriet Watres (née Hollister) or "Stella of Lackawanna." Of Mr. Ham's verse two examples have already been given.

WHAT MY LOVER SAID.

HOMER GREENE.

By the merest chance, in the twilight gloom,
In the orchard path he met me;
In the tall, wet grass, with its faint perfume,
And I tried to pass, but he made no room,
Oh I tried, but he would not let me.
So I stood and blushed till the grass grew red,
With my face bent down above it,
While he took my hand as he whispering said—
(How the clover lifted each pink, sweet head,
To listen to all that my lover said;
Oh, the clover in bloom, I love it!)

In the high, wet grass went the path to hide,
And the low, wet leaves hung over;
But I could not pass upon either side,
For I found myself, when I vainly tried,
In the arms of my steadfast lover.
And he held me there and he raised my head,
While he closed the path before me.
And he looked down into my eyes and said—
(How the leaves bent down from the boughs o'er head,
To listen to all that my lover said.
Oh, the leaves hanging lowly o'er me!)

Had he moved aside but a little way,
I could surely then have passed him;
And he knew I never could wish to stay,
And would not have heard what he had to say,
Could I only aside have cast him.
It was almost dark, and the moments sped,
And the searching night-wind found us,
But he drew me nearer and softly said—
(How the pure, sweet wind grew still, instead,
To listen to all that my lover said;
Oh, the whispering wind around us!)

I am sure he knew when he held me fast,
That I must be all unwilling;
For I tried to go, and I would have passed,
As the night was come with its dew, at last,
And the sky with its stars was filling.
But he clasped me close when I would have fled,
And he made me hear his story,
And his soul came out from his lips and said—
(How the stars crept out where the white moon led,
To listen to all that my lover said;
Oh, the moon and the stars in glory!)

I know that the grass and the leaves will not tell.
And I'm sure that the wind, precious rover,
Will carry my secret so safely and well
That no being shall ever discover
One word of the many that rapidly fell
From the soul-speaking lips of my lover;
And the moon and the stars that looked over
Shall never reveal what a fairy-like spell
They wove round about us that night in the dell,
In the path through the dew-laden clover,
Nor echo the whispers that made my heart swell
As they fell from the lips of my lover.

MY DAUGHTER LOUISE.

HOMER GREENE.

In the light of the moon, by the side of the water,
My seat on the sand and her seat on my knees,
We watch the bright billows do I and my daughter,
My sweet little daughter Louise.
We wonder what city the pathway of glory,
That broadens away to the limitless west,
Leads up to—she minds her of some pretty story
And says: "To the city that mortals love best."
Then I say: "It must lead to the far-away city,
The beautiful City of Rest."

In the light of the moon, by the side of the water,
Stand two in the shadow of whispering trees,
And one loves my daughter, my beautiful daughter,
My womanly daughter Louise.
She steps to the boat with a touch of his fingers,
And out on the diamonded pathway they move;
The shallop is lost in the distance, it lingers,
It waits, but I know that its coming will prove
That it went to the walls of the wonderful city,
The magical City of Love.

In the light of the moon, by the side of the water,
I wait for her coming from over the seas;
I wait but to welcome the dust of my daughter,
To weep for my daughter Louise.
The path, as of old, reaching out in its splendor,
Gleams bright, like a way that an angel has trod:
I kiss the cold burden its billows surrender,
Sweet clay to lie under the pitiful sod;
But she rests, at the end of the path, in the city,
Whose "builder and maker is God."

KITTY.

HOMER GREENE.

I could not call her by the name
 Her Quaker mother gave her;
Unwilling were my lips to frame,
For one like her, a word so tame,
 With neither salt nor savor.
But, somehow, as I dreamed of her,
 Neglecting Kent and Chitty,
To mind and heart would still recur
 One name, and that was—Kitty.

A name some flitting fancy wrought,
 I know not why nor wherefore,
It came to dwell with me unsought,
Yet ever to my mind it brought
 One face and form, and therefore
On many a marge of legal brief,
 In many a careless ditty,
On tinted sheet and printed leaf,
 I scrawled the name of—Kitty.

I wrote to her one day, but why
 I do not now remember;
I know I dared address her, "My
Dear Kitty," and in swift reply,
 All in the glad September,
Came friendly note, and, at the close,
 Than written word more witty,
A pictured kitten in repose,
 The sign and seal of—Kitty.

This name I gave her to her face.
 Her lips did not reprove me;
It fitted her with dainty grace,
And—strange the name should win the race—
 Thenceforth she learned to love me.
And sweet the joy I find in this,
 While all the world I pity,
That none with me may share the bliss
 Of calling her my—Kitty.

THE HILLS OF WAYNE.

MARY ASHBY TOWNSEND.

Ye hills of Wayne! ye hills of Wayne!
In dreams I see your slopes again—
In dreams my childish feet explore
Your daisied dells, beloved of yore,
In dreams with eager feet I press
Far up your heights of loveliness,
And stand a glad-eyed girl again
Upon the happy hills of Wayne!

I see once more the glad sunrise
Break on the world's awakening eyes,
I see once more the tender corn
Shake out its banners to the morn.
I see the sleepy valleys kissed
And robbed of all their robes of mist,
And laughing day is queen again
Of all the verdant hills of Wayne.

I bind about my childish brow
The bloomy thorn tree's scented snow.
I see, upon the fading flowers,
The fatal fingers of the hours.
I see the distant village spire
Catch on its tips a spark of fire,
As in my dreams the sun again
Goes down behind the hills of Wayne.

The cow-boy's coaxing call across
The meadow comes, "Co-boss! Co-boss!"
And milky-odored cattle lift
Their hoofs among the daisy drift.
The day is over all too soon,
And up the sky the haunted moon
Glides with its ghost, and bends again
Above the wooded hills of Wayne.

Ah! I have laughed in many a land
And I have sighed on many a strand,
And lonely beach, where written be
The solemn scriptures of the sea.
And I have climbed the grandest heights
The moon of midnight ever lights,
But memory turned from all again
To kneel upon the hills of Wayne.

Ye hills of Wayne! ye hills of Wayne!
Ye woods, ye vales, ye fields of grain!
Ye scented morns, ye blue-eyed noons!
Ye ever unforgotten moons!
No matter where my latest breath
Shall freeze beneath the kiss of death,
May some one bear me back again
To sleep among the hills of Wayne!

A WOMAN'S WISH.

MARY ASHBY TOWNSEND.

Would I were lying in a field of clover,
 Of clover cool and soft, and soft and sweet,
With dusky clouds in deep skies hanging over,
 And scented silence at my head and feet.

Just for one hour to slip the leash of Worry,
 In eager haste from Thought's impatient neck,
And watch it coursing, in its heedless hurry
 Disdaining Wisdom's call or Duty's beck.

Ah! it were sweet, where clover clumps are meeting
 And daisies hiding, so to hide and rest;
No sound except my own heart's sturdy beating,
 Rocking itself to sleep within my breast.

Just to lie there, filled with the deeper breathing
 That comes of listening to a wild bird's song!
Our souls require at times this full unsheathing—
 All swords will rust if scabbard-kept too long!

And I am tired—so tired of rigid duty,
So tired of all my tired hands find to do!
I yearn, I faint for some of life's free beauty,
Its loose beads with no straight string running through!

Ay, laugh, if laugh you will at my crude speech;
But women sometimes die of such a greed,
Die for the small joys held beyond their reach,
And the assurance they have all they need.

HOME.

BY STELLA OF LACKAWANNA (MRS. WAIRES).

'Mid the heart-breaks of life come and see, come and see
What the world holds for me.

Modest-roofed and low-walled is the nest where I hide,
From the roughness outside.

Swing the door softly shut, that no treacherous feet
Tread this restful retreat.

Push the bolt, lest a breath from the simoon of sin
Flutter stealthily in.

Draw the blinds, that we see not the shipwrecks that float
The bold sea-main;—or note,

How great gales rend the sails, and the rocks cringe with fear—
Only warm winds breathe here.

Could the sunshine of morn touch with heaven's own kiss
Fairer harbor than this?

Hark! the legions that wait on the mandates of hate,
Pause and press at the gate.

But so homely a threshold, so humble a nest,
They but scorn to molest.

Marvel not that I love these low walls; incomplete,
With a world at my feet

Were life's gifts, if no sheltering wall 'twixt my soul,
And the breakers' wild roll.

WYOMING.

BY STELLA OF LACKAWANNA (MRS. WAIRES).

Over the dust of a century's dead,
Hushed be our laughter, and muffled our tread;
Voice no loud anthem; we stand where they stood—
Kinsmen, that hallowed the turf with their blood:
Soft as the strains of a lute o'er the sea,
Let the deep chords of our symphonies be:
Noiseless the foot-fall, and low-bowed the head,
Over the dust of a century's dead.

Who has not shuddered, with cheek ashen pale,
At the appalling and soul-thrilling tale,
Traced o'er the page of a weird long-ago,
With the deep pathos of measureless woe?
Who never traversed—though seas roll between—
Cool-breathing wildwood, and shadowed ravine,
Where rang the war-whoop, and bended the bow,
Of a red-handed and treacherous foe?

Curls the blue smoke from a home so apart,
That never quickened a throb of the heart,
O'er the dire story of rapine and wrong,
Blighting our beautiful Valley so long?
Stretches a solitude—gloom-girt and far—
Where glows a sunbeam, or glitters a star,
That never caught from the night-wailing blast
Hints of our tragic and terrible past?

As clears the mist from the forehead of night,
Brightened the sky; see! what sparkle, what light,
Over the green slope of meadow and hill,
Where the wild roses are nodding at will:
Over the river that moaned in its flow
Twice fifty perilous summers ago,
When, by its tide, in the sunset's low fires,
Fell, with slow torture, our fiend-hunted sires.

Down the far centuries—winding their way
'Mong the gray vapors of time—shall the clay,
Tenderly wrapped at the granite's pure feet,
Be all forgot in life's hurry and heat?
No, sob the waves from the muse-haunted shore;
No, sigh the forests, with arms drooping lower;
Nor may the years—swift as eagles above—
Purge the red stain from the Valley we love.

Over a century's historic dust,
This be our legacy, this our proud trust—
That no invading and arrogant tread
Press the dear turf folded over our dead:
And the sweet tide of each incoming spring
To our fair homes no disloyalty bring:
This be our legacy, this our proud trust,
Over a century's love-hallowed dust.

TWO SONGS.

BY "STELLA OF LACKAWANNA" (MRS. HARRIET (HOLLISTER) WAIRES).

A song was mine in other days,
With rose-buds in my button-hole,
And eyes with passion all ablaze,
And love-fires raging in my soul;—
All for a girl with ruby lips,
And cheeks with dimples always coming;—
But not the same—oh, no—that now
You hear me humming.

Tune shaped itself, I could but sing,
Regardless quite of rule or rote;
For youth was such a glorious thing,
And love had birth in every note;
And all the grand-spread world was mine,
With airy schemes and castles plenty;
And then I knew it all, you see,
What fools at twenty!

My tune is changed; pray look at me!
No more the splendor of cravat;
Or foot that minced so daintily,
Or hair pomatumed, and all that:
But stout and stoic, with my locks
By snows of many winters grizzled:
And if I breathe a song at all,
'Tis, somehow, whistled.

And yet not in the merry mood
Of those old, sentimental days,
When Hope-birds chirped in every wood,
And set my foolish heart ablaze:
But at the rise and fall of stocks,
And general craze of half our species
O'er some new quagmire, said to teem
With golden fishes.

I fought the world; the world struck back,
And laid me prostrate on the field,
With all my music hushed: alack!
What may the weaker do but yield?
My notes are promises to pay:
And I am out of tune completely;
Who would imagine that my voice
Once piped so sweetly?

With rosebuds in my button-hole!
It seems a hundred years, or more,
Since passion all my senses stole,
And I crooned love-songs o'er and o'er;
All for a girl with dimpled cheek,
Just born for my entire enslaving:
Ha! ha! no witchery like that Now sets me raving.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

The First Presbyterian Church (Honesdale, Pa.)—That portion of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania now known as Wayne County began to be settled during the latter half of the last century. The emigrants were of all races, and from different sections of the country. Those from New England, New York and New Jersey predominated. In the year 1800 the territory now called Wayne County, so named in honor of General Anthony Wayne, contained about eight hundred inhabitants.

The earliest efforts to make provision for the religious wants of the inhabitants of the county were made by the Baptists. In the spring of 1791 Mr. Samuel Stanton came from Preston, Conn., and located as the first settler in what is now called the town of Mount Pleasant. He and his wife were free communion Baptists. Others of the same faith joined them from time to time, chiefly from New England. In the spring of 1793 the public worship of God was commenced in this settlement. Having no minister of the gospel to preach for them, they read and listened to printed discourses. In July, 1795, at the request of Mr. Stanton, Rev. David Jayne, a minister of the Baptist denomination, born in Goshen, N. Y., in 1750, visited the place and preached to the people. This was probably the first sermon ever preached in what is now known as Wayne County. On the 28th of June, 1796, a free Communion Baptist Church was organized, consisting of six members. In 1800 Rev. Ephaphras Thompson became resident pastor of this church. This county was, from time to time, visited by ministers of the Congregational and Presbyterian order. In 1797 Rev. Daniel Thatcher, a missionary of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, visited this region. He administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper July 9th of that year, to the members of the church of Mount Pleasant. In the spring of 1812 Rev. Worthington Wright, a missionary from Connecticut, came to Wayne County and spent the summer preaching at its different settlements. In the autumn he accepted a call to settle in the county. On the 26th of May, 1813, he was installed over the Congregational Church in Salem and Palmyra. His congregation consisted of subscribers residing in Salem, Palmyra, Canaan and Dyberry. His residence was at Bethany. In 1815, having lost his wife and his health having partially failed, he asked a dismission and left the county.

On the 26th of January, 1814, a Congregational Church was organized in Mount Pleasant by Rev. Worthington Wright and Rev. Ebenezer Kingsbury, both of whom were missionaries sent out by the Connecticut Missionary Society. It was organized with seventeen members. In 1831 this church changed its form of government and became Presbyterian, which form it still retains. Its first pastor, after it became Presbyterian in form, was Rev. Henry A. Boyce, installed July 8, 1835. In the years 1823 and 1825 Maurice Wurts obtained acts of incorporation and succeeded in forming the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company. When it became known that the valley in which Honesdale stands would be the termination of the canal and of the railroad to the Lackawanna coal-fields, population began to come in. The people who had gathered here soon began to feel the need of religious instruction and religious institutions. The record of the earliest effort to supply this want this church has still in its possession. It consists of a subscription paper drawn up by Edward Mills, to which are appended the names and subscriptions of various individuals who resided in Honesdale and its vicinity. It is as follows:

"The subscribers, inhabitants of Honesdale and vicinity, being desirous of obtaining and enjoying a preached gospel in the neighborhood, and believing it to be a means well calculated to promote social and individual happiness, and, at the same time, of adding greatly to the respectability of the place, do agree to pay the amounts respectively affixed to our names to Joseph L. Kellogg, Edward Mills, Isaac P. Foster, Committee of the Presbyterian Society in this place, for the purpose of employing Rev. Joel Campbell to labor one-half of the time, for the term of one year, commencing the 1st day of January, 1829, and ending the 1st day of January, 1830, or for such portion of the time during the year as there may be funds subscribed, provided an arrangement can be made with Mr. Campbell to perform the above-named labor; if not, then to be applied as compensation to such other evangelical gospel minister as the Committee shall employ.

"(Dated) Honesdale, Dec. 23rd, 1828."

This paper is signed by the following individuals, subscribing various sums: Alanson Blood, Edward Mills, Elam Woodward, Albert Jones, David St. John, Chas. P. Clark, Preserved Hind, David R. Stark, Levi Schoonover, Joseph Skinner, Benjamin Staysa, Timothy C. Staysa, Orrin Hind, Christopher Beardslee, Thomas Young, Geo. W. Dickenson, Joseph L. Kellogg, Samuel H. Benedict, Isaac P. Foster, Leonard Graves, J. B. Jervis, Charles Forbes, William C. Rose, Revillo C. Hatch, Timothy B. Jervis, Charles Bartlett, John McMillan, Ira Tripp, Russel Spenser, Timothy N. With the funds obtained by this subscription the services of Rev. Joel Campbell were secured for half the time. He came down from Bethany during the year 1829 and preached every Sabbath afternoon for the inhabitants of Honesdale and vicinity. During the forenoon of the Sabbath a meeting was held and printed sermons read. On the 11th of February, 1829, this church was organized in the boarding-house, which was afterwards enlarged and known as the Tabernacle. The following clergymen were present at the organization: Rev. Joel Campbell, of Bethany; Rev. Thomas Grear, of Milford; Rev. Burr Baldwin, of Montrose; Rev. James Adams, of Dundaff; Rev. Adam Miller, of Harford. Rev. Mr. Grear opened the meeting with prayer and delivered a discourse from 2 Corinthians 5: 20,—"Now then we are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." After the sermon Rev. Joel Campbell proceeded to organize the church. The following persons produced certificates from their respective churches: Isaac P. Foster and Mary Foster, from the church of Montrose; Horace Baldwin and Olive P. Baldwin, from the church of Dundaff; Stephen Torrey and Rebecca Schoonover, from the church of Bethany; Lucy Forbes, from the church of New Bedford, Mass.; Charles P. Clark, from the church of Canterbury, Conn.; Joseph L. Kellogg, from the Central Presbyterian Church, New York City. These nine individuals were organized into a Church of Christ, designated "The First Presbyterian Church of Honesdale." The meeting was closed with singing, and prayer by Rev. Adam Miller. At the first communion after the organization of the church Maurice Wurts, John Littlejohn and John B. Mills were received into membership on profession of their faith. Religious services were at first held in a small school-house, located a little back of John Brown's residence. This school-house was built in 1828. Afterwards an upper room in the store-house of Messrs. Russell & Wilcox was fitted up and for a time used for divine service. This building then stood by the canal, near the basin bridge. It was afterward removed and used for dwelling purposes. The building on the point, which had been erected in 1826, and occupied as a dwelling and boarding-house, having been vacated, it was arranged for religious services. It was originally built sixteen by forty-eight feet, with a single roof. Early in 1830 it was enlarged by an addition of exactly the same dimensions as that of the original building. When thus enlarged, and furnished with pulpit and seats, it was known as the Tabernacle, and was used for religious purposes till the summer of 1837. It was in this building, when used for boarding purposes, that the first sermon ever delivered in Honesdale was preached, by Rev. Gideon N. Judd, D.D.

This church obtained its charter June 28, 1830. The contract for the erection of the building that gave place to the present church edifice is dated March 3, 1836. It was built in the summer of 1836 and was dedicated to the service of God July 20, 1837. Its size originally was forty-five by sixty feet. In 1848, the edifice having become too strait for the congregation, it was enlarged. The edifice, in its increased dimensions (forty-five by eighty-two feet), was inclosed in the autumn of this year and, enlarged and beautified, was opened for worship in July of the following year.

The present commodious brick edifice, sixty-five by eighty-six feet, was dedicated June 25, 1868.

The first pastor of the church was Rev. Joel Campbell. He was installed September 16, 1830, and remained pastor till September 27, 1835. During a portion of the interval elapsing between the pastorate of Mr. Campbell and the next regularly installed pastor, Rev. Watters Warren preached as stated supply.

Rev. Joshua Bascome Graves was called to the pastorate November 28, 1837. He was installed January 30, 1838, and remained pastor till September 29, 1842.

Rev. Henry A. Rowland, D.D., was called to the pastorate March 23, 1843. He was installed June 15, 1843.

The pastoral relation between Rev. Dr. Rowland and the church was dissolved December 20, 1855. Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, Jr., was called to the pastorate March 18, 1856; was installed in June, 1856, and remained pastor till June 29, 1859. The pulpit services were conducted by various supplies till 1861, when Rev. Charles Seely Dunning assumed the duties of the pastorate. He was installed June 25, 1861, and remained pastor of the church for nineteen years.

Rev. H. C. Westwood, D.D., was installed in July, 1881, and dismissed by Presbytery in the autumn of 1883. The present pastor, Rev. H. H. Swift, came to the church in April, 1884.

The following individuals have been ruling elders of the church: Isaac P. Foster, Horace Baldwin, Joseph L. Kellogg, Stephen Torrey, Stephen Brush, Solomon Z. Lord, James S. Bassett, Ebenezer Kingsbury, Richard L. Seely, Horace Tracy, William Reed, John P. Darling, Stephen D. Ward, Adonijah Strong, M.D., Miles L. Tracy, Henry M. Seely, Stephen G. Cory, William B. Holmes, Horace C. Hand, John Ball and Andrew Thompson.

The Sabbath-school had its origin in a meeting held in the school-house April 11, 1828. The inhabitants of Honesdale met to consider the propriety of establishing a Sabbath-school. Mr. Isaac P. Foster was appointed chairman of the meeting and Mr. Amzi L. Woodard secretary. It was voted unanimously to organize such a school. The following persons were appointed to draft a constitution: Messrs. Stephen W. Genung, Stephen Torrey and Joseph L. Kellogg. The committee reported a constitution, which was adopted, and the school was organized April 13, 1828. The following individuals have been superintendents: Joseph L. Kellogg, Stephen Torrey, Ebenezer Kingsbury, Horace Baldwin, Willard Davis, Solomon Z. Lord, Benjamin C. Baldwin, Stephen D. Ward, Geo. G. Waller, Henry M. Seely, W. B. Holmes, G. F. Bentley and Andrew Thompson.

In addition to this central school, there were organized and sustained, by the members of this church, other schools in adjoining settlements.

At Prompton (where there is now a Presbyterian Church), Indian Orchard, Berlin, Seelyville (where is now one of the most flourishing schools in the county), White Mills, Long Ridge, Cherry Ridge, the Glass-Factory, northwest of Bethany, and at other destitute places Sabbath-schools were, at different periods, sustained, and in some of these places for a course of years. The mission school of this village was organized May 29, 1859, by Isaiah Snyder, and has done a noble work. This school was but recently disbanded. During the fifty-seven years of its existence this church has had a membership of ten hundred and twenty in number. It has now enrolled three hundred and fifty-seven members. The church has had its periods of internal strife, earnest and trying, of conflicting opinions, aggravated and intense, its periods of deep perplexity and darkness, and yet, on the whole, has an honored history. The earliest church organization in this place, it has been one of the pillars of the truth in this community. In the Bible Home and foreign missionary causes and Sabbath-school agencies it has borne an honorable part, having contributed to home and foreign missions alone during the past ten years nearly fifteen thousand dollars. The church has always liberally responded to all just claims upon her, and has nobly done her part of the work of the church at large. Earnest men and devoted women have never been wanting from the earliest history of the church to the present time. Frequent and powerful revivals have marked its history, giving a new impulse to the spiritual life, and augmenting the number of its membership. It has given three men to the Christian ministry,—Chauncey Burr Goodrich, David Torrey, D.D., and Stephen Torrey, ordained as an evangelist November 9, 1885, on his seventy-seventh birthday.

The property of the First Presbyterian Society, including the church, chapel and parsonage, situated north of the Public Square and extending from Second to Third Streets, is probably worth sixty thousand dollars.

Rev. Henry A. Rowland, D.D.—During the twelve years and a half intervening between May 7, 1843, and December 16, 1855, there did not exist in Honesdale, or elsewhere in Wayne County, a larger or more attractive personality than this gentleman. Of a large frame and uncommonly fine bodily appearance, with lustrous blue eyes which seemed to reflect the depths of the soul behind them, a massive head, and lips overflowing with joyance, he was always and everywhere a notable personage. In him blended two eminent lines of ancestry. His father, Henry Augustus Rowland, a graduate of Dartmouth College, and his grandfather, David S. Rowland, a graduate of Yale College, were successively ministers of the First Congregational Church of Windsor, Conn., where he was born November 19, 1804. By his mother's side he was connected with the celebrated divine and metaphysician, Jonathan Edwards. He was also descended from Rev. John Warham, the first minister of Windsor, Conn., who had been "a famous minister in Exeter, the capital of the county of Devon," in England, and was "one of the principal fathers and pillars of the churches of Connecticut."

Windsor is the oldest town in Connecticut, having been first settled in 1635 from Dorchester, in Massachusetts. As early as 1633 the Plymouth people came up the river and established there a trading-house or factory. Reports of the fertility of the soil in the Connecticut Valley, and of the adaptation of the country to plantation and trade, attracted settlers across the wilderness. In September, 1636, the Rev. John Warham, who had been pastor of the church in Dorchester for six years, removed to Windsor, most of his parishioners having preceded him.

The Rev. Henry A. Rowland, of whom we are here principally concerned, entered Yale College in September, 1819, at the age of fifteen years, and graduated in 1823, the youngest of a class of seventy-two members. January 7, 1821, in his sophomore year, he made a public profession of religion and joined the College Church. In 1824 he entered the Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass. In 1827 he was licensed to preach by the Hampden Congregational Association of Massachusetts. In 1830 he was chosen pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Fayetteville, N. C., and November 24th of that year was ordained by the Presbytery of New York. Early in 1834 he was invited to the pastorate of the Pearl Street Presbyterian Church in the city of New York, and was installed April 17th of that year. January 7, 1843, he resigned this charge and accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church in Honesdale, over which he was installed May 7, 1843. This relation continued until December 16, 1855, when he accepted a call from the Park Street Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J. In 1859 his health became seriously impaired, and he went to Boston, Mass., for relaxation, and there he died on the 4th day of September of that year. He was buried at Newark some days later.

While Dr. Rowland resided in Honesdale, he published a number of books, entitled to wit: "On the Common Maxims of Infidelity," "The Path of Life," "Light in a Dark Alley" and "The Way of Peace." These volumes were received with much acceptance by the religious public, and one of them certainly was adopted by the American Tract Society, and ran through many editions.

His pulpit discourses appealed eminently to the reason, but were not formal or scholastic. In construction they were simple, bold, forcible and impressive. Sometimes, perhaps, the minor graces of style were sacrificed to energy of expression or the supposed aptness of an illustration.

As a newspaper correspondent he was exceptionally successful. If there was a humorous or picturesque aspect to any matter or thing he had under treatment, he was sure to find it and portray it with the finest possible effect. The touch of his satire was delicate and most effectual.

The social qualities had large development in him. He was fond of innocent fun and frolic; nor did these attributes, as he exercised them, militate against the soberer ministrations of the clerical profession. He did not wear a mask in matters pertaining to religion or to any other topic, but was always natural, easy, open and graceful, and, hence, was always acceptable to those with whom he mingled in society.

The love of nature was strong in him, and his favorite pastimes closely associated him with his horse and his fishing-rod and fly. Once in the woods, or along the margin of a trout stream, or on the spacious bosom of a lake, what an exuberance of joy and delight there was in him! The memory of such times, running back through more than forty years, are to the writer hereof among his most charming reminiscences.

Nor was his joy and rejoicing of a selfish type. He certainly wanted happiness for himself, as altogether desirable; but he had a delight superior to all personal gratification, and this consisted in making other people happy, unceasingly at his own pecuniary cost. His beneficences, executed with infinite grace and tenderness, have been recalled to my recollection by needy recipients, with evident emotion, forty years after the benefactions were delivered.

When Dr. Rowland went from Honesdale he left a void as palpable as if half the borough territory had fallen in.

Rev. Henry Dunning was born in Wallkill, Orange County, N. Y., January 31, 1828. At the age of thirteen he was hopefully converted to God, and soon after professsed his faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. He entered Williams College at the age of eighteen, from which he was graduated in 1848. He entered the Union Theological Seminary in 1849, from which he was graduated in 1852. He commenced his ministerial labors as the stated supply of the Presbyterian Church of Binghamton, N. Y., and after a year of this service he accepted a position as instructor in Hebrew at the Union Theological Seminary, which he continued to occupy until the spring of 1857, when he was married to the only daughter of Rev. Henry White, D.D.

In the following April he began preaching in the First Presbyterian Church, Franklin, Delaware County, N. Y., where he continued to labor for three years. He was regularly ordained November 4, 1858. He was called to the church of Honesdale, Pa., in 1861, where he labored as pastor for nineteen years, when his health failed, and he felt obliged to resign his charge. In 1881, his health being improved, he took charge of the Presbyterian Church of Kingston, Pa., as stated supply, and continued to labor successfully in this position for three years, when failing health again compelled him to cease pulpit work. He had just settled in a new home in Metuchen, N. J., when the call came to him to "come up higher." He died June 1, 1885, and his remains, being brought to Honesdale, were interred upon the 3d, in Glen Dyberry Cemetery.

From a paper prepared by a committee of the Lackawanna Presbytery we quote the following concerning this well-known minister:

"Dr. Dunning was a successful pastor. He would have been a success in any work to which he elected to give his powers; but his tastes and his culture fitted him especially for a professor's chair. He was always a wise counselor in ecclesiastical courts. His judgment on any subject to which he had given attention had weight with his brethren of the Presbytery, but he had no love for Presbyterial discussions and only took part in them under pressure. The magnetism of this dear brother who now rests from his labors, that was felt by all that came close to him, was not in his attainments as a scholar and his eloquence as a preacher; rather was it in the breadth and variety of his culture. It was in the simplicity, modesty and unselfishness of his character, and his broad, catholic spirit that embraced the world. While the beloved pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Honesdale, he was recognized by good men in all societies and in every walk of life as a man of God. This was apparent at his funeral, when for the time being all denominational lines were effaced. Jews and Gentiles closed their shops. The Catholic priest of the village sat with the brethren of the Lackawanna Presbytery in the pulpit during the funeral services in the church, and stood with them at the grave where our brother will rest until the resurrection of the great day."

Rev. W. H. Swift was born in Geneva, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1848. About thirty years ago his parents moved to Port Jervis, Orange County, N. Y., and three years later removed to Unionville, in the same county, where Mr. Swift's boyhood days were passed. He entered Amherst College, Amherst, Mass., in the fall of 1866, and was graduated in 1870, and immediately entered Union Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1873. In 1874 he was ordained and installed the first pastor of Memorial Presbyterian Church, at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., where he remained for ten years, when he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Honesdale. His parents were New England people, and his wife, Lizzie J. Watson, whom he married in 1873, was from New York. He is a man of ability and thorough convictions, and expresses himself with all the positiveness and convincing force of one who believes in the soundness of his positions.

Grace Episcopal Church.—The first meeting with reference to the organization of an Episcopal Church in Honesdale was held at the house of Mr. Charles Forbes, February 13, 1832. The first clergyman who officiated was the Rev. James H. Tyng (brother of the late Dr. S. H. Tyng), who severed his connection with the parish January 20, 1834. The parish was admitted into union with the Diocesan Convention May 18, 1833, under the name of "Dyberry" Parish, embracing "Grace Church," Honesdale, and "Truth Church," Bethany. By the authority of the courts of Wayne County, from and after December 13, 1853, this parish is known by the name, style and title of the "Rector, Church Wardens and Vestry of Grace Church, Honesdale," the titles Dyberry Parish and Truth Church, Bethany, being dropped, the latter congregation having become extinct in 1840. The first church building was consecrated October 31, 1834, by the Right Rev. Bishop Onderdonk.

The corner-stone of the present church was laid by the Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, June 23, 1853 (Rev. Richard B. Duane, rector); the new church building was consecrated by Bishop Potter, August 2, 1854. On that occasion morning prayer was read by the Rev. S. F. Riley, rector of the Church of the Nativity, Philadelphia, and Rev. J. L. Maxwell, rector of St. Paul's Church, Trenton, N. J., Rev. Dr. Winslow, of Staten Island, assisting in the lessons. After the consecration the society voluntarily voted an increase in the salary of the pastor, Rev. Richard B. Duane. In the evening a sermon was delivered by Rev. F. S. Wiley, the former rector.

The building was designed by Henry Dudley, of the firm of Hills & Dudley, New York, and the builder was Henry Heath, of Honesdale. The dimensions of the structure are: Outside, fifty by eighty-nine feet; inside, forty-two by eighty-four feet. The Sunday-school and lecture-room, in the basement, are forty-two by thirty-four feet. The windows were furnished by Doremus, of Orange, N. J., and the bell (an "F"), weighing one thousand five hundred pounds, was from the foundry of Jones & Hitchcock, Troy. The stone spire of the church was designed by Mr. Dudley in keeping with the architecture of the edifice, and was built by the family of Zenas H. Russell, in the year 1879, as a memorial. The edifice cost, exclusive of the spire, but including furnishings, about fourteen thousand dollars.

The church building being damaged by fire March 20, 1883, and subsequently repaired and improved, at a cost of about seven thousand five hundred dollars, was reopened November 21, 1883, communion being celebrated and a sermon delivered by Rev. F. D. Hoskins, a former rector, then of Swedesboro', N. J. The Northeastern Convocation of the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania was in session in Honesdale at the time, and a number of clergymen were in attendance, among them being the following:

Rev. Henry L. Jones, Rev. C. H. Kidder, Wilkes-Barre; Rev. J. P. B. Pendleton, Rev. J. P. Cameron, Rev. William Kennedy, Scranton; Rev. E. A. Enos, Towanda; Rev. W. H. Platt, Carbondale; Rev. Mr. Koehler, missionary to deaf mutes; Rev. F. D. Hoskins, Swedesboro', N. J.; Rev. J. W. Paige, Sharon Springs, N. Y.; Rev. William McGlatthery, Norristown; Rev. E. P. Brown, Troy.

The rectory adjoining the church was finished in 1875.

Following is a list of the rectors of the parish:

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The history of the initiatory of "Methodism" in Honesdale is the old story of the ubiquitous "circuit-rider," holding occasional meetings in a "private dwelling," a public hall—any place that could be secured—organizing a class, attaching the same to the "circuit," which class becomes the nucleus of a church of recognized influence.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Such was its history prior to 1834, at which time the corner-stone of the first house of worship erected by the "Methodists" was laid, on a site presented by Jason Torrey. This edifice was unpretentious, but served its purpose well. The community it accommodated was a mere village of a few houses, with its promising future.

The characteristic vigorousness of "Methodism" of that date distinguished it here, and its growth fully kept pace with the development of the thriving borough.

During the year 1845 the "meeting-house" was enlarged one-half its original dimensions. Its history for the succeeding quarter of a century was characteristic of the spirit and record of universal "Methodism" of the same period—vigorous, fruitful, advancing.

It now became apparent that the necessity was upon the society to change the site to a location better accommodating the community, now grown to a borough of some thousands of people, and also erect a house more commodious and in keeping with private tastes and public improvements.

Consequently a large lot, corner of Second and Eleventh Streets, on which was a commodious dwelling, was purchased, and, in the spring of 1872, work preparatory to building thereon was begun.

July 4, 1872, the corner-stone of the present beautiful edifice was laid, with appropriate service, Rev. J. M. Reed, D.D., one of the missionary secretaries of New York, delivering the address.

The building is a fine brick structure, trimmed with stone, and in its exterior attractive, an ornament to the town which is distinguished for its pleasant physical features and artificial adornments. Its interior is most commodious for all manner of church-work. The first floor is partitioned into class-rooms, pastor's study, ladies' parlor, primary Sunday-school classroom, general chapel (which makes a dining-room of unsurpassed convenience and pleasantness) and kitchen, furnished with stoves and table crockery. The second floor is an inviting auditorium, of seating capacity for six hundred comfortably, and, with added seats, many more.

A large and pleasant parsonage, supplied with water and gas, stands on the same lot.

The history of the society for the ten years immediately following the conclusion to build is the record of a most crushing financial struggle, caused mainly by the universal depression of the finances of the country during these years. The church is valued at some fifty thousand dollars and the parsonage at some four thousand dollars, with a prospect that at no very remote date the entire indebtedness will be canceled.

The enterprise was inaugurated during the pastorate of Rev. J. O. Woodruff, and completed during the pastorate of Rev. H. M. Crydenwise. Its present membership numbers three hundred and fifty; its Sunday-school nearly four hundred.

The records of the beginnings of "Methodism" in Honesdale contain the names of such men as Father Genung, Mary Stewart, Derial Gibbs, John Griffin, Thomas Pope, William Parmenter, Thomas Hawkey, David Tarbox, Henry Heath, Thomas Kellow, Richard Spry, O. Hamlin, James Birdsall, Sr., Richard Dony, R. Webb, R. Henwood and others, to whom the succeeding generations owe a debt of gratitude.

The long list of praiseworthy pastors reads very nearly in the order as follows: Agard, Conover, Rowe, Mumford, Blackwell, White, Reddy, Owens, Barker, Cook, Mitchell, Harvey, Wyatt, Gidings, Olmsted, Tryon, Mead, Paddock, Cole, W. J. Judd, Woodruff, Crydenwise, Van Cleft, Harroun, Richardson and the present incumbent, W. L. Thorpe.

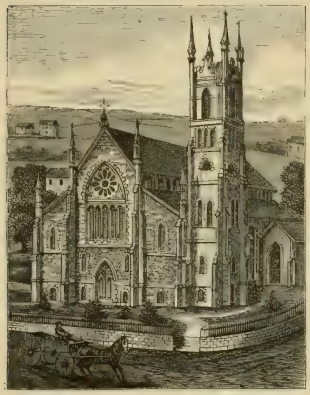
The present board of trustees are John Bone, John Blake, D. L. Kennedy, B. F. Haines, J. C. Birdsall, Thomas Crossley, P. S. Barnes, E. H. Clark, W. P. Schenck. Present Sunday-school superintendent, J. R. Brown.

The Roman Catholic Church.—The first traces of the Catholic Church in Wayne County are found in the forests of the northern townships. Some half-dozen of the early pioneers in Mount Pleasant were Catholics and the secular department of our history records the names of these enterprising farmers and their earlier followers.

The Delaware and Hudson Canal brought a few Irish families to Honesdale in 1826, but up to the enlargement of the canal their number was inconsiderable. These were dependent on the zeal of priests residing at such remote places as Troy, Utica and Buffalo for the ministrations of religion. On horseback, their chapel packed into capacious saddle-bags, these devoted men started out from their homes in search of the scattered children of their church. Along bridle-roads through unknown forests, lodging in the primitive log cabin or railroad shanty, sharing the coarse food and rough beds of the sons of toil they came to console the Irish exiles and preserve the faith of their children.

The writer of this sketch long enjoyed the friendship of two of these devoted fathers. One of them, Father Shanahan died a dozen years ago at St. Peter's Church, in New York City, where his name will long be in benediction. He was a man of profound and varied learning, who, despite his missionary work, found leisure to utilize a large and valuable library, which he bequeathed to his namesake, the Bishop of Harrisburg.

His home was at Troy, on the Hudson, whence he made long and tiresome excursions, as early as 1830, through Otsego to Cooperstown, down the valley of the Susquehanna, along Sullivan County among the scattered Catholics in the adjoining State of Pennsylvania, through Orange County and along the west shore of the Hudson back to Troy. The registry of the baptisms and marriages he performed is preserved at St. Peter's Church, in Troy, erected by him, and which was long the only church there.



The other early missionary referred to was Father Walter Quarters, who subsequently erected the first church in Jersey City, and afterwards the first cathedral at Chicago, of which his brother William was first bishop. He subsequently, on his brother's death, in 1848, returned to the diocese of New York, where he erected the first church at Yorkville, where he died full of years and the garnered fruits of a zealous life.

His first field of labor was at Utica, then an obscure village in the interior of New York, from which he penetrated Northern and Western New York and along the southern tier of counties, searching out also the Catholic settlers in the adjoining State. St. John's Church at Utica, built by him, preserves the record of his functions in this county.

Subsequently Buffalo became a centre of missionary labor and the priest from there visited this county about 1835, and the record of his ministry is to be sought at the Church of St. Louis.

The rapid growth of the church at these great centres in New York compelled the pastors to remain at home, so that between 1835 and 1840 the county was indebted to missionary zeal from Philadelphia, Easton and Friendsville, in Susquehanna County, at which places must be sought the record of the baptisms and marriages performed by the visiting missionaries.

ST. JOHN'S ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

In 1842 the mining interests of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company had attracted quite a number of industrious Catholics to Carbondale, and the tanneries in Wayne County had become each a centre of profitable industry, and aggregated a considerable number of Catholics. These induced the bishop of Philadelphia to send them a resident pastor, with Carbondale for a centre, and assigning one Sunday in the month to Honesdale and the other Catholic settlements in Wayne County.

Rev. Henry Fitzsimmons of Carbondale was the first pastor of the Catholics of Wayne County, and on his appointment, in 1842, he erected the first church at Honesdale, which was subsequently extended on both ends to meet the wants of the growing Catholic population.

Three years later (1845) Honesdale was erected into a separate parish, and Rev. P. Prendergast was appointed its first pastor. Up to this time the marriage register was kept at Carbondale, whilst the baptisms were recorded at Honesdale, but after the advent of the resident pastor both were kept at Honesdale. Father Prendergast, for reasons we shall specify further on, stayed less than two years, and was succeeded by Rev. James Malony in the memorable year of 1847, the famine year, when that immense influx of able-bodied men and women sought every field of remunerative labor, and the industries of Wayne County attracted their own share of it. The Erie Railroad, where work had been suspended, recovered from its torpor; the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company enlarged their water highway threefold; the Pennsylvania Coal Company was projected, with Hawley for the centre of its enterprise; the tanneries were greatly extended, and agriculture promoted, and as a consequence the labors of Father Malony were made correspondingly oppressive. He enlarged the church at Honesdale and erected the steeple. It was he who built the present church at Hawley in 1850, and in addition to his pastoral labors at Honesdale, and from Deposit to Port Jervis along the line of the two States, he responded promptly to the calls of the sick and the dying. Some idea may be formed of his labors from the register of St. John's Church, which records two hundred and ninety-three baptisms for the year 1851. Early the next year his exhausted frame yielded to an attack of malignant typhoid, and in April, 1852, he was called to receive the rewards of a short but faithful ministry.

On the death of Father Malony, Dr. O'Hara, now bishop of Scranton, was put in charge of Honesdale, and was assisted by Father Kenny; and German Catholics beginning to settle here, Father Etthoffer made them an occasional visit, as did Father Sharle, from Pottsville.

Towards the fall of 1852 Rev. James Power was put in charge, and soon after Rev. Father Whitty was sent to assist him, especially in caring for Hawley and the Rock Lake districts, which by this time had grown into permanent importance.

The next year Father Whitty was put in charge of Scranton, just emerging into notice, whilst Father Daniel Kelly replaced him as assistant priest at St. John's, Honesdale. In the summer of 1854 Rock Lake and the tanning villages in the northern part of the county were set aside from Honesdale, and Father Shields was placed in the new charge. He stayed but a few months, when it reverted to Honesdale until the appointment of Rev. Father Delanave to that mission. He being an Italian and unable to speak the English language intelligibly, of course, accomplished nothing, and was relieved of the charge by Bishop Wood on the occasion of his first visitation, in the summer of 1864, when Rev. Thomas Brehony was sent to replace him. Delanave persisted in hanging around the settlements for a a long time, to the no small embarrassment of the new incumbent. But Father Brehony was possessed of more than an ordinary amount of patience, and despite the obstacles he encountered, he set to work to improve and advance the spiritual and material interests of his first charge, for hitherto he had been only assistant priest. How he succeeded the two commodious and tasty churches of the district attest. These he relinquished in the fall of 1870, and transferred, free of debt and well furnished, to his successor, the present incumbent, Rev. John Judge, of Rock Lake, on his assignment to a new charge in Susquehanna County. Hawley continued in charge of St. John's, Honesdale, over a year after the separation of Rock Lake. But the enlargement of the Delaware and Hudson Canal and the increased shipments of coal by the Pennsylvania Coal Company had proportionately increased the number of laborers, so that in the summer of 1855 it was found necessary to release Honesdale of its care, and make it the centre of a new district, having all Pike County and Paupack, in Wayne, for its limits.

Rev. Michael Filon was transferred from Lancaster County and placed in charge of the new parish. He was untiring in his efforts to elevate the morale of his populous charge, and was more than ordinarily successful.

On the opening of the Honesdale Branch of the Erie Railroad he erected the little church at Lackawaxen, which then gave promise of an importance it has not realized.

In the summer of 1864 he was transferred to Philadelphia, and Hawley reverted to the care of Honesdale until a Father McCollum was sent there. He was dismissed in 1869, when Hawley again became dependent on Honesdale until the appointment, in the fall of 1870, of the present incumbent, Rev. J. P. O'Mally, who has already erected neat frame churches at Ledgedale, Milford and "White Mills," where the Dorflinger Glass Works founded a flourishing village in 1863, which has grown and continues to grow in population and prosperity, affording a hope that it will ere long become the centre of religious activities. Honesdale remained in charge of Rev. James Powers until 1855, and he was succeeded in the four following uneventful years by Rev. J. Ahern, removed early in 1857, when Rev. P. J. O'Brien was appointed pastor. He remained until April, 1859, when he was transferred to Wilmington, Delaware, and the present incumbent, Rev. J. J. Doherty, was transferred from Towanda Parish to St. John's, Honesdale.

Up to this the successive incumbents at Honesdale stayed too short a time to effect any appreciable elevation of the religious tone of the laboring people, who, after having completed the construction of the canal, settled down there to operate it. Canal towns are proverbially centres of dissipation. There bad whiskey circulates, and officers of the law are intimidated by the political power of its vendors from any effort towards its restraint. Homeless men and vagrants resort to canal towns for congenial companionship and idle occupation. Dancing-houses, too, abound there, and the lively tunes of burst bag pipes enhance the attraction of the "bar," and the saloon-keepers grow defiant of decency, ready to resent all secular or religious interference. The works at Honesdale were, besides, unfavorable to the active restraints of religion.

One after another, the pastors appointed to Honesdale found it a very pleasant parish—to leave, and they were but too glad to enjoy that pleasure just as soon as they could do so without exposing themselves to the imputation of cowardice or indecent haste.

The Catholic Church, as we observed elsewhere, was a stranger in the land, and it had been preceded by a very bad reputation; and the new-comers were naturally regarded as exponents and representatives of its creed and culture. And here were men born and reared in the church utterly defiant of the decencies of civil and social life and the restraints of law, desecrating the Sunday in debauch, drunkenness and public riot; their haunts echoing yells and profanities; their leaders growing rich, some on their recklessness and intemperance, whilst others drove a profitable "brokerage" in their votes, and others again openly impeached the pastors or sent around the whisper that priests were not above paltry embezzlement, and whilst souls might be safely enough entrusted to their charge, they ought not be implicitly trusted with "higher goods."

No one can be surprised that a church so ignobly represented was without honor in the community, that the traditional hostility to its creed and its clergy was intensified one hundred fold, and that Honesdale became prominent amongst the other communities of Eastern Pennsylvania for its antipathy to the Catholic Church.

Other towns viewed it with jealousy or fear; at Honesdale it was below contempt. Its place of worship was relegated to Texas, its people to Shanty Hill, where its pastors were ignobly lodged in a cabin, and came and went away unhonored and unknown to the rest of the community.

It must not be inferred from this that there were no true representatives of the church at Honesdale, for there were hundreds. The great bulk of the settlers were orderly, but some one has remarked that "a hornet will agitate a whole camp-meeting;" so a few turbulent, riotous men will bring reproach on an entire community of upright, virtuous people.

It is not necessary to go back eons of ages to discover the troglodyte man; he is cotemporary with all the ages and numerous as ever to-day.

Wherever vegetation exists, there weeds will spring up spontaneously, and all they ask is to be let alone; so, in all communities of men vices will pullulate, and all they ask is "to be let alone." The rapid changes of pastors at Honesdale gave the vicious element all the immunity from repression it required, until it became openly defiant when first subjected to restraint, and howled like famished wolves around the pastor who first effectually resisted the spoliation of the fold.

In 1859 the present incumbent, John J. Doherty was transferred from Towanda to Honesdale, and it became apparent at once that he came to stay.

He purchased his own residence in the centre of the town; he supplied his own horses, carriages and the other comforts and conveniences of the affluent without any appeal to his people and it was evident their penury would not repel, nor the slander and contumely of their leaders intimidate him.

We dare not indulge in eulogy, and we trust it may be long before an "obituary" may record the trials and triumphs of the last quarter of a century of Father Doherty's pastorship at Honesdale; but we may, without impertinence, recall an interview with him shortly after his settlement here.

It had reference to a flagrant social grievance that we—there were three of us, all living yet—thought we could readily redress.

His reply was substantially this,—"Gentlemen, I am a young man, but I have been taught by sad experience the futility of attempting to force social or moral reforms on any people. There are few men wholly free from illusions, and their cure is not to be effected by abusing them, but by disabusing them. This will take time and much patience."

This gives a clue to his methods, and explains his wonderful success in suppressing vice, and gradually ridding the community, to a great extent, of the human vermin that infested industrious communities, as pickpockets do crowds to despoil the incautious or confiding.

We never heard him indulge in rant or invective, much less did he ever, under any provocation, descend to vituperation. He unmasked vice whilst ignoring its presence, and thus cured its victims without subjecting them to the pain of moral cautery.

He persuaded men of the profitableness of right living and compared self-indulgence to "scratching the itch." The man who would enjoy this life, to say nothing of the future, must accustom himself to the discipline of self-restraint. He often urged men in the enjoyment of God's gifts to exhibit gratitude to the Giver, by at least forbearing to abuse them to His dishonor. After years of such practical preaching, emphasized by example, it would be strange if men failed to be disabused of low views of life and the delusions of pleasure, and if in time they were not led to prefer "the straight lines of duty to the curved lines of beauty."

We close this hasty epitome of the Catholic Church in Wayne County with a brief summary of the result of Father Doherty's labors in the last quarter of a century, leaving details of remote results to future historians. The church, as a church, has emerged from obscurity into recognized pre-eminence as a restraining and elevating moral power. The people are sober, frugal, industrious, self-disciplined, respectable and respected; the youth are educated and contribute a respectable quota to professional careers, law, medicine and divinity. The Catholic Church is architecturally unsurpassed in this end of the State, and its massive stone walls and rich stained-glass windows attest the munificence of the pastor who designed and carried on the work during three years at his own expense, before appealing for a dollar to the people. The interior decorations correspond with the magnitude and solidity of the exterior, and the choir, composed of amateur members, frequently attracts all the lovers of music to its rendering of the most elaborate compositions of the great masters.

The Catholic population attending St. John's Church, at Honesdale, has varied but slightly in a quarter of a century, and may be set down in round numbers at two thousand.

The neighboring settlements dependent on Honesdale for religious service have greatly decreased, and some have entirely disappeared in that time. Twenty-five years ago the tanneries at Cherry Ridge, at Smith Hill and Aldenville had, in the aggregate, over one hundred families, but all are long since abandoned, from the exhaustion of the hemlock bark within accessible distances; and the one yet operated, at the falls of Dyberry, will have exhausted its bark within a year, and will then also be abandoned, whilst the number of Catholics settled on farms is gradually diminishing. Twenty-five years ago they numbered about seventy families within a radius of eight miles from Honesdale; to-day they do not exceed fifty-six families, and several of these very poor. It is also evident that the sons and daughters of the more opulent farmers do not take kindly to agriculture, but as they grow up they seek more congenial and remunerative occupations in towns.

At Honesdale itself the Catholic population is about stationary; for though the Irish are no less prolific there than elsewhere, their children, as they grow up, are forced to migrate in search of a career, and very few content themselves with the precarious pursuits of their parents. But we are not called upon to prophesy, so we leave the future of the church in Wayne County to future historians.

JOHN JULIUS DOHERTY, the subject of this sketch, was born at "Dungrood Castle," a small freehold property his father, Julius Doherty, had inherited in Vale Sharlow, in the County Tipperary, Ireland, on November 20, 1820.

His father's youth was mainly spent with his mother's family in England, whither she removed on her husband's death, and where he acquired a taste for scientific agriculture and landscape gardening, rare at that day. On his return to Ireland he followed that occupation for a living, his patrimony being too small to maintain him and his family, which rapidly increased in numbers. His career involved occasional removal, and a residence more or less protracted, according to the magnitude of the improvements he was engaged to oversee.

He was always accompanied by his family, who were thus brought into familiar relations with families of the landed gentry by whom he was employed, and who made it as pleasant as they could for the stranger during his stay. This imparted a cosmopolitan character to the subject of our sketch very uncommon with his countrymen. Wherever his father resided he punctually attended the best classical and mathematical schools, and his father declined engagements wherever such schools were not accessible, be familiarly called, to distinguish him from other Johns, profited by his opportunities, and how readily he entered into the self-reliant spirit of our country, is evinced by the fact that in the winter of 1836, whilst a lad, racy of the soil, he engaged with Mr. Adams, chairman of the district, to teach the public school at Adamsville, now a station on the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad, ten miles from Albany, before he had quite reached his sixteenth year.

and he preferred engagements on estates in Kerry to much more lucrative ones elsewhere, because of superior opportunities for higher education. Hence he remembers schools and schoolmates in the city of Limerick, soon after at Lestowell, then at Tralee, then after three years' absence at Lestowell again, and then after two years back again to Limerick before coming to America in the summer of 1836.

How abundantly John Julius, as he used to The following year, 1837, he was offered better pay, and took charge of the somewhat aristocratic school at Coeyman's, making his home at the opulent mansion of Colonel Abraham Verplanck, whose family occupy high social position in the State.

In that year he was entered as a law student at Albany, and the next year (1838) he took the more convenient school at Watervliet, making his home at Colonel Lansing's hospitable mansion.

At the close of that year he had his name transferred from Albany to the New York bar, on being engaged at Elmwood Hill Academy, in the neighborhood of the city, to teach the Greek language and book-keeping.

This was a somewhat famous school at that day, especially for Southern students. The principal, Professor Russell, was an intimate friend of Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Stewart, who almost invariably visited there Sunday evenings.

The next June, at the opening of the vacation, he was seized with typhus fever, through which he was watched with a father's care by Dr. William O'Donnell, subsequently coroner of the city, whose son, John O'Donnell, has achieved prominence in the State. On his recovery he communicated to Bishop Hughes, just invested with the administration of the diocese, his desire to embrace the ecclesiastical state, and was immediately sent by him to Mount St. Mary's College, Maryland.

But partially restored to health, it taxed all his remaining strength to reach the college at the opening of studies, where he arrived on August 14, 1839. The bracing mountain air, pure water and varied recreations restored him to health, but he never recovered to the one hundred and sixty-four pounds scale he turned before the attack of typhus fever.

At that institution he was classed or associated with several young men who have since made their mark in secular and ecclesiastical careers. Amongst the latter we may name Bishop McFarland, of Hartford; Bishop Loughlin, of Brooklyn; Archbishop Elder, of Cincinnati; Bishop Cowray, of Albany; and a host of others equally eminent in the American Church. College life is uneventful except for the students, so the subject of our sketch passed his days and years in the studies appertaining to his chosen career, whilst at the same time teaching Greek, Latin, history or mathematics, as the faculty of the college assigned him, thereby incurring no obligation to any particular diocese, and retaining the right to select his field of future labor.

In 1843 the late Cardinal McCloskey was relieved of the presidency of St. John's College, at Fordham, and another old student of the Mountain was appointed to preside, and at his request Bishop Hughes called upon the old college for a contingent to sustain the new faculty, and amongst them the subject of this sketch.

The mortality amongst his cotemporaries at St. John's College has been very great, for he remembers but three who survive, and these are Father Harrigan, of Binghamton; Rev. George McClosky, of Louisville; and Monsignor Quinn, of New York.

In 1844 the bishop of Cincinnati called him to orders, and in April he was ordained "deacon," and the next month priest, and attached to the Cathedral, then the only English-speaking Catholic Church in the city. Besides himself there were only two other priests, Rev. Fathers Collins and Purcell, to serve it, and these had not seldom to ride sixty miles into the country on horseback, to attend the dying members of the church.

The restraints of city life soon began to tell unfavorably on his health, and through the medium of his friend, Father Edward, to whom the bishop would refuse nothing, he procured a change to the country. This was faciliated with the bishop in view of the return of Father Wood, subsequently archbishop of Philadelphia, who had recently been ordained priest at Rome.

Father Doherty was released from city work, which was always uncongenial, and Massillon, in the northern part of the State, was named as his field of labor.

It was a desolate field—no church, no house, no money, nothing but a portable chapel and a pair of saddle-bags, but no horse nor saddle—yet by August 15th, four months after his arrival, he had erected a solid stone church, with a parsonage under the same roof, which Bishop Purcell dedicated on that festival, and the same day transferred Father Doherty to Canton, made vacant by the return of the incumbent to Europe.

Within five miles was a French colony, in charge of Father De Goesbriand, now bishop of Burlington, Vt., where were many English-speaking people; many, too, were scattered in the Western Reserve; indeed his field extended twenty-five miles in a radius from Canton, and southward over fifty miles. It comprises to-day ten parishes and as many pastors.

There was a strong mutual attachment between the people of Canton and their young pastor, which was growing year after year as he made their church respected by his personal and intellectual eminence. In 1848, however, on the division of the diocese of Cincinnati, he found himself remanded to the new diocese of Cleveland, and, in common with others of the English-speaking clergy of the diocese, he sought and obtained a canonical exeat.

He has often since questioned the inadequacy of the cause that impelled that course, since it unmoored him, and for awhile set him adrift amid unforeseen perils. But youth and inexperience are usually self-reliant, and priests, as other men, must pay the price for wisdom. A public meeting convened at the court-house, Congressman Starkweather, chairman, and Judge Lynch, secretary—conveyed to him complimentary resolutions and expressions of regret. Under obligations to no diocese, he could lawfully choose his field of labor, Bishop Fitzpatrick had just bought a Unitarian Church in Purchase Street, Boston, and at once tendered the rectorship of it to Father Doherty, through a mutual friend, before he had yet fully withdrawn from Canton.

It was accepted and on its dedication to St. Vincent he assumed the charge, in which he was assisted gratuitously by Father Shaw, recently converted at Rome and ordained by Bishop Fitzpatrick.

He resided at the bishop's house, and of his cotemporaries there survives to-day one—the present Archbishop Williams. The others were Hardy, Manahan and O'Brien. A. Bronson was always a Friday guest at the bishop's hospitable board, where all were amused and instructed by the logical sparring of the learned bishop and his illustrious convert. Whilst the novelty lasted the new life was not irksome, but soon the old repugnance to the city returned upon him, and he began to long for the green fields and the soft roads and shady lanes of the country. The sights and scenes in cellar and garret filled him with disgust and chafed upon his temper.

He availed himself of every opportunity to leave the city, and made missionary excursions as far as New Hampshire.

He it was who bought the commodious site of the Augustinian Church, at Lawrence, whither, on learning his discontent with city life, the bishop wished to transfer him.

Indeed, the Catholic Almanac of 1849 locates him at Lawrence.

And there he would have located, but that the aged missionary, Father French, brother to Bishop French, was the incumbent there; and, although feeble, he felt himself competent to discharge its duties, and Father Doherty declined to intrude on the venerable father or trespass on what he regarded his rights.

So, although the Catholic Almanac so reported in 1849, he never accepted the appointment. The next year, appreciating his preference for country life, the bishop reluctantly acquiesced in his wish for a change from the city, and Father George Reardon was transferred to Cambridge from Worcester, whence he attended Saxonville, Framingham, Springfield, Palmer and Ware, and Father Doherty was sent to succeed him.

In one sense the change was gratifying. The country was pleasant and the educated people whom he met during his short stay social and liberal. The location was central, and he had often for guests the genial Bishop Fitzpatrick and his successor, the present archbishop of Boston (then Father Williams, whose friendship he continues to enjoy), Dr. Manahan, the ponderous O. A. Brownson. Bishop Hughes made his house a stage on the way to Montreal, and Thomas Darcy Magee came there to reconcile a slight misunderstanding; and Dr. Early, the president of the Worcester College, and subsequently of Georgetown, frequently assisted him on Sunday.

But he encountered a formidable foe and his special aversion, the whiskey interest, which, as he is accustomed to say, "fattens on famine and the moral carrion it generates."

He was full of fight and inexperience, and, by what he himself to-day doubtless would regard intemperate invective, provoked a desperate resistance, which soon defiantly turned upon him to overwhelm him with obloquy.

It would greatly exceed the limits of this sketch to detail this brief episode in Father Doherty's career. During the whole of the year 1851 he was harassed with prosecutions, which were peculiarly annoying by the mode of procedure, which was by "primary attachment;" and, besides, every attorney of the court was ex-officio a magistrate, which afforded all the opportunity mercenary or malignant people could require to drag their victims into court. Mr. George Roberts, of the Boston Daily Times, in the leading editorial of Wednesday morning, June 25th of that year, thus records their complete defeat,—"We must honestly confess that we see in the allegations against Rev. Mr. Doherty nothing which he has not triumphantly refuted."

It was then they transferred their assaults to the newspapers. He declined that interminable extra-judicial tribunal of ribaldry and rant, and, consulting his own and others' peace indispensable to religion, he acquiesced in his friends' advice and transferred his services to Philadelphia, where his old friend, Father Newman, of Pittsburgh, had just been consecrated bishop.

He was immediately appointed to Chambersburg Parish, vacated by the transfer of Dr. Leitner to Columbia, and entered upon his duties June 24, 1852. It then embraced Carlisle, Waynesboro' and Concord, but not one vendor of liquor within its limits. He found the people and the climate of Chambersburg congenial.

Here he speedily recovered the elasticity of spirit, somewhat impaired by his brief, but severe, struggle, and soon forgot assaults and assailants in the tranquil pursuit of his ministry. His literary taste found field for cultivation.

He became an active member of the Young Men's Literary Society, which then embraced such men as Judge Nill, Alexander McClure, William B. McClelland, G. Sharp, G. Brewer and several others who have since made their impress on political and literary life in the State. Whilst there he built the neat brick church at Concord, and had it dedicated to our "Lady of Refuge," by Bishop Newman (who was attended by Doctor Hayden, of Bedford, and Father Myers, of Baltimore), on the 15th of August, 1853. Ten years after leaving Chambersburg, Father Doherty revisited it as the guest of Colonel Hoskinson, and received an ovation from all its ministers, and literary people crowded the church to hear and see him, and called upon him at the house of his host. In June, 1855, the parish of Towanda becoming vacant, the bishop tendered it to Father Doherty, and, although growing yearly more attached to the place and people, he accepted it, and immediately entered upon his duties there. He found Towanda a vast parish; and it is today, although dismembered, and two others formed from it.

Yet, during four years he toiled there unremittingly, not seldom riding fifty miles a day on horseback, and never did he take a day's vacation. Neither did he ever utter a word of complaint to his friend. On the contrary, in 1859, when a vacancy occurred at Honesdale, Bishop Newman thus writes to Father Doherty from Reading:

"Altho' when I visited you lately, you expressed a willingness to remain at Towanda, yet I deem it proper to offer you Honesdale. It is the best at present in my gift, and much easier than your present parish. If you accept, please inform me promptly, for I am anxious to fill it."

The intimation of his friend's wish was enough, and Father Doherty, although endeared to the place and people by many ties, proceeded to settle up his affairs, and within two weeks, in July, 1859, assumed the pastorship of Honesdale and its missions.

Hitherto his stay was too brief to make any perceptible impression on the community. His youth and secluded habits, if nothing else, kept him an unknown factor; on his arrival at Honesdale, in his thirty-eighth year, he retained the boyish look of twenty years. Here he settled down to his life-work about the age that most men develop into usefulness and success.

By that time they get chastened by disappointments and mature into a noble manhood, if the material be there. He found vices and vicious practices entrenched in the habits of people, but he had learned the folly of firing the corn-crib to exterminate the rats, so he set himself to stay the sin and spare the sinner, with what success may be seen in the history of the Catholic Church, to which we refer our readers.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.—Prior to 1842 a number of persons in Honesdale had become converts to the Baptist faith, but they had for the most part joined the Bethany Church, and none had been organized in Honesdale. In the spring of 1842 Elders Lewis Raymond, H. Curtis and D. F. Leach made an effort to bring into existence a local church, and for that purpose a council was convened at the call of the Bethany Church, which duly assembled at Bethany on April 10th, delegates being present from Damascus, Clinton, Mount Pleasant, Cooperstown, N. Y., and Ten-Mile River. The church was organized by this council, with the following constituent members, viz.: Franklin Davall, Harry Wheeler and wife, Charlotte Wheeler, Harlan D. Fuller and wife, Sarah B. Fuller, John Garrett, Jr., and wife, Patience Garrett, John Chope, Hezekiah Mattesson, John Shopland, Albert H. Russell, John Gray, Richard L. Ward, Runnells Cole, Asa Crandall, D. P. Bunnell, Susan Stryker, Laura Robinson, Parthenia Bunnell, Sarah Murray, Elizabeth Jackett, Clarissa McMullen, Eliza A. Cole, Eleanor Cole, Harriet Bunnell, Almira Burnett, all from the church at Bethany; Parks Baird and his wife, Sarah Ann Baird, from the church at Damascus; and Phœbe Davall, from the church at Mount Pleasant. Sarah Harris was admitted by letter on April 14th, and was the first person so received.

It was not until the next year (1843) that the society secured a settled pastor, the Rev. D. L. McGear. The first trustees elected were D. Bunnell, R. L. Ward, E. Mapes, F. Davall and H. Wheeler. The first clerk was H. A. Mattesson, and the treasurer Franklin Davall.

For the first three years the society worshipped in the old Tabernacle and in other places, but as early as June 17, 1843, it was decided to procure a lot on which to build a church. On December 29th following the trustees were authorized to purchase the lot opposite Stephen Cory's shop, on Second Street. The church, still in use, was finished in July, 1845, and dedicated upon the 30th of the month. About the same time a Sunday-school was organized.

Following is the succession of pastors who have served this church:

1843	D. L. McGear.
1843	D. D. Gray.
1846	G. S. Bailey.
1846	A. G. Smith.
1847	T. O. Judd.
1850	C. C. Williams.
1853	Zelotes Grenell.
1856	Joseph N. Folwell.
1858	L. O. Grenell.
1866	Samuel H. Mead.
1867	H. B. Gamer.
1871	Walter Gallant.
1875	James A. Mets.
1882	A. H. Bliss.

The deacons, in the order of their succession, have been as follows:

1843	S. L. Deming.
1843	J. A. Patmor.
1845	H. A. Mattesson.
1845–55	F. Davall.
1855–69	Eliphalet Wood.
1860	Joseph A. Hubbard.
	V. Grenell.
1863–65	Peter J. Cole.
1865–67	H. W. Kalisch.
1882	Peter J. Cole.
	William H. Haskin.
	Francis West.

The present trustees are B. L. Wood, P. J. Cole, William A. Gaylord, William H. Haskin and B. F. Fraley.

ST. JOHN GERMAN LUTHERAN CHURCH.—The congregation was organized in 1845 and immediately proceeded to erect a small house of worship, which was superseded in 1849 by the larger edifice still in use. The church is in a flourishing condition and has a membership of two hundred and twenty-five. Connected with the society is a parochial school, which is attended by about seventy pupils. The school building is in the rear of the church. The society also owns a parsonage on Second Street, and a lot fifty by one hundred and fifty feet.

The first pastor of this church was the Rev.

C. Sans, who served from 1845 to 1847. Since the expiration of his pastorate the succession of ministers has been as follows :

G. Zeumer	1847–49
J. Goetz	1849–59
F. A. Bauer	1859–66
J. Helfer	1866–68
F. F. Wilken	1868–72
O. Telle	1872–78
F. A. Herzberger	1878–80
G. F. Woerner	1880–84
Th. Heischmann	1884–85
Robert Conrad	1885–

The German Catholic Congregation, of Honesdale, was organized about 1853, when Father Caspar Müller became its pastor. From 1858 to 1863 the Rev. P. C. Nagel, of Wilkes-Barre, attended to its spiritual wants. Under his supervision the church was built at the present site, corner Fifth and Second Streets, and dedicated in 1860, after the old edifice on Seventh Street had been destroyed by fire. He also bought about two acres of land for a cemetery, from Mr. Schoonover.

Rev. Francis Buthe was assigned to the rectorship in the spring of 1863, and remained at the head of the congregation until the time of his death, in 1878, when he was succeeded by the present pastor, Rev. William Dassel.

Rev. F. Buthe introduced the Sisters of Christian Charity to teach the children of the parochial school. A handsome school building was erected through his exertions, the upper floor of which was occupied by the Sisters as a dwelling.

Since then the congregation has acquired the property adjoining as a residence for the teachers. There has been also an addition of thirty feet made to the church, which has been frescoed and otherwise beautified at a considerable outlay.

The Hebrew Congregation.— In the spring of 1849, William Weiss, the first pioneer Jew, publicly known as such, settled in Honesdale, where he still resides.

Two months later a family, Waller by name, bought property in the upper part of the town, where they lived until some years ago, when they followed their children to California and there the aged couple died.

That same summer Michael and Lewis Milhauser, John Goldsmith, Julius Bach and J. Tanhauser, Jacob Libsez and J. Wiseman immigrated.

In September of that year they associated themselves into a congregation numbering nine men, and held their first public prayer-meeting at the home of Mr. Waller, who furnished the room for the purpose. The following year came Samuel Frankel, who was ever a leading member of the congregation "House of Israel," until his death, in 1881. With Mr. Frankel and family came his three brothers-in-law, familiarly known to this day as the three old bachelors, the Samuel Brothers.

Shortly after Abe Bernstein came ; also three cousins, Levy by name, having settled here, two daughters of Jacob Levy married two brothers by the name of Freeman, who, with their families, still reside here, the old folks having passed away. That year the congregation bought a plot of ground for a burial-place, near what now constitutes Glen Dyberry Cemetery, the first burial being that of a child of S. Levy. Since then many of the old settlers rest there in family lots, 'neath the shade of trees planted by the hand of pioneer Weiss, and under modest tomb-stones with Hebrew and English inscriptions.

Soon after the congregation rented and furnished a large room for a synagogue, and engaged Rev. Mr. Kuttner as the minister and parochial teacher.

With the minister came the desire for building a house of worship. Although the Jewish families were few and in moderate circumstances, some very poor, each one pledged himself to furnish not less than fifty dollars apiece either of his own means or to raise the sum by subscription. The Rev. Mr. Kuttner's earnest efforts were crowned with success.

The Delaware and Hudson Company, through the intercession of the late R. F. Lord, liberally donated a building lot for the purpose. Mr. Lord not only subscribed from his private means for the building, but when shown the plan for the church without a tower, a church-bell not being customary, and the congregation unable to furnish further funds, Mr. Lord prevailed on the committee and offered a ten-dollar bill additionally in the name of his good wife, if they add the tower, which they eventually did. The citizens of the different Christian denominations aided liberally, and the few Jews soon built and consecrated the little church to the worship of God and the instruction of their children. Since that time the Revs. Kuttner, Heilbronn, Bergman, Gabriel, Landau, Fass (who died here), Kaiser and Bloch have successively officiated as rabbi of the limited number of Jewish families who have come and gone during these years, and at present the congregation, consisting of less than a score of families, is under the guidance of the Rev. J. Kahn. Of the earlier settlers, William Weiss, Samuel Brothers, Lewis Milhauser, the Freeman Brothers and the Katz Brothers are still resident. The congregation above mentioned is the German-Jewish congregation generally known as the "Beth-Israel."

During the past few years a number of Polish and Russian Jews have settled in Texas township, across the river from Honesdale. Although in reduced circumstances, they soon formed a congregation and fitted up a place of worship and school for themselves.

EDUCATION.

THE EARLY SCHOOLS.[1]—The first school-house in Honesdale was located a short distance east of the corner of High and North Third Streets. It was afterwards used for stable purposes and has long since been demolished. The work of education was opened by Lewis Pestana, in the spring of 1828. He was succeeded in the fall by Charles P. Clark, who continued to teach during the winter. About the same time M. A. Whitney opened a school in the "Lower Village."

The next school was in the "Upper Village," and was conducted by Miss Mary Ann Garrett. Meanwhile Mr. Clark had been succeeded by Mr. Wells, and he, in turn, by M. A. Bidwell, who had charge of the school for several years. The other private schools of the town will be mentioned further on.

[1] The history of the Honesdale schools was principally prepared by Edgar Jadwin.

The act "To establish a General System of Education by Common Schools," which became a law April 1, 1834, was promptly adopted by the people of Honesdale.

It provided for the election of six school directors, who were to hire teachers and superintend other matters relating to the schools In 1836 they were authorized to levy taxes for educational purposes. The first board of directors for the Honesdale School District held its first meeting July 18, 1835, and proceeded at once to make arrangements for opening a public school. They rented the Honesdale Academy from its board of trustees and retained control of it for three years.

A list of the directors and of the teachers in the public schools from that time to the present, complete so far as the records show, is appended to this sketch. The board would occasionally delegate one of its members to hire a teacher. When that was done and the name of the teacher was not afterwards recorded, which fortunately was rarely the case, a vacancy must necessarily occur in the list.

In 1836 two additional schools were established, one in the "Upper" and the other in the "Lower Village." For several years after the introduction of the common-school system teachers were required to provide school-houses at their own expense.

The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company deeded the lot on Second Street below Sixth (where the Lower School-house now stands) to the school directors in 1838 for a consideration of one dollar, and what was long known as the "Old Red School-House" was erected there. This was insufficient to meet the wants of the Lower Village as the town grew, and in 1849 was replaced by the present building.

The first school in the Upper Village owned by the board was located on the west side of Main Street, a little south of Thirteenth.

In 1847 the board bought a lot on the north side of Thirteenth Street, about midway between Main and East Streets, and moved the building there. They rented a room of E. Fields, in 1840, for the school in the Centre Village.

In the fall of the following year they rented the basement of the old Methodist Episcopal Church for the same purpose, with the privilege of holding it for eight years.

Four years later they bought from the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company a part of lot No. 20, bounded westerly by Third Street, northerly by lot No. 21, easterly by the west bank of the Lackawaxen River, southerly by the southerly half of lot No. 20, and had a schoolhouse erected on it immediately. This was used continuously until 1861, when both the house and lot were sold, one-half to S. E. Dimmick and the other to the Wayne County commissioners. At the same time the Upper Schoolhouse was sold to John Thomas.

The board divided the Honesdale School District into three sub-districts in 1842, as follows: First or North District, all above the Lackawaxen Bridge; Second or Middle District, between the Lackawaxen Bridge and Canal Bridge on the lateral basin; Third or South District, all below the Canal Bridge on the lateral basin.

An extra public school, called School No. 4, was held in Captain Murray's building for part of the time from 1850 to 1854, both inclusive.

A petition from the teachers in 1856, requesting that every Saturday be given to them as a holiday, was not granted then, as it was deemed inexpedient by the board. It must, however, have been granted soon after, for the records of a few years later show that there was then no school on that day.

The course of study followed in the schools up to 1861, excepting, of course, the Honesdale Academy, varied with the attainments of the teacher, but the standard studies were reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, elocution, elements of English grammar, with occasionally geography, history and higher mathematics.

The old academy building, which was built in 1833, was rented in 1835 to the school board, who used it as a district school-house for three years. The need of an institution which would furnish a higher education than the district schools gave had begun to be felt, and the Honesdale Academy, of which an account appears at the close of the public school history, was opened.

The academy being discontinued in 1861, the building was sold at sheriff's sale, and bid in by the school board.

The Honesdale Graded School was organized and commenced May 8, 1861, with Professor C. B. Shaw as principal. During the summer the building was repaired and the basement fitted up for use.

The Lower School was re-opened in 1864 as a branch of the graded school, and continued almost uninterruptedly until 1879, since which time it has been closed.

In 1867 the rear addition was built and the academic department reseated.

Professor Leroy R. Fowler, L. H. Barnum, John M. Dolph and George W. Twitmyer have successively occupied the position of principal.

Professor L. H. Barnum re-graded the school throughout in 1873. With the exception of an additional grade in the primary department, three years later, the system then adopted has remained unchanged.

The Franklin Lyceum Association presented their entire collection of twenty-eight hundred books, together with their furniture, to the school district, in 1878, on condition that the district assume their debts, which amounted to about two hundred and twenty-five dollars. The interior of the school building was further altered to provide a room for the library. In accordance with the State law the secretary of the school board is librarian, and the principal of the school acting librarian.

Since the transfer of the library to the district many new books have been added to it by gift and purchase. It is open weekly, and every resident of the district is allowed the use of the books gratis.

The school building was furnished with steam-heating apparatus in the summer of 1880.

In 1885 it was again renovated, and the rooms of the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh grades reseated.

At present the school is in a most prosperous condition, under the management of Professor George W. Twitmyer.

[We may remark here that Professor Twitmyer was born at Zion, Centre County, Pa., June 9, 1849. He obtained his education at the public schools of Centre County and the Central Normal School. He commenced to teach school before he was nineteen years old, and has taught ever since. He was princial of the McEwenville Academy two years, and organized and graded the public schools of Watsontown, Pa., where he remained four years, during which time he received the degree of A.M. from Franklin and Marshall College. He accepted the position of principal of Honesdale Graded School August 1, 1884, and has managed the school from that time until now with marked ability.]

In addition to the circulating library, the school is provided with a large reference library, a geological collection and valuable collections of philosophical and chemical apparatus.

A student, in order to graduate, must attain an average grade of seventy-five out of a possible hundred in reading, drawing, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, English grammar, physiology, geology, physics, astronomy, chemistry, English literature, rhetoric, algebra, geometry, (six books), plane trigonometry, book-keeping, botany, United States history and general history. The study of Latin is elective. Those who take it can go through Allen & Greenough's Latin grammar, and read Leighton's Latin lessons, four books of Cæsar's De Bello Gallico, six books of Virgil's Æneid and three orations of Cicero. Scholars in the primary department receive a daily calisthenic drill in a room fitted up for that purpose.

The graduates of the school have recently formed an Alumni Association, numbering over sixty members.

Besides the schools already mentioned, there have been others in Honesdale which were established from time to time as there was demand for them.

In 1833 Mrs. M. A. Bidwell and Elizabeth Waldron taught in the Old Tabernacle at the junction of the West Branch and the Dyberry. Caroline Waldron also taught a select school.

The Honesdale Female Seminary was founded in 1838, and continued for a short time. Its teachers were Miss Clara Tyler and Mrs. Horace Tracy.

Rev. David Torrey conducted a college preparatory school in 1848–49.

A select school was kept for many years in the house on the south side of Tenth Street, between Third Street and the river, now occupied by F. C. Keen.

The Misses Lane, Miss Ann Rodgers, Miss Mary Williams, Miss Bonner, Miss Snyder, and Miss Jeanette Stone were teachers in it at different times.

Miss Waterbury, Mrs. Tracy, Miss Mennenhall, and the Misses Lauterman taught in a building on the east side of Second Street, between Eighth and Ninth, where H. T. Whitney's house now is.

Among others who have presided over select schools in Honesdale were Miss Estella G. Cook, Mrs. C. Deming, Mrs. A. J. Dennis, Miss Fanny Dusinberre, Mrs. J. M. Edgett, F. P. Galpin, Miss Gustin, Miss Lizzie Hart, J. E. Hawker, W. H. Hodgson, W. E. Hurley, Louisa C. Keen, Miss Abbie Losey, Prof. Ludwig, Miss Mary Marsh, C. B. Shaw and Miss Tomlinson.

In 1870 a school building was erected on the southeast corner of Thirteenth and East Streets, and a private school kept there from 1870–75 inclusive, the teachers being Miss Nellie Sanderson, Miss Annie C. McFadden and Miss Kate M. Hand. The school was reopened in 1882, with Miss Munro as teacher. She was followed by Miss Mills, who also taught for one year.

The use of the Lower School-house was granted in 1862 to Rev. J. J. Doherty, who had a school conducted there for some time. He was again allowed the use of it in 1875 for a night-school.

A school was conducted for many years in the Jewish synagogue by the rabbi, but it is closed at present.

Besides the graded school, there are now in successful operation in Honesdale a kindergarten under the charge of Miss Lottie E. Petersen, a parochial school under the control of the German Lutheran Church and another under the control of the German Catholic Church.

THE HONESDALE ACADEMY.—This, the most important educational institution which the town ever possessed, besides the graded schools, was organized in 1833, and the old academy building was erected in that year, on the site of the present school building. The original board of trustees in 1833 was composed of J. B. Walton, J. Neal, A. H. Farnum, J. D. Delezenne and S. W. Genung. No effort appears to have been made to conduct an academy here until 1838, the building being rented by the trustees to the school board from 1835 to that time and used by them as a district school-house. In 1838 the trustees, however, opened an academy, with Henry Seymour, A.B., a graduate of Amherst College, as principal. He was followed by Professors Morse, Willard Richardson, B. B. Smith, C. N. Todd and John Proctor, John Proctor, J. H. Sinclair, May & Lott, Lott, Terrell & Briggs and Briggs alone.

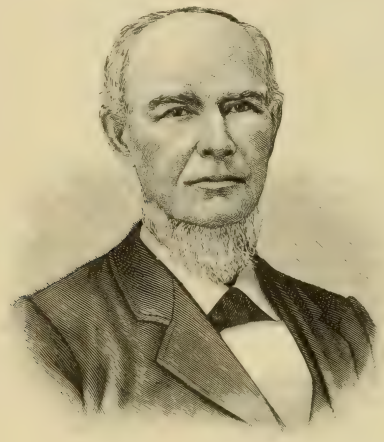
In 1853 the old building was removed to the east side of Third Street, between Tenth and Eleventh. It has since been used as a residence, and is now occupied by Mrs. George Bentley. The same year the main part of the present building was erected, F. B. Penniman and Charles C. Waller raising the money for the enterprise. When completed there was a debt of about two thousand dollars hanging over the new building, toward the cancellation of which the following subscriptions were made: John Torrey, $400; Russel F. Lord, $300; T. H. R. Tracy, $250; Richard L. Seely, $250; James R. Dickson, $250; S. D. Ward, $50; S. E. Dimmick, $50, and others stood ready to contribute the residue.

The May term, 1853, was opened in the new building, C. N. Todd and John Proctor being the associate principals, with a corps of assistants, including Mrs. C. F. Tracy, Miss Abbie R. Knight, Miss C. L. Scott and Mr. Godfrey Stoeubly. The trustees at this period were R. L. Seely, T. H. R. Tracy, S. D. Ward, S. E. Dimmick, James R. Dickson and F. B. Penniman.

The academy was conducted quite successfully, under the various principals heretofore named, until 1861, when it was discontinued, and the building was sold to the school directors for twenty-three hundred dollars.



As a matter of interest to many readers, we give a partial list of the pupils of the old academy during the years 1844–45–46, when B. B. Smith was principal. The names were selected from his books and are chiefly those of resident pupils,—

The late BENJAMIN B. SMITH, the longest serving, ablest and best-known principal the academy ever had, was a descendant of an old Connecticut family long settled at or near Litchfield, where his father, Sylvester Smith, was born. In early life the latter took up his residence at Whitestown, Oneida County, N. Y., where he remained for a time, and then removed to Franklin, Susquehanna County, Pa., where he married Polly Bates, of Great Bend, and passed the remainder of his days. He was one of the pioneers in the wild section in which he located, and led a life of busy industry in clearing up and developing the land which he was about to reclaim from nature, and devote to the uses of agriculture and husbandry.

Amid such surroundings Benjamin B. Smith was born in August, 1815. He was early subjected to severe toil upon his father's farm, and his educational advantages were decidedly limited. Being fond of study and anxious to acquire a thorough education, he finally entered the academy at Harford, Susquehanna County, where he received excellent academic instruction, and soon after engaged in the occupation of a teacher in the district schools of the county. By still closer study and industrious preparation, he fitted himself for admission to Union College, Schenectady, N. Y. He did not remain long enough to cover the entire curriculum, but afterwards, upon examination and in consideration of his actual proficiency in learning, he was granted his degree as though he had taken the regular course. About this period he engaged in teaching at Dundaff, Susquehanna County, for several years. In 1839 he came to Honesdale as a student in the academy, and in 1841 became principal of the institution, in which position he continued for ten years, with marked success, and with the earnest appreciation of the friends of the school.

In 1851 he deemed it advisable to withdraw from the academy, and to adopt another vocation. He purchased a book-store in Honesdale, and thenceforward until his death, October 28, 1885, his store was recognized as one of the successful permanent establishments of the place. During all this time, however, he was unceasingly active in other directions. He maintained his familiar acquaintance with mathematics and classical literature, and acted as the private instructor and tutor of many of the young men of Honesdale. He purchased a farm near Honesdale, and labored considerably upon that. He took an active interest in the temperance cause, and his voice was frequently heard upon the rostrum in favor of the abolition of all privileges for the manufacture or sale of alcoholic beverages. As early as 1853 he adopted radical views in relation to the doctrine of human slavery, and though opposed by the majority of his friends at that period, he helped to organize an anti-slavery party, and zealously propagated their views until their final triumph, in 1863. He was a member of the Honesdale Presbyterian Church, and took a deep interest in church-work. Later on his investigations into the mysteries of science led him to see an apparent contradiction between nature as it existed and as the dogmas of the church declared it had been created, and he fell into some disfavor with the more zealous and narrow-minded of his brethren; but never did he abandon his faith in God, his belief in the life beyond the grave, in the certainty of the doctrine of rewards and punishments after death, nor in the ultimate triumph of good over evil.

Probably the strongest characteristic of Mr. Smith's nature might be described as earnest and fearless seeking after truth, great independence of thought and investigation and an inflexible determination to indorse and be faithful to the doctrines and creeds which he believed to be true. His integrity as a man was never questioned. Devoted to his family and friends, faithful in the performance of all good works, honest in thought and action, he leaves behind him that greatest of all riches, a good name, and a memory which those who are nearest to him may hold in reverence.

Mr. Smith married, December 9, 1841, Betsey Hannah Brush, daughter of Deacon Stephen Brush, of Honesdale. Of his three children, but two attained to years of maturity, viz.: Carrie A. and Henry A., a teacher by occupation, who died, September 29, 1885, while principal of the academy at Whitney's Point, New York. The latter married Jennie C. Reury, of Honesdale, who, with their only child, Bessie H. Smith, reside in Honesdale.

SOCIETIES.

Honesdale Lodge, No. 218, Free and Accepted Masons.—The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, assembled at Philadelphia, September 4, 1843, granted a warrant to hold a Masonic lodge in the borough of Honesdale, Wayne County, Pa., to be called Honesdale Lodge, No. 218, and appointed John I. Allen Worshipful Master; Daniel O. Skinner, Senior Warden; Richard Lancaster, Junior Warden; Joseph B. Walton, Treasurer; Jeremiah C. Gunn, Secretary—and the said lodge was duly constituted, and the above-named officers installed, by Daniel Burrell, Worshipful Master of the Milford Lodge, by virtue of a dispensation from the Grand Master.

At first there was no suitable place for a lodge-room, and the meetings were held in the lower part of the town, until Mr. Zara W. Arnold erected a building near the bank, the upper part of which was fitted up for Masonic purposes, where the meetings were held for a number of years, after which John A. Patmor erected a large building, called Empire Block, and the upper story of said building was fitted up for lodge-rooms, and, when finished, the lodge was removed to that place, and the hall properly dedicated with the pleasing reflection that, in view of the ample and commodious accommodations, added to the tasteful and symbolic arrangements, it was considered a permanent location. But, unfortunately, the lodge had not been settled to exceed two years, when, on the night of April 25, 1851, a destructive fire broke out in a building near by, which raged with such fury that all access to the lodge-room was cut off; consequently, the charter, regalia, furniture and, worst of all, the records of the lodge (including the records of Freedom Lodge, No. 147, organized at Bethany in the year 1816), were consumed, so that there was not the least vestige remaining. There being no insurance, it was a total loss, and the lodge was left without a warrant and in a penniless condition. Meetings were held from time to time for the purpose of consulting as to the best means to be taken for reinstating the lodge. In the mean time a statement was forwarded to the Grand Lodge, which not only renewed the charter without fee, but donated considerable aid besides. This action of the Grand Lodge, together with contributions received from various lodges and brethren, enabled the lodge to resume work under the old warrant, reissued by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, under date of June 4, 1851, and on the date of October 2, 1851, the lodge commenced to hold regular meetings in Odd-Fellows' Hall until permanent quarters could be procured. August 26, 1852, a suitable hall was leased of James H. Sutton, the lodge having this place until July 14, 1859, when more roomy and convenient apartments were rented from Charles Petersen. Early in 1869 the lodge removed its hall from the Petersen building to what has since been known as Masonic Hall,—a fine brick structure, with mansard roof,—having been constructed and arranged specially for Masonic purposes throughout the entire third story. In its membership and general personnel Honesdale Lodge, No. 218, Free and Accepted Masons, presents a long list of the solid yeomanry of the county of Wayne, and under the sods of the hills and valleys sleep numbers of those early members of the mystic shrine, who, in the early days of thicket and forest, rode many miles through unbroken woods to attend lodge-meetings. Among the number of those who have held important positions in the lodge the greatest number of years may be mentioned the names of Charles Menner and Dr. James W. Kesler, the former having occupied the secretary's chair from 1855 to 1865; the last-named the same position from 1870 until the present time.

ANTHONY WAYNE CHAPTER, NO. 204, H. R. A., was instituted May 7, 1866, with Thomas E. Grier, Robert J. Menner, William Turner, William H. Dimmick, Gilbert White and Jacob K. Palmer as charter members. Of these, only two—Messrs. Menner and White—remain among the present members. The succession of officers, from and including the first, with the dates of their election, have been as follows:

M. E. High Priests.—Thomas E. Grier, May 7, 1866; Robert J. Menner, December 17, 1867; William Turner, December 26, 1866; Henry J. Tarble, December 1, 1868, re-elected December 21, 1869; Samuel B. Haley, December 13, 1870; Charles C. Brown, November 28, 1871; Henry J. Tarble, February 18, 1873, re-elected December 9, 1873, and November 24, 1874; Horace T. Menner, December 14, 1875, re-elected December 5, 1876; Gilbert White, January 22, 1884; J. Oscar Terrel, December 2, 1884.

The stated meetings of the chapter are held on Tuesday evening of every month succeeding the full moon.

Freedom Lodge, No. 88, I. O. O. F., was instituted August 28, 1856. The first officers were Henry Kuttner, N. G.; John Bone, V. G.; James Fox, Sec.; William Weiss, Treas. The lodge had then about ten members. October 1, 1885, it had fifty members, and the cash on hand was $1382.08, and that invested $1000—making $2382.08. The present officers are Joseph Williams, N. G.; Alfred Willmarth, V. G.; George L. Eck, Treas.; Otto Teaubner, Sec.

Lackawaxen Encampment, No. 30, I. O. O. F., was instituted September 29, 1873, with the following officers: John Gerry, C. P.; William Weaver, S. W.; George Bond, J. W.; F. A. Brown, Scribe; John Loercher, Treas. The present officers are F. S. Martin, C. P.; William Varcoe, H. P.; John Meyer, S. W.; T. Schilling, J. W.; John Loercher, Treas.; George L. Eck, Scribe and D. D. G. P.

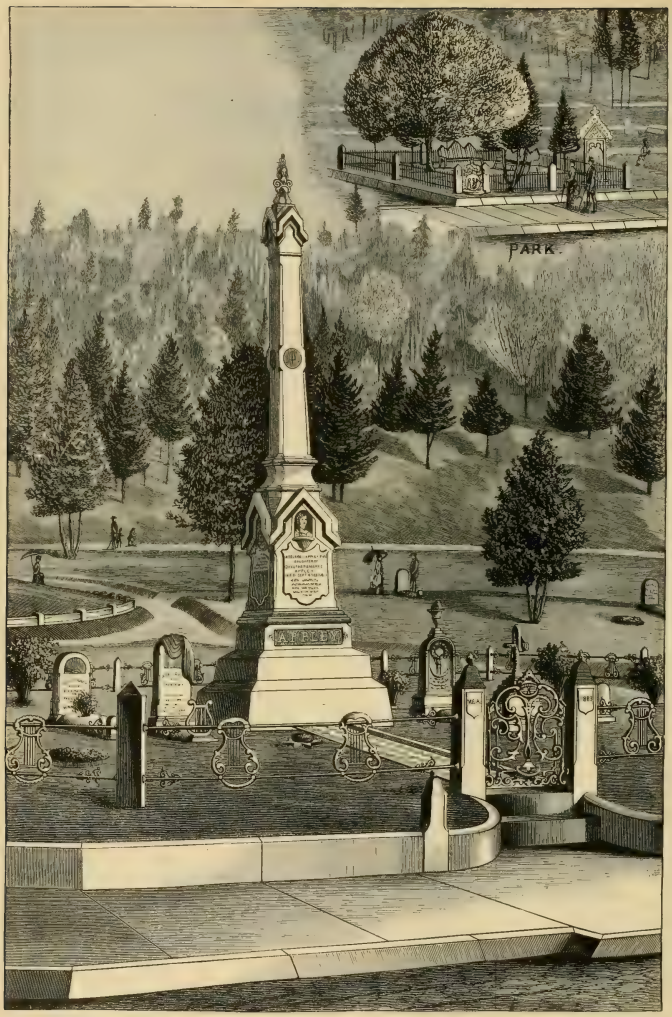
Irving Lodge, No. 491, K. of P., was organized October 31, 1883, with a membership of forty-eight, of which number forty-two received the Knight's rank, two received rank of Esquire and four received rank of Page. The officers elected for the first term were W. E. Greeley, C. C.; Thomas J. Ham, V. C.; C. W. Spencer, P.; C. E. Foster, M. at A.; C. M. Betz, M. of Ex.; E. H. Clark, M. of F.; T. E. Calloway, K. of R. and S.; C. E. Knapp, I. G.; F. W. Jenkins, O. G.; S. F. Cory. There have been nineteen additional members initiated into the lodge since the night of organization, eighteen of whom received the rank of Knight and one the rank of Esquire, making a total membership at present of sixty-seven. The following officers were serving in November, 1885: C. M. Betz, P. C.; S. B. Haley, C. C.; R. W. Ham, V. C.; P. E. Lowe, P.; J. L. Kopp, M. at A.; T. E. Calloway, M. of F.; C. F. Meyer, M. of E.; S. B. Brown, K. of R. and S.; Harvey Welch, O. G. The representative to Grand Lodge and District Deputy is Thomas J. Ham. The lodge has not been called upon for sick benefits since its organization. Lodge meets every Wednesday evening.

Capt. J. P. Ham Post, No. 198, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, named after Captain James P. Ham, of Company M, Seventeenth Cavalry, who was killed in the service, was organized November, 1880, Dr. R. W. Brady being made Commander (formerly surgeon during the war); Capt William T. Lobb, Chaplain; W. E. Greely, Senior Vice-Commander; Charles E. Baker, Junior Vice-Commander; Legrand Wright was made Adjutant; Lieut. R. W. Torry, who served with much credit as quartermaster of the One Hundred and Forty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, was made Quartermaster of the Post, with H. T. Prouty as his Sergeant; Joseph E. Williams, Officer of the Day; J. E. Ball, Officer of the Guard. There were twenty-eight charter members; among them was Col. Coe Durland, who went to war as captain Company M, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and was made colonel of the regiment for meritorious conduct; discharged at close of the war with rank of brigadier-general.

In 1881, J. W. Kressler was elected Commander of Post; Charles Finch, Senior Vice; Joseph Fox, Junior Vice; H. B. Hall, Chaplain; J. E. Williams, Officer of Day; John Ballis, Officer of Guard; W. E. Greely, Adjutant; Hon. Henry Wilson, Quartermaster, with Tray Justin as Sergeant.

December 1, 1882, Isaac H. Ball, lieutenant Company C, Sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers (Reserves), was made Commander; James E. Williams, Senior Vice-Commander; Thomas Medland, Junior Vice-Commander; Joseph

Fox, Officer of Day; William T. Lobb, Chaplain; Charles Myres, Quartermaster; R. W. Brady, Sergeant; H. B. Hall, Officer of Guard; Charles E. Baker was appointed Adjutant.



December, 1883, Charles W. Tracy, who was educated at West Point and rose to the position of lieutenant-commander in the United States navy, was made Commander of Post 198; J. E. Williams, Senior Vice-Commander; John Ballis, Junior Vice-Commander; Charles F. Myres, Quartermaster; J. W. Kressler, Surgeon; W. T. Lobb, Chaplain; W. E. Greely, Officer of Day; John E. Cook, Officer of Guard; Comrade Katz was made Quartermaster-Sergeant; Graham Watts, Adjutant.

December, 1884, Captain Charles E. Baker was made Commander; John Ballis, Senior Vice-Commander; Samuel Found, Junior Vice-Commander; Charles Myres, Quartermaster; Captain W. T. Lobb, Chaplain; W. E. Greely, Officer of Day; John Cook, Officer of Guard; H. B. Hall, Adjutant. Post numbers eighty-two members. Many of our comrades have been laid away to rest since our organization began. One that we shall all remember as a comrade, though not a member of our Post, has fought his last battle. The Post has had contributions, by an appreciative community, of money that has been used for the relief of suffering and indigent comrades. Among the members of the Post are some who are not short in this world's goods, and who contribute largely when it is required. Among the number are Comrades Henry Tarble, Coe Durland, R. W. Brady, J. W. Kressler, Charles Myres, Commander Katz and William Mure, who is ever ready with his influence and money to furnish any needed amount.

Company E, Thirteenth Regiment, Third Brigade, National Guards of Pennsylvania, was organized August 23, 1878, with George F. Bentley, captain; D. R. Atkinson, first lieutenant; H. G. Young, second lieutenant; W. H. Stanton, first sergeant; Charles W. Hand, second sergeant; W. E. Greeley, third sergeant; N. B. Shuman, fourth sergeant; William Bone, fifth sergeant.

Corporals: Andy Schoonmaker, Graham Watts, J. A. Krapt, L. V. Hunt, S. J. Foster, W. L. Dunn, George J. Grambs and I. S. White. Privates: Calvin Brown, Lewis F. Bishop, Joseph A. Bodie, Judson W. Bunnell, William H. Brown, C. D. Brooks, Levi L. Demming, Henry T. Dolmetsch, Jr., S. O. Downes, William H. Foster, William M. Foster, Clarence E. Foster, Homer Greene, W. C. D. Genung, Henry Giehl, F. A. Galpin, William Haley, Edward M. Heroy, F. W. Jenkins, George R. Lasher, Luke S. Levy, William R. Longstreet, Frank M. Mahone, F. W. Mayhew, F. McMullen, Jno. Miller, Joseph Oldorf (musician), W. J. Pragnell, August J. Rehbein, R. D. Reed, H. Z. Russell, D. J. Richmond, C. E. Salmon, H. S. Salmon, Jacob W. Schubel, C. W. Sutton, Frank Salmon, L. D. Spragle, Isaac E. Tibbetts, William J. Tracy, George H. Whitney, George E. White, William D. Wood, L. F. Wefferling, Jno. F. Wood, William J. Ward.

In 1879 the following persons joined the company: Charles W. Babbetts, Dr. William H. Cummings, A. C. Lindsay, William T. Moore, Charles Mahone, W. H. Perham, C. H. Rockwell, Jno. H. Torrey, Frank E. White. In 1880: Stephen A. Addyman, M. A. Ball, W. T. Butler, Jno. D. Blake, Charles H. Finch, R. W. Murphy, H. N. Miller, F. W. Renwarden, Alden Rounds, C. L. Rauner, C. E. Seely, F. M. Sherrerd, John O. Southard, J. V. Starnes, H. B. Welch. In 1881: N. C. Kirk, E. J. Pethic, William A. Quinney. In 1882: J. A. Burket, R. C. Bodie, George S. Baker, G. S. Barnes, Jacob Fass, J. W. Kimble, Allen Lawrence, Ed. Mahone, Wallace McMullen, James O. Reid, F. J. Tolley. In 1883: Egin Henry. In 1884: Jno. W. Broad, H. H. Budd, A. Britenbaker, G. C. Conzelman, Jno. B. Dennis, W. G. Faatz, W. M. Gardner, E. D. Goodenough, Thomas W. Hawker, Jno. M. Hayward, Frank O. Hauke, J. L. Kopp, J. Kanskey, H. J. Keenan, G. W. Lane, O. L. Rowland, W. W. Roscoe, G. P. Rogers, S. S. captain; George H. Whitney, first lieutenant; L. D. Spragle, second lieutenant; Sergeants, Deming, Sherrard, Ward, Mahone, Quinney; Corporals, Tracy, McMullen, Blake, Rowland, Baker, Broad, Gardner, Stocker. The company has attended seven encampments—the first camp was a regimental encampment, at Long Branch, August, 1879; second, division encampment, at Philadelphia, August, 1880; third, encampment at Wilkesbarre, August, 1881, being a brigade encampment. Shortly after coming home from his encampment Captain Bentley died. He was a good disciplinarian and commanded the respect and willing obedience of his company. He was proud of his company and they reciprocated in their admiration for their captain. After Captain Bentley's death, Lieut. Atkinson was made captain, and William H. Stanton, first lieutenant; W. E. Greely, second lieutenant; Graham Watts, orderly sergeant. The fourth encampment was a division encampment at Williamsport, 1882, company under command of Lieutenant Stanton, who was always careful for the comfort of his men; fifth, Lewistown, brigade encampment, 1883; Captain Atkinson resigned in 1884. He is a crack shot, being one of the American team that shot against the British team, at Creedmoor, September 15, 1882; his score was one hundred and fifty-six out of a possible two hundred and ten, he being fourth of the American team. The term of five years having expired, numbers did not re-enlist and the company began to go down till February, 1884, when enlistments began again. In searching for a captain, Henry Wilson, the efficient editor of the Honesdale Citizen, and a veteran of the late War of the Rebellion, was chosen, and under his careful management the company is again in good condition. The sixth encampment was a division encampment at Gettysburg. The boys took pleasure in searching out the points of interest on this historic ground,—Culp's Hill, the National Cemetery, Little Round Top, Seminary Ridge. The cupola of the seminary, to which some of us ascended and overlooked the field as it presented itself to the eye of General Lee, will never be forgotten by the boys. The seventh was a brigade encampment at Mount Gretna Park, near Lebanon, Pa. The company first had the hall over the foundry for an armory; it now occupies Liberty Hall for that purpose. Dr. Cummings became brigade-surgeon, with the rank of major. Colonel H. M. Boies commanded the Thirteenth Regiment at its first organization; it is now commanded by Colonel F. L. Hitchcock, a veteran of the late war. The company attended the Bi-Centennial at Philadelphia in 1882; also the inaugurations of Presidents Garfield and Cleveland. Generals Sherman and Sheridan have expressed their admiration for the Pennsylvania militia, and at the inaugurations above referred to they marched in heavy marching order and were considered to be an excellent body of troops by those well capable of judging.

BURIAL-PLACES.

In the early history of Honesdale, interments were made on the banks of the Dyberry, near its junction with the Lackawaxen. Afterwards Jason Torrey gave the plot of land now known as the old Methodist Episcopal Church burying-ground to the "Burgess, Assistant Burgess and Town Council of the borough of Honesdale, their successors and assigns forever," for burial purposes. The first interment took place September 11, 1830, the remains being those of Emeline, the first wife of the late Dr. Ebenezer T. Losey. Soon after, the bodies that had been buried near "the point" were removed to the new cemetery. The deed for the above land was dated Bethany, April 26, 1834, and was witnessed by Richard L. Seely. It was entered of record July 23, 1839. The consideration was one dollar.

Glen Dyberry Cemetery.—This burial-place, lying between the banks of the placid, tree-embowered Dyberry and the rugged, wooded hill eastward from the stream, is one of the most beautiful to be found in the country. Its situation is peculiar. It is within two squares of the principal street of the borough, and yet is completely hidden from that street and from the town by the peculiar ridge (shaped like an inverted canoe), extending along the Dyberry, and by the dense growth of native trees. The grounds are tastefully laid out, enriched with evergreens and deciduous trees and shrubs, through which shady walks and drives wind in all directions about the well-turfed, carefully-kept plots, each sacred to some home circle.

The entrance to the cemetery is by a bridge over the Dyberry. The stream forms a gentle but everlasting line of demarkation between the little cities of the living and the dead, and its dark waters flow on peacefully as the waters of Lethe.

The cemetery was originated by a company organized under the provisions of a State charter, granted January 26, 1854. The act named as incorporators Russell F. Lord, Thomas H. R. Tracy, Samuel E. Dimmick, John Torrey, Stephen Torrey, Richard L. Seely, James R. Dickson, Francis B. Penniman, Zenas H. Russell, John F. Lord, Amory Prescott, Richard Henwood, James M. Brookfield, Eliphalet Wood, M. A. Bidwell, Rufus M. Grenell, Solomon West, Charles Tehlager, George Brettenbacher, Oliver Hamlin, Charles P. Waller, William R. McLaury, Germain L. Keator, Henry Dart, Samuel Allen, H. B. Beardslee, Stephen D. Ward, William Turner and Coe F. Young.

The organization was duly perfected and named the Honesdale Cemetery Company. At a meeting of the incorporators held on February 11, 1854, Thomas H. R. Tracy was chosen chairman and F. B. Penniman secretary; Messrs. C. P. Waller, Richard L. Seely, Samuel E. Dimmick, Samuel Allen and Coe F. Young were appointed a committee to draft by-laws.

For some time the company remained in a condition of partial activity and transacted no business which was deemed worthy of mention in its minute-book. In the winter of 1858–59, however, its affairs were energetically pushed, and by February 18, 1859, forty shares of stock had been subscribed, at one hundred dollars each, by the following persons:

R. F. Lord, 4; John Torrey, 4; R. L. Seely, 4; Z. H. Russell, 2; Stephen Torrey, William F. Wood, Coe F. Young, J. K. Patmor, Isaiah Foster, I. P. Foster, William H. Foster, F. B. Penniman, W. W. Weston, M. L. Tracy, W. J. Fuller, James R. Dickson, William R. McLaury, E. F. Torrey, D. P. Kirtland, Ezra Hand, B. B. Smith, William Reed, M. B. Bennett, Eliphalet Wood, C. P. Waller, John McIntosh, F. M. Crane, S. D. Ward, C. Hornbeck, R. Henwood, each one share.

On March 5, 1859, at a meeting held at F. B. Penniman's office, Z. H. Russell presiding, Messrs. Waller, McLaury, Smith, Ward and W. H. Foster were appointed a committee to examine various tracts of land, with reference to their availability for cemetery purposes. This committee reported, at a meeting held on the 2d of the following May, that parcels of land were offered by H. B. Beardslee (forty acres for $2000), D. Schoonover (fifteen acres, at $150 per acre), G. Russell (quantity not stated, at $100 per acre), Gilbert and Patmor (indefinite quantity, at $200 to $300 per acre), John Torrey (eighteen acres at $2400). At a subsequent meeting it was decided to test the choice of the members in regard to location of the cemetery. This was done by ballot, and the Torrey tract received a majority of three votes over all of the other proposed sites. Mr. Torrey having in the mean time abated his price for the land four hundred dollars, it was agreed that it should be purchased for two thousand dollars.

At the meeting of May 2, 1859, Russell F. Lord had been elected president and R. L. Seely, Eliphalet Wood, William H. Foster, Zenas H. Russell, William R. McLaury and F. B. Penniman managers. Under these officers the purchase of the land was confirmed and steps were immediately taken for laying out the cemetery, inclosing it with a wall, except along the Dyberry, building a bridge over that stream, making various improvements and generally beautifying the grounds. Much of this work was carried on under the immediate supervision of F. B. Penniman and Stephen Torrey.

The first grave was opened in the new cemetery for the reception of the body of Dr. William F. Denton, who was buried November 21, 1859.

On the evening of Friday, November 25, 1859, services inaugurating the opening of Glen Dyberry Cemetery were held at the Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. Scott, of that church, Rev. Uriah Scott, of the Episcopal, and Rev. Mr. Grenell, of the Baptist Church, making addresses, and Mr. F. B. Penniman appearing on behalf of the board of managers and delivering an informal address.

The first public sale of lots was held on Saturday, November 26th, when forty-nine lots were sold. Russell F. Lord obtained the first choice, bidding fifty dollars for the privilege.

In Glen Dyberry are buried the following soldiers, the greater number of whom, as will be noted, were engaged in the War for the Union, 1861–65 :

David Beers, a soldier of the War of 1812.

Joseph D. Simpson, a soldier of the War of 1812.

Banajah Haskins, a soldier of the War of 1812.

Corporal Joseph Schofield, Duncan's United States Artillery, Mexican War.

Captain James Ham, Company M, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Captain Charles C. Brown, Company M, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Sergeant William H. Hurlburt, Company C, Sixth Pennsylvania Reserves.

Sergeant Edmund M. Clark, Company M, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Sergeant William T. Hall, Company C, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania.

Sergeant William H. Van Kirk, Company C, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania.

Corporal James Northcott, Company M, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

Dr. J. M. Starnes, assistant surgeon, Eleventh Missouri Cavalry.

Thomas Benney, Battery C, Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery.

John Benney, Battery C, Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery.

Martin Groner, Company H, Fifty-second Pennsylvania.

Thomas J. Firth, Company B, Third Pennsylvania Reserves.

L. B. Sherwood, Company I, Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Frederick Zahn, Company F, Third New Jersey Cavalry.

Albert L. Rowley, Company L, Fifteenth New York Heavy Artillery.

George M. Cole, Company B, Thirty-fifth Pennsylvania Militia of 1863.

Andrew J. Dennis, Company K, Eleventh United States Infantry.

William W. Valentine, Eighth Pennsylvania Militia of 1862.

Robert Barclay, of the United States Navy.

John B. Lisk, Company G, Third New York Artillery.

John Schofield, United States Volunteers.

H. T. Justin, Company C, Sixth Pennsylvania Reserves.

David J. Richmond, Company G, One Hundred and Forty-first Pennsylvania.

A. R. Howe, Company D, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania.

George Britenbaker, Battery C, Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery.

RIVERDALE CEMETERY.—This burial-ground, opened in 1885, lies immediately north of Glen Dyberry, and may in time rival its beauty. It is the property of a corporation. Joseph Nochals, who formerly owned the land, made some improvements upon it with a view of establishing a burial-ground, but sold it to W. A. Gaylord and Henry J. Tarble in 1883. At the May Term of court, 1885, a charter was granted to the Riverdale Cemetery Company, which consisted of H. J. Tarble, president; P. J. Cole, treasurer; F. P. Kimble, secretary; J. J. Curtis and W. A. Gaylord. To this company Messrs. Tarble and Gaylord deeded the property on May 16, 1885, the consideration being five thousand five hundred and fifty dollars. The capital stock is divided into one hundred and twenty shares at fifty dollars each. The grounds have been laid out by Mr. Robinson, of New York, former overseer of Greenwood Cemetery, and it is the intention to improve them as rapidly as possible and to sell plots.

The German Lutherans, the German Catholics and the English Catholics also have burying-grounds.

In the German Catholic Cemetery are buried Captain James Loeven, William Blesser, John G. Holzknecht, Frederick Stolte and Nicholas Shearer (all of Company C, One Hundred and Twelfth Pennsylvania Volunteers) Alexander Maier and Frederick Krong.

In the German Lutheran Cemetery are the graves of Caspar Havrich, of Company C, One Hundred and Twelfth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and Henry Languth.

In the old Catholic burying-grounds lie the remains of John Baker, of Company C, Sixth Reserves.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.—The most conspicuous object in the beautiful little park or public square is a monument reared to perpetuate the names of Wayne County men who fell in the War of the Rebellion. Measures were taken toward the rearing of this monument before the war was really ended, and it was one of the first erected in the State. A meeting to organize the Monument Association was held June 1, 1865. The president was Coe F. Young; the Vice-Presidents, Otis Avery and Z. H. Russell; and the Secretaries, J. C. Delezenne and E. F. Torrey. F. B. Penniman read articles of association agreed upon by the Ladies' Aid Society and addresses were delivered by Rev. J. J. Doherty, F. D. Haskins, C. S. Minor, Esq., L. F. Borcher and G. G. Waller, Esq. The society was then organized by the election of the following officers: President, Mrs. John Torrey; Secretary, Mrs. Sophia Russell; Treasurer, Mrs. S. D. Ward; Managers, Mrs. J. C. Gunn, Mrs. Ezra Hurlburt, Mrs. John R. Watts, Mrs. Russell F. Lord, Mrs. S. E. Dimmick, Mrs. Richard Henwood, Mrs. James Birdsall, Mrs. Samuel Allen, Mrs. L. O. Grenell, Mrs. William Seaman, Mrs. F. B. Penniman, Mrs. L. Soergel, Mrs. C. F. Young, Mrs. C. S Minor, Mrs. Stephen Torrey, Mrs. Aaron Cummings, Mrs. J. C. Delezenne, Mrs. Patrick McSone.

The society of which these ladies were representative members carried on the movement for the erection of a soldiers' monument indefatigably, and raised money by various means—by subscription, by the holding of fairs and festivals and by the sale of the products of their unwearying fingers. A very large number were interested and active supporters of the project, but there were three who, by common consent, are awarded especial credit for the work that was accomplished. They were Mrs. F. B. Penniman, Mrs. J. C. Gunn and Mrs. J. C. Delezenne.

The corner-stone of the monument was to have been laid September 4, 1866, but as the Council did not decide upon the location, it was deferred until July 4, 1867. On that occasion the late Mrs. Ezra Hurlburt, whose son died in the service, was awarded the honor of breaking the ground. The contract for the monument was entered into with Joseph B. Leach, of Brooklyn, in August, 1868.

The dedication of the monument took place September 9, 1869, Governor John W. Geary being the speaker. Rev. C. S. Dunning presided over the meeting, which was very large. The dedication service was very impressive. A great throng of people were in the streets and the public square and a procession paraded in the afternoon.

The monument thus secured by the patient work of the ladies (at a cost of over five thousand dollars) and dedicated in the presence of a great assemblage by the Governor of the State, is of Quincy granite, is pedestal in form and surmounted by an excellent bronze figure, life-size, of a soldier at parade rest. The height is about fourteen feet. The inscription and names of the fallen soldiers are as follows:

MEMORIAL FOUNTAIN.—The fountain in the public square is a memorial of the national centennial, and, like the soldiers' monument, is the result of woman's work. On the 4th of July, 1876, a society, which had been organized for the purpose of establishing this memorial, inaugurated the movement by securing subscriptions to a fund for the building of the fountain and gave an entertainment for the benefit of the same. Mrs. H. M. Seely was president, Mrs. Robert J. Menner secretary and Miss Carrie Petersen treasurer, while other active members of the society were Mrs. William H. Dimmick, Mrs. J. J. Curtis, Mrs. Bennett, Mrs. Dunning and Miss Anna Wilbur. The work of raising funds was carried on as fast as possible, but with many disadvantages, and the fountain was finally finished and formally delivered to the Town Council on July 4, 1879. It cost about eleven hundred dollars.

THE CELEBRATION OF THE NATIONAL CENTENNIAL.—The one hundredth anniversary of American independence was fittingly observed in Honesdale. The celebration properly began on Sunday evening, July 2, 1876, by a union service of the Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist and Episcopal congregations in the park, the large audience using the platform and seats erected for the 4th. Revs. J. A. Mets, A. J. Van Cleft, E. P. Miller and C. S. Dunning conducted the services, the latter gentleman preaching the sermon, taking for his text Psalm 147 and 20th verse: "He hath not dealt so with any nation." It was a most learned, patriotic and able discourse, and was listened to with marked attention and deep interest by the large numbers in attendance. The entire congregation united in singing "Coronation," "Hold the Fort" and "America," with deep feeling and emotion.

On the 3d preparations were elaborately made for the observance of the following day. Public and private buildings, stores and residences were decorated with evergreens and bunting, and in the evening the citizens generally prepared for illuminating their residences and places of business. At nine in the evening a torch-light procession began its march through the streets, and the night, or the greater portion of it, was given up to various enthusiastic demonstrations.

The morning of the 4th was announced by the firing of the old cannon upon Irving Cliff, and at eight o'clock the national colors were flung to the breeze from a lofty staff, raised the day before on the same height. About the middle of the forenoon a procession began to march the streets. It consisted of various civic and military organizations, a body of soldiers of the late war, several allegorical representations, bands of music, etc., the whole under the marshalship of Colonel Coe Durland.

At the court-house the procession broke ranks, and the exercises of the day were then commenced in the park. The American Hymn was first sung, and prayer was then offered by Presiding Elder L. W. Peck. Hon. E. O. Hamlin read the Declaration of Independence and H. M. Seely, Esq., delivered the oration. Rev. C. S. Dunning pronounced the benediction and the great audience slowly dispersed. A free dinner was provided in the court-house, and, although "a whole ox and four sheep had been roasted, four thousand clams baked" and an immense quantity of other food prepared, the banquet proved insufficient to meet the demand. The ladies of the Methodist Episcopal Church and of the Fountain Memorial Society also served dinners and supplied immense crowds. The remainder of the day and the evening were occupied with various celebrations and festivities, and it was late in the night when the crowd, estimated to be the largest ever assembled in the borough, was wholly dispersed.

Cornelius C. Jadwin is a descendant of Jeremiah Jadwin, who came to America about the year 1683 and located on the peninsula formed by the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays. Jeremiah was accompanied to the colonies by his brothers Joseph and John. Joseph settled in New York, and John settled in Virginia. The line of descent from Jeremiah Jadwin to the subject of this sketch is as follows: 1st, Jeremiah the emigrant; 2d, Robert; 3d, Robert; 4th, John; 5th, Henry B. Jadwin, father of C. C. Jadwin. The first four generations were planters; and Henry B. was the first that chose a different occupation. He left his native State and located in Canaan, Wayne County, Pa., in the year 1830. In 1832 he married Alice G. Plumb, of that place, a daughter of Ezra and Hannah Plumb, from Litchfield County, Conn. Mr. Jadwin moved to Carbondale where he passed the remainder of his life, dying in 1876, at the age of seventy-three. Of his eight children, six are now living,—Orlando H., the oldest son, is a wholesale druggist in New York City; Cornelius C. is a druggist at Honesdale, Pa.; Henry B., Charles P., John S. and Thomas S. are druggists living in Lackawanna County, Pa.

Cornelius C. Jadwin was born at Carbondale, Luzerne (now Lackawanna) County, Pa., March 27, 1835. He attended the public schools of the place until he was twelve years of age, when his father took him from school to assist him at his trade. He worked with his father until he was eighteen years of age. During these six years of labor he spent his spare moments in close study, overcoming obstacles which would have crushed a boy of less natural ability and force of character. At the age of nineteen he was elected a teacher in the Carbondale schools. He was the two hundred and eighty-seventh person examined in Luzerne County, under the new public-school law, by the first county superintendent of that county, and obtained the seventh first-class certificate granted by him. He taught school four years, during which time he and his brothers, Orlando H. and Henry B., purchased a book-store in Carbondale, and added a drug department, which business was conducted under the name and supervision of O. H. Jadwin; here Cornelius C. took his first lessons in theoretical and practical pharmacy. At the age of twenty-three he left the avocation of teaching, and having sold his interest in the drug and book business to his brother, O. H. Jadwin, he entered the employ of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company as a civil engineer, first carrying the axe and chain. At the end of three months he was promoted to the head of a party, and remained in the employ of the company until he took a position as mining engineer with Jones & Co., at Olyphant, Pa. During this time he purchased a half-interest in a contract for furnishing coal to the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, from a mine in Archibald. A general strike took place, and fearing that his venture would not terminate profitably, he sold his interest and returned to Carbondale and took charge of his brother's (O. H. Jadwin) drug-store. May 8, 1862, he and O. H. Jadwin bought the drug business of Purdon & Seely, at Honesdale, Wayne County, Pa., and commenced business under the firm-name of Jadwin & Bro. This store was under the sole supervision of C. C. Jadwin, and continued as a partnership business until November 1883, when C. C. Jadwin purchased his brother's interest and became sole proprietor. In 1869 Mr. Jadwin and S. A. Terrel built the block, on the corner of Eighth and Main Streets, known as the Masonic Hall building, now occupied by them. In 1866 Mr. Jadwin became associated with J. M. Crary, of Liberty, N. Y., now of Hackensack, N. J., in the compounding and sale of Jadwin's Subduing Liniment. Since that time they have compounded and sold several other medical preparations, which, like the liniment, have become celebrated.

In politics, Mr. Jadwin is a consistent Republican, and since 1865 he has been very active and influential in the management of the affairs of the party in Wayne County, having acted for several years as chairman of the County Committee, and having been delegate to the County Conventions, and also representative or Senatorial delegate to State Conventions. Since 1872 he has been a member of the local Board of Education nearly the whole time, and for several years was president of that body. In 1880 he was elected a delegate to the National Convention of the Republican party at Chicago, and the same fall was elected to represent the district composed of Bradford, Susquehanna, Wyoming and Wayne Counties in the Forty-seventh Congress. In Wayne County he ran eight hundred and twenty-eight votes ahead of Garfield for President, receiving eighteeen thousand two hundred and twenty-three votes in the district, against thirteen thousand six hundred and two for Robert A. Packer, Democrat, nine hundred and sixty-six for J. Burrows, Greenback candidate, and two hundred and sixteen for L. Smith, Prohibitionist.

He made a consistent and honorable record in Congress, familiarizing himself promptly and thoroughly with the processes of legislation, zealously guarding the interests of his constituents, writing and replying to about seven thousand letters during his term. He was a member of the committee on the revision of the laws and on war claims. In 1882, by virtue of the traditionary custom of his party, a renomination to Congress was due to Mr. Jadwin, but through the machinations and devices of ambitious members of the party, who lulled his suspicions by assurances of fidelity and the certainty of his renomination, he was defeated, and Colonel Edward Overton, of Bradford County, was nominated. Mr. Jadwin's Wayne County friends bolted this nomination and reconvened their County Convention, and put him in nomination as an Independent candidate. The result was that Mr. Jadwin received 9101 votes, Colonel Overton 5675 and George A. Post, of Susquehanna County, the Democratic candidate, 11,555 votes and was elected. Jadwin received more votes than Overton in Bradford and four times as many as he did in Wyoming, and Overton only had one hundred and twenty votes in Wayne County, where Mr. Jadwin ran one thousand one hundred and two votes ahead of his ticket. This was considered by all his friends a sufficient vindication of his record and a well-deserved rebuke to the unfair methods by which he had been deprived of the nomination.

In 1867 Mr. Jadwin originated the scheme and raised the subscription for the publication of the Honesdale Citizen and was chosen as one of the five managers of the paper, and remained in charge until it passed under the full control of the present editors. He married Lottie E., eldest daughter of Ezekiel G. Wood, of Seelyville, April 7, 1864. He has one son, Edgar Jadwin, who, having received his appointment and passed examination in June, 1886, is now a cadet at West Point, and three daughters,—Louise, Grace and Sophie Jadwin.

Charles Petersen, son of Iven and Johanna D. (Kloker) Petersen, was born at Copenhagen, Denmark, November 15, 1826. Having received a good common-school education, at the age of fourteen he was entered as an apprentice to learn the trade of a watchmaker, with his father. After the death of the latter, November 10, 1843, he completed his apprenticeship with a man named Steinmetz, in Copenhagen, and in 1848 left that place and worked at his trade in Berlin, Prague (in Bohemia) and Vienna. He participated in the Revolution of 1849, at Vienna, and when the government troops took possession of the city, left for Switzerland, where, for two years, he was a pupil of the celebrated Jules Jurgenson. While there, through the instrumentality of his former preceptor, Mr. Steinmetz, he was granted a stipendium by the Danish government to enable him more closely to study the principles of watch-making, in the general interests of the trade.

In 1851 he resolved to seek the shores of the New World, and arrived in New York the same year, bearing letters of introduction to several of the large wholesale houses of that city. He at once received offers of employment from several establishments, but fearing that he would not learn to speak the English language as quickly in the city as in the country, he accepted an offer from Moses Cummings, of Honesdale, Pa., extended through Nichols, Goodwin & Co., and arrived in that place in the fall of 1851. Six months later, in 1852, he proposed either to buy Mr. Cummings out or to start business for himself. His proposition was accepted, and he became the owner of the stock, good-will and fixtures of the establishment, by the payment of seven hundred and fifty dollars. For a few months his brother Herman was in partnership with him, the firm being known as Petersen & Brother, but he subsequently became the sole owner, and has since carried on the watch-making and jewelry business on an extensive scale, on his own account. He erected his present commodious store in 1856.

In 1858 Mr. Petersen became identified with a movement for re-building the old Cornell telegraph line, which sixteen years before had been operated between Carbondale, via Honesdale, to Narrowsburg and New York, and in 1862, by permission of Chief Engineer R. F. Lord, of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, he built the first line that company owned along the canal between Honesdale and Rondout. He afterwards extended the lines along their railroads, and has ever since held the position of superintendent of the Telegraph Department of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, in the Canal Department, and on the Pennsylvania Railroad Division of their railway system.

The Honesdale Bell Telephone Company was organized in August, 1882, under license of the American Bell Telephone Company, of Boston, Mass., the stockholders being J. Merrihew, of Philadelphia, H. L. Storke, of New York, Richard O'Brien, of Scranton, and Mr. Petersen. As superintendent of the company, the latter at once began the erection of the lines. In March, 1883, the plant was transferred to the Hudson River Telephone Company, and is now in successful operation, with fifty-four subscribers, under the management of Mr. Petersen as superintendent.

In addition to his close connection with the business interests of Northeastern Pennsylvania, many years of Grace Episcopal Church, and is held in general respect for his integrity and uprightness of character. He married, at Chaux de Fonde, Switzerland, June 11, 1851, Charlottie A. C. Roth, the offspring of the marriage being Carrie L. A. Petersen, Lottie E. A. Petersen and Ida Maria Petersen, deceased. Of the four brothers of Mr. Petersen, two, Herman A. and Alexis, came to this country, and car-

Mr. Petersen has also occupied a prominent place in official and social life in Honesdale, where he has so long resided. He served one term as chief burgess of the town, and has frequently been a member of the Board of Councilmen. He has been connected with the Masonic order since 1854, as a member of Honesdale Lodge, No. 218, and from December, 1866, acted as treasurer for eleven years of Anthony Wayne Chapter, No. 204, Royal Arch Masons, of Honesdale. He has been a vestryman for ried on a successful jewelry business at Scranton, Pa., until their respective deaths.

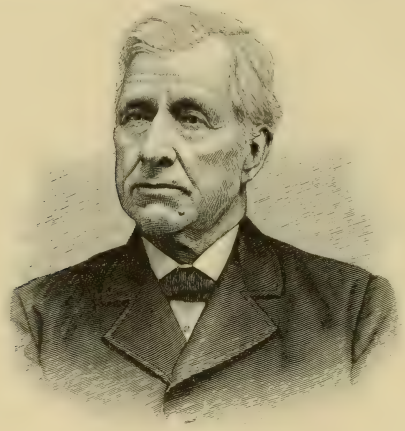
JAIRUS H. DUNNING was born at Danbury, Fairfield Co., Conn., April 28, 1809. His grandfather, Gideon Dunning, was one of the early settlers at Brookfield, in that State. Two other branches of the family settled, one in New York State, the other in New Jersey. His parents were Levi and Hannah (Hoyt) Dunning, the former of whom was by occupation a farmer, and died May 24, 1856, in the eighty-sixth year of his age.



The subject of this sketch enjoyed the benefit of a simple English education, and when about sixteen years of age became apprenticed to White & Keeler, of Danbury Centre, Conn., to learn the trade of a hat finisher. This firm was soon after succeeded by Star Nichols, with whom Mr. Dunning remained until about his twentieth year, when he became a journeyman, and subsequently worked at his trade in various places, chiefly in Danbury and Watertown, Conn. In October, 1832, he engaged in the finishing and sale of hats on his own account at Monticello, Sullivan County, New York, and in April, 1834, removed to Honesdale, Pa., where, in connection with his brother, Rhesa, he organized on May 15, 1834, the firm of J. & R. H. Dunning. The concern erected a small shop on the river for the manufacture of hats, at Honesdale, and in connection therewith established a store for the sale of their goods, in what was known as "Slab Castle," on the present site of the skating-rink. This business connection continued until 1847, when an equitable division of property was made, and Rhesa Dunning withdraw from the firm. Jairus H. Dunning succeeded to the affairs of the firm, and engaged in hat-finishing and store-keeping until about 1870, when he retired from active business. In 1864 he began a series of journeys to the Far West, purchasing furs and robes on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and after having them finished, selling them at his Honesdale store. His principal business at the close of his commercial transactions was the sale and manufacture of hats, caps, furs and robes.

At the time of the writing of this sketch (1885) Mr. Dunning is one of the oldest residents of Honesdale. For more than half a century he has steadily followed his pursuits, not aspiring to public place or position, but so regulating his life and conduct as to command the respect and esteem of a large circle of friends. Soon after his settlement in Honesdale he united with Grace Episcopal Church, and afterwards filled the offices of vestryman and warden, and for nearly thirty years was superintendent of the Sabbath-school. He has always felt a deep interest in all movements calculated to develop and improve the community with which he so early identified himself, and has been one of the most useful and valuable citizens. His first wife was Sarah Bronson, whom he married in 1832. He was united to his present wife, Mrs. Jenett P. Judd, on Nov. 22, 1865.

David Kenner

DAVID KENNER, one of the oldest and best-known residents of Wayne County, was born at Albany, N. Y., January 24, 1812. His parents were Joseph and Rachel (Hollenbeck) Kenner, the former of whom was a native of Kinderhook, N. Y., and by occupation a farmer. In 1816 Joseph Kenner removed from Albany to Cortland County, N. Y., taking his family with him, and resided for the remainder of his life in the town of Homer, in that county. He was an industrious and hard-working man, and reared a large family of children, of whom three only are now living, viz.: Jacob (who lives at Homer, N. Y.), Elizabeth (widow of Abraham Neff, of Springfield, Wis.) and David (to whom this sketch is chiefly dedicated).

The latter was raised upon his father's farm, and received only the meagre education generally attainable by a farmer's son at that early period. At the age of seventeen he purchased his time from his father, as was the wont in those days, and entered the employ of William Walter, a farmer in his neighborhood, for whom he had worked more or less for several years previously. He subsequently worked on the farm of Dr. Jones, in the same locality, and upon attaining his majority went to Syracuse, N. Y., where he clerked for Elihu Walter, then doing business as a tallow-chandler. At the expiration of a year he entered the hardware store of Elam

Lyons & Sons, of the same city, where he remained about a year. Soon after he removed to Wilkes-Barre, Pa., where he drove the stage between that place and Tunkhannock, for Miller Horton. In August, 1834, he married Emma, daughter of Daniel Weddeman, of Providence Luzerne County, and again resumed stage-driving, this time between Providence and Milford, a distance of some sixty-three miles. In the summer of 1835 he bought grain for Daniel Searles, of Montrose, and in the winter the same year engaged in lumbering, at Lennox, Susquehanna County, for William Hartley. In the spring of 1836 he removed to Carbondale, Pa., where he entered the employ of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, and where he remained for four years. In the spring of 1840 he settled at Honesdale, Pa., where he was furnished two canal-boats by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, which he ran himself for one year between Honesdale and Rondout, N. Y. He afterwards kept the boats running, but himself worked the borough road of Honesdale. For a number of years prior to the building and corporation of the Erie Railway Mr. Kenner operated a freight line between Honesdale and New York, having a number of teams on the road, and, after the completion of the road to Goshen, N. Y., he operated the same line between that point and Honesdale. In this connection he often purchased goods for others, acting as agent, and collecting money frequently. In 1843 he purchased a farm of one hundred acres in Cherry Ridge township, of Asher Woodward, John Harvey and the widow Pern, and located thereon. There he continued to reside for thirty-three years, during which period he not only engaged in farming, but, with a certain restless activity which has characterized his entire life, occupied himself with other affairs.

When the Erie Railroad was being built, in 1847, he furnished beef to the company for their employés from a point below Narrowsburg to Calicorn. He also furnished food supplies to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at Hawley, in 1848 and 1849. He dealt largely in pork, as the partner and agent of farmers in his old home in Cortland County, and bought and sold stock and horses in large numbers, as well as buying wool for Birdsall Brothers, woolen manufacturers, of Seelyville, during the late Civil War.

In the spring of 1876 Mr. Kenner took up his residence in Honesdale, where he now lives. He sold his farm in 1878 to John and William Blake, the later of whom now occupies it. His chief occupation in 1885 is investing money and looking after his other varied interests. He has never aspired to public office, but has filled various township offices, and for three years served as collector of Cherry Ridge township. He has been a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Honesdale since about 1860, and associated in its erection, but is liberally inclined toward other denominations, and is a contributor to the support of the Methodist Episcopal Society of that place. He contributes freely, yet not ostentatiously, to the poor and distressed, and is a supporter of all worthy agencies for the development of the community. His life has been an active, energetic and successful one, and illustrates in a forcible degree the possibilities of advancement in our American society to those who, though of humble origin, are endowed by nature with the energy and capabilities necessary for success.

Mr. Kenner's first wife died December 26, 1883. He was united to his present wife, Miss Ellen, daughter of William and Henrietta (Kizer) Spangenberg, of Lake township, on January 1, 1885.

CHAPTER XI.

DAMASCUS TOWNSHIP.

THE peaceful hills of Damascus township slope gently to the southeast, furrowed by many a shining brooklet that empties its clear waters into the Delaware, which river forms the eastern boundary of the township. Manchester lies to the north, Berlin south, and westward are Lebanon, Oregon and Berlin, all of them born of its ample area. At the village of Damascus, Cash's Creek, one of the principal streams, empties into the Delaware, while three miles below, at Milanville, Calkins' Creek makes its débouché. Hollister's Creek drains the northeastern portion of the township, and the lesser streams are tributaries to one of these three affluents.

The natural ponds are Duck Harbor, which is partly in Lebanon, Laurel Lake, Cline, Swago, Gorham and a number of smaller ponds. Most of the land is rolling, arable and with soil of good quality, and as there are few very high hills, it is easily cultivated. The least productive portions are a portion of a hill in the northeastern end, called Conklin Hill, and a strip commencing below Milanville, and stretching southward to Big Eddy, on the Delaware.

At the time of its establishment, when Wayne County was set off from Northampton, in 1798, Damascus included all the territory now embraced in the townships of Lebanon, Oregon and parts of both Dyberry and Berlin. It was then the largest township erected, and, in spite of subsequent excisions, remains so to-day.

As it is territorially the most important, so its history is more interesting than that of sister townships, since along its eastern limits were made the first settlements in the county, and its pioneers were the vanguard of the Connecticut civilization, which, while acting as a menace to the tranquil rule of the proprietary government, and entailing animosities that were not unattended with bitterness, cruelty and hardship, was an important factor in opening up the rich and fertile fields of Northeastern Pennsylvania. A broad and comprehensive view of the early events and their synchronological relation to the settlement of adjacent regions has been given in the preceding chapters, where also some of the detailed history prior to the erection of Wayne County has been necessarily referred to. In the present chapter, which is designed to be more specific, a grave obstacle to connected narration is met in the obscurity of many early dates, of which there remains no record. The actors in the early scenes have been dead many years, and left behind them only foggy tradition and fragmentary family records that are limited and contradictory. So far as possible, personal recollection has been supplemented by corroborative evidence from public records, but in spite of much labor, few of the family histories are as complete as the writer desired to have them.

Although there is no authentic account of any settlement at Cushutunk before that of the Delaware Company, in 1757, a tradition among the descendants of Moses Thomas has it that he located on the Thomas farm as early as 1750, and was engaged as an Indian trader. Thomas was an Englishman of pluck and enterprise, and afterwards became one of the leading spirits of the settlement. From what little is shown of his character by his after-history, he seems to have been possessed of those qualities of hardihood and adventure that might have prompted him to seek this remote outpost of colonial civilization independently; it is quite probable he was in Cushutunk as early, if not earlier, than the settlers of whom there is more definite record. A manuscript written by Nathan Skinner, giving a history of the Skinner family, contains the most that is known concerning the detailed history of the settlement. From this it appears that Daniel Skinner, the father of the author, was born at Preston, Windham County, Conn., and was one of eight brothers and sisters, children of Joseph Skinner. These were Benjamin, Timothy, John, Abner, Haggai, Calvin, Joseph, Martha and Hulda. The manuscript then goes on to say: "At exactly what time Daniel Skinner came to Damascus we are at present unable to say, but we find from a certain writing that he was at the place where George Bush afterward resided, then called the 'Ackhake place,' on the 4th of September, 1755. His father was one of the twelve hundred Yankees that made the great Indian purchase of July 11th, 1754, and under this purchase and another under a section of the colony of East New Jersey, the Skinner family came into the country to seek their fortunes and make settlements.

"Daniel bought of his father twenty-five acres of the Ackhake place, for which he paid five pounds, current money of the Province of New York, September 11th, 1755. He also assisted in laying out a town, the centre of which was about six miles from the river, near where John Barnes now lives on the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike, and in selecting a location for a meeting-house, and a lot for the minister, William Rice was, I presume, the surveyor. After this Daniel Skinner made his home principally at the Ackhake place until after his father was killed.[1]

"Buckskin shirts and checked flannel shirts were altogether the fashion in these days, and, as the skins could be had very cheap from the Indians where he resided, and the flannel of the Yankees where he came from, he became a peddler of these articles throughout the settled parts of Pennsylvania and New York, and formed an acquaintance with most of the inhabitants of both States.

"After his father was killed, and his step-mother had returned to her residence in Connecticut, which was, I presume, about the year 1759, he took up his residence in Newton, Sussex County, New Jersey. This appears from an old deed of Timothy Wints, of Canterbury, to Daniel Skinner, of Newton, Sussex County, New Jersey, for half a right in the Delaware Purchase, for which he paid four pounds sterling. This is dated January 2, 1760. On the 20th of February, in the same year, he paid Alpheus Gustin, one of the proprietors, five pounds for one-fourth of a right in the Delaware purchase, lying on both sides of the river, 'one hundred acres thereof being in the middle township.' On the 26th of the following July he paid forty pounds to Benjamin Skinner, of Newton, Sussex County, New Jersey, for a half-right in the Susquehanna purchase, which right Benjamin bought of Joseph Skinner, one of the proprietors.

"This year (1760) he became a sailor, and made a voyage to several of the West India islands; on his return, March 1st, 1761, he married a widow by the name of Richardson, who had one daughter, Phœbe, by her first husband, and at this time about seven years old. He then moved to a place called Munbrocken Stude, and after remaining there about eight months, went to New Windsor. Early in the spring of 1763 we find him on the same Ackhake place where his father had settled. It was this year that he made his first experiments in rafting. While he had been a sailor he learned the value of pine for masts and spars, and about this time conceived the plan of running some spars down the Delaware to Philadelphia. He had a quantity of excellent timber on his place, and he got out and put into the river a number of sticks suitable for ship-masts. These he put adrift, following them with a canoe, but they soon ran aground on some rocky islands in the channel, and he had to abandon this method and return home. Notwithstanding his failure he persevered, and with much labor got into the river six large masts of equal length, through the ends of which he cut a mortise about four inches square, into which was fitted what was termed a spindle of white oak. In the ends of these, pins were driven, to keep them from slipping, and the timber thus fastened together he called a raft. To each end of it he pinned a small log, crosswise, and into the middle of this drove a perpendicular pin about ten inches long, on which the oars were hung, and being thus rigged, he hired a very tall Dutchman to go with him as fore-hand. He arrived safely at Philadelphia with this raft, and sold it to the mast-makers with good profit. This was the first raft ever navigated on the waters of the Delaware River, and was about the year 1764. Shortly afterward he made a larger raft, on which Josiah Parks went as fore-hand, and in consequence of the success that attended both ventures, others soon embarked in the same business, and, after a time, rafting became general from the Cook House (Deposit) to Philadelphia. Daniel Skinner, having constructed the first raft, was styled 'Lord High Admiral' of all of the raftsmen on the Delaware, and Josiah Parks was named

[1] The reasons for the murder of Joseph Skinner are not apparent. The Connecticut title came from the Iroquois, while the New York proprietors had bought of the natives of the region. Shortly after Mr. Skinner brought his family to Cushutunk, accompanied by others of the settlers, he went to the confederated tribes to make some amicable adjustment of the differences, and on his way back was killed by some unknown person. As he did not return to the settlement his wife, concluding that he had been murdered, went back to her old home in Preston. Subsequently his body was found, where he had been shot on the banks of a small stream, just above the residence of Hon. James C. Curtis, and was identified by a prayer-book, on the fly-leaf of which his name was written.

'boatswain.' These honorary titles they retained during their lives."

Even in this sparse settlement, numbering scarce a score of souls, we find that jealousy and greed played their parts, and came near driving the pioneer raftsman and his family from the river. The manuscript relates that in the spring of 1767, Nathaniel Evans, Abraham Ross and Phineas Clark lived in a house on the site of that which Judge Tyler afterward built for his son, and Skinner lived on the flat about eighty rods from where George Bush now lives. Evans, Ross and Clark conspired to unite and drive Skinner out of the country, so they could have the whole flat to themselves, and the right of cutting and rafting the timber that grew upon it. Skinner had his brother Haggai living with him, and as both were resolute men who would not give up their rights without a struggle, anxious as they were for a monopoly of the flat, the conspirators feared to put their plans into execution. The feeling against Skinner and his family was shared by the wives of his rivals, and, from subsequent events, it seems that the women were the strongest advocates of summary ejection vis et arma. They dared attempt what their spouses lacked courage to venture, and, taking advantage of a time when the men had all gone rafting, indulged in a purely feminine struggle, of which the family chronicler has given an account not only quaint and amusing, but virile with a touch of human nature that is internal evidence of its fidelity to the eventful life of the early days.

"It was one pleasant afternoon in May," he records, "when all nature was bright and smiling, that an attempt at dispossession was made by these ladies, whom I shall designate by the titles by which they were known in after-years. Aunt Sarah was Nat Evans' wife; Aunt Hulda that of Abraham Ross; and Mrs. Clark the wife of Phineas Clark. These notable and economical wives, lamenting the want of courage in their husbands, held a consultation to consider how they might drive Skinner from the country, and have the whole flat and the privilege of rafting the lofty pines thereon to themselves, and thus it came about that Aunt Hulda said to her companions, 'If the Skinners can be driven off, we can move into their house; Ross and Evans will help Clark, and they will soon put up a house for you at the end of the flat.'

"'Yes,' said Mrs. Clark, 'All very good, but here we are fretting about the inactivity of our husbands, when we have the power to put ourselves in possession without their assistance. We are all stout women, and Skinner's wife, you know, is a little bit of a thing, and Phœbe but a child. If I am not mistaken, they are both very cowardly, and all we have to do is to put their things out and ours in. If they resist, I will hold Mrs. Skinner. Once in, we will have full possession.'

"The business was accomplished in their own estimation, and accordingly, without further delay, they went to work to put the scheme into execution. When they came to the house they found Phœbe with the three children,—Reuben, about five; Daniel, three; and Lillie, an infant of two months old. Mrs. Skinner had gone a short distance on some errand. Finding the premises in this favorable condition, they anticipated no resistance and fancied themselves already in possession of the coveted acquisition. But alas! how deceptive are human efforts, founded on our own calculations. They did not know that they were fishing for a tartar. ('Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine vain things?'—Psalm ii. 1. 'Because the people's hearts are waxed gross and their ears are dull of hearing and their eyes have they closed, lest at any time they should see with their eyes and hear with their ears and understand with their hearts'—Mat. xiii. 15.) Before I can convey any adequate idea of this affair, it is necessary to describe the character of those who are about to engage in one of the greatest conflicts ever recorded.

"Aunt Hulda and Aunt Sarah were sisters of Uncle Moses Thomas, who was killed at the famous battle of Lackawaxen, and daughters of Moses Thomas, who was killed by the Indians at Cochecton, in November, 1762. At this time Aunt Hulda lived in the block-house with her father and mother. Her father went out to look for the Indians at the same time the Indians were looking for him, and they shot him and another man by the name of Willis, at the mouth of the brook, so that Aunt Hulda and a sister then about seven years old, who, in process of time became Aunt Hannah, had to supply the places of two men and hold their muskets in the loop-holes to defend the fort. It was thus they became warriors ;[1] Aunt Sarah and Mrs. Clark were stout women and both noted for their Amazonian character. But, 'the battle is not to the strong, nor the race to the swift.' Skinner's wife was a small women, very quick in motion, sprightly and determined. When her temper was up she feared nothing. Her mother died when she was a child, and being very poor, she was brought up in the family of a physician. Her father went into the army against the French, and was killed at Cape Breton in May, 1745. She remained with the doctor until she was between fourteen and fifteen years old, and was always so employed as to keep her faculties, both corporeal and mental, in active operation, so that she was prepared to take her own part. She was said to be very beautiful, and in consequence had many admirers. She finally married a man by the name of Richardson, and bare him a daughter called Phœbe. About 1755 Richardson went into the army and was killed at Braddock's defeat. After this his widow lived with a married sister until March 11, 1761, when she became the wife of Daniel Skinner.

"Now that I have described the champions whose process decided the fate of St. Tammany

[1] From the account given by Quinlan in "Tom Quick," there seem to have been but three men in the neighborhood at this time. They were Moses Thomas (1st), Hilkiah Willis and a man named Witters, to whose care a large number of women and children had been committed. The block-house, which stood but a few feet from the river, was well supplied with arms and ammunition, and had it been stocked with provision, a small garrison could have bidden defiance to the savages. There had been some reports of hostile Indians, but it was not supposed they were near, and in the morning Willis directed his two sons to go to his farm and winnow some buckwheat which had been thrashed the day before. The lads complied rather unwillingly, and soon returned and reported the approach of the savages. Supposing it was only a ruse to avoid the task to which they had been set, Willis and his companions at first paid little attention to their story ; but the boys were so vehement in their protestations, that at last the three men went out to reconnoiter, while the women and children retreated to the block-house. Thomas and his two companions proceeded rather incautiously down the river about half a mile, when they came upon the Indians, who were in a turnip patch. As the scouts came over a slight rise above the patch, the marauders caught sight of them and immediately fired. Thomas was killed instantly and Willis fell badly wounded. Witters escaped and fled to the block-house, where the women had fled in great excitement on hearing the firing. Witters knew that the fate of the women and children depended upon his sagacity and courage, and realized that it would be impossible for him to cope with the foe unless he could keep them at bay until assistance arrived. He at once dispatched Moses Thomas (2d), then but a little lad, to warn the settlers above the block-house of the impending danger and ask their immediate aid. The boy, fleet of foot, reached his destination in safety, but found that the alarm had preceded him. The settlers had heard the guns of the Indians and sought safety in the woods, making the best of their way toward Esopus. Meanwhile, Witters rallied the women, and when the Indians came to the block-house, a musket protruded from every loop-hole, while the single brave man in the little stockade gave orders in a loud military tone to an imaginary force of soldiery. He gave orders to shoot every Indian that approached the fort, and by his capital mimicry awed the savages into the belief that the garrison was a strong one, and intended to defend the block-house to the last extremity. The Indians cowered under the cover of a green bank, and challenged the garrison to come out and fight in open field, but received in reply only scornful laughter and an occasional telling shot from Witter's unfailing rifle. Thus the deception was kept up until near evening, the Indians having determined upon a regular siege. A new source of uneasiness then presented itself to the gallant Witters. A quantity of hay had been carelessly left quite near the block-house, and he became convinced that the savages would take advantage of the darkness to fire it, and burn out what they supposed to be a strong force. In this he was not mistaken, for about dusk he noticed an Indian stealthily crawling toward the hay. Witters gave a signal, which he had previously arranged with the women, and every gun in the block-house sent a broadside, and the brave sprang to his feet with a yell of pain and fell dead. This so intimidated the besiegers that they recovered the body of their companion, and after hastily interring it, retreated toward Calkins' Creek. Elias Thomas (2d), and Jacob Denny, two lads under eleven years of age, had been sent to Minisink to ask aid, and a party of soldiers was sent to the rescue. When they arrived at the block-house, it was found that the canoes which had brought them would not accommodate all the rescued party and that one must be left behind. Among the party was a women who had an idiot child, and the soldiers decided that the girl should be the one to remain. In vain did the poor mother plead to be left with her unfortunate child. She was not allowed this consolation, but was forced into the canoe, where she hid her face in her hands to screen the sight of the deserted one and drown its inarticulate cries of woe with her own moans.

Flats, we will return to the field of battle. Phœbe was about thirteen years old at this time, a stout girl, possessed of some of her mother's spunk. As the besiegers advanced, Aunt Hulda carried out some of the things; Phœbe carried them back. Aunt Hulda throws out others, and when Phœbe attempts to restore them to their places, Mrs. Clark attempts to hold her, but Phœbe, by a trip of the foot which she had learned of the Yankee boys, brought her heavily to the floor, catching her by the hair, commenced to wring her neck, as she has seen them do that of a fowl. This treatment, together with the fall, so far disabled Mrs. Clark that she seemed quite lifeless. At this stage of the proceedings Mrs. Skinner arrived, and seeing Phœbe thus engaged, ran to take her off her prostrate adversary; but Aunt Hulda, supposing Mrs. Skinner intended to fight, knocked her down with a stone, cutting a free-flowing gash in her head, and then, catching her by the hair, called upon Aunt Sarah for help. Phœbe, who had by this time rendered her opponent harmless, sprang to her mother's assistance, and was immediately attacked by Aunt Sarah.

"Now the battle commenced in earnest, each having a single opponent. I shall not tell of their many collisions; suffice it that the belligerents were soon without caps or hair. There is no knowing how long this fight would have continued, nor what would have been the result of it, had it not so happened that where Skinner's wife was engaged there was a small pail of ashes, which she thought might staunch her bleeding head. She grasped a handful for this purpose, but, instead of applying it to her head, she crammed it into the mouth and eyes of Aunt Hulda, and, perceiving the effect, she instantly repeated the dose. Now, as her mouth and eyes were well charged with this substance, Aunt Hulda could neither see nor scold, and was, of course, entirely unqualified to continue the conflict. As soon as possible she made her escape in search of water, leaving Mrs. Skinner to turn her attention to Phœbe and Sarah, who were both exhausted by this time and had come to an armistice till they could get their breaths. Mrs. Clark, too, had recovered and came forward suing for peace. Shortly afterward Aunt Hulda returned from the river, where she had been to wash the ashes out of her eyes, and all sat down to talk over the matter and arrange the preliminaries of peace. Each lamented that she had lost her cap and hair, and each consoled herself that the others had equally lost. Greed and revenge were both cooled down and reason once more assumed dominion, each party having found by experience that there was no pleasure in having the hair pulled, and that they who pull hair must expect to have hair pulled in return. ('With what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you again.'—Matt. vii. 2. 'He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity.'—Rev. xiii. 10. 'For all that take the sword shall perish by the sword.'—Mat. xxvi. 52). Under these considerations none were anxious to renew the fight. All were losing precious blood from the ends of their nasal organs, and the wound on Mrs. Skinner's head was still bleeding profusely. What a subject for a painter! Five respectable ladies, all without caps, bald-headed, their clothes in tatters and covered with blood and dust! Thus they sat for a few minutes, gazing ruefully upon themselves and on one another, and then, with one accord, they went to the river and applied the waters of the Delaware, not to wash away their sins after repentance, but to remove the grime from their faces and stanch the crimson rivulets that still trickled from their cuts and wounds. While thus employed, the besieging ladies explained their object in the attack, their prospects and motives had it succeeded, and, acknowledging their wrong, prayed for forgiveness and promised reformation. On this Mrs. Skinner sent Phœbe, who had suffered least by the conflict, to the house with orders to put on the tea-kettle, bake a Johnny-cake, boil some potatoes, roast some dried eels and cut up some jerk. This she accomplished in due season and the meal was placed upon the table, around which these ladies seated themselves and partook of the dainties with cheerfulness and harmony. The attacking party exonerated themselves as best they could, throwing the blame on their neighbors, A. B. and C., and entered into a covenant of friendship that was never afterward violated. Aunt Sarah and Mrs. Skinner lived within half a mile of each other for many years and always in perpetual harmony."

From a document still on file in Northampton County, it appears that a warrant was issued by William Allen, dated June 4, 1761, directing the sheriff to arrest Daniel Skinner, Timothy Skinner, Simeon Calkins, John Smith, Jedidiah Willis, James Adams, Irion Adams and others for intruding upon the Indian lands about Cochecton without leave. This, I imagine, was the reason that prevented Skinner from moving to Cochecton immediately after he was married. On Christmas day, 1771, many of the inhabitants collected at the house of Nicholas Conklin, where they met a number of Indians, among whom was a Tuscarora chief, called Captain John. This Indian had become troublesome in consequence of drinking too much rum, and was flourishing a knife, with which he had already gashed the arm of one man. Daniel Skinner and his brother, Haggai, were present, and, turning to the latter, Captain John ordered him to give him another drink. This he refused to do, and Daniel Skinner told the Indian he had already had too much. At this the Indian stepped forward to Skinner and struck at him. Skinner, warding off the blow with one hand, knocked down his assailant with the other, and, after having secured the knife, held him until a cope was procured, and he was tied so as to prevent further mischief. This soon sobered him, and when he was liberated he was very friendly, expressing his gratitude to Skinner for preventing him from doing any more mischief and offering to pay for what he had done. He laid all the trouble to the rum he had been foolishly drinking, and, taking Skinner by the hand, told him he would always respect him and remember him as a special friend, because he had refused to give him rum. Thus the affray was ended; pale face and red man were on amicable terms and it was supposed by all present that such was to be the end of the affair. Such would have been the case had there been none of those littled-souled animals in the neighborhood,

"Who pine to hear the voice of truth proclaim
A neighbor's virtue, or another's fame."

Whenever the transaction was afterwards mentioned, Skinner was applauded, especially by the Indians, who always spoke in his praise and said he was the greatest and best man in Cochecton. Some time in May, 1772, however, he received the following in a letter from James Welsh, in Upper Smithfield:

"Easton, 17 April, 1772.

"Mr. James Welsh:

"Inclosed you will receive a Warrent against Daniel and Hagga Skinner For beating and wounding several Indian Cheafs of the Oneida, Tuskarora and Mohickan Indians, which in its consequences may involve the provence in a bloody ware with those Indians unless the aforesaid Daniel and Hagga Skinner are brought to condine punishment: according to law: You are commanded to procede to Coshethton taking with you a sufficient strength and bring them before me to answer for their miss conduct and irregular proceedings And this you are by no means to neglect or Fail at your peril And I do Further require that you will execute the said Warrent within the space of Forteen days From the time you receive it and make returns of your doing therein after its execution to me without delay it being by the express orders of the Governor and Council.

"Your humble Sert.

"Lewis Gordon.

"Mr. James Welsh, constable in Upper Smithfield."

This same letter directed him to bring Nat. Evans[1] without fail. This was a difficult task, as there was no authority within forty or fifty miles, and Skinner knew that Evans, having been the cause of the trouble, would not go willingly. Now, Evans, having discovered what he supposed to be a valuable mine, Skinner agreed with a blacksmith by the name of Cooley to try Evans' ore. According to the plan, Evans was to fetch his ore in the night and work the bellows, while Cooley attended to the fire, in order to get a sufficient heat to do the melting. This was carried out, and while they were thus employed, Skinner and his brother, Haggai, rushed in upon Evans, and, with the assistance of Cooley, bound him, put him into a canoe and started down the river in search of a justice of the peace. The next day they found Abraham

After obtaining this deposition they let Evans go, and proceeded to Easton, having previously obtained the following letter of recommendation:

"To All Whom it May Concerne:

"Know ye that Daniel Skinner whome is complained of For abusing the Indians did settle with said Indians last winter before that any complaint was made to the Cheafs as can be easily proved by the Indians themselves and others and the Indians is free and willing that he should stay and improve his land as he has done before and it is something likely it was out of some ill will that the Complaint was made against Daniel Skiuner and his brother Hagga as consequently it will appear and as for the quarrel that hapened on Christmas day the said Skinners were peacable together and some other people at Nicholas Conklin's when the Indians themselves was something in liquor and began with said Skinner for to give them some Rum and said Skinner would not and the Indian was out of humor and struck said Skinner and the said Skinner struck said Indian back again and it came to some head the Indian stabed one man and after the Indian came to himself he acknowledged he was in the wrong and said he would make satisfaction For the damage he had done and would not have ben any more noise about it if it had not ben for Nathaniel Evons as the Indians say This we can attest to Coshethton May 10 1772. "When Skinner arrived at Easton and presented himself and his papers to the proper authorities, he found no one to prosecute the complaint, and, of course, was honorably discharged. He returned to pursue his business as before, but soon discovered that his family would not be safe at Cochecton, and, being discouraged in many efforts to obtain a permanent title, he concluded to quit the country and try his fortune in some other place. His brothers, Timothy and Abner, had purchased land from Henry Wisner, of Goshen, called the Shungank Kill Meadows, their titles dating from December 13, 1767, and during the six years they had lived there, the title had not been disputed. As Wisner had in the same tract about seven hundred acres unsold, he (Skinner) purchased it for £300 lawful money of New York. This deed is dated June 15, 1773, at which time Skinner's family were living on the premises of his brother Timothy, having moved from Cochecton some time in the latter part of November, 1772. The cause of his leaving Cochecton was as follows:

"About the year 1770 he concluded to take a title from Pennsylvania, and accordingly got a survey of one hundred and forty acres of land, and petitioned to the Governor to give him a grant for the same. This was opposed by James Hayes, who was what was then called a 'land jobber,'—that is one whose business it is to find a tract of land and make out a description stating where the vacant land could be found; this was called locating. Skinner having had his land surveyed under the Yankee title, it was not difficult for Hayes to locate it, and as there were many who wanted the same location, it would sell for a large sum. Under these considerations, Hayes opposed the grant to Skinner, and in order to sustain his position, made some false statements relating to Skinner's character. The Governor and Council inquired into these, and ascertaining their falsity, gave Skinner a patent dated May 3, 1775.

"While he had lived in Shawangunk his daughter Phœbe became the wife of Garshim Smith, and immediately after receiving the patent, accompanied by Smith and his wife, Skinner returned to Cochecton. Smith was a carpenter, and went with him to build the house. Skinner united with Bezaleel Tyler and bought the Hollister place. They built a saw-mill on Hollister Creek, and he put up his new house, into which he calculated to move his family about the 1st of May, 1777, or as soon as his wife should be sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigue of the journey, she having been put to bed on the 4th of April. About this time the Committee of Safety, pursuant to complaint made by the people that had moved from Cochecton, sent their mandate to a number of the inhabitants to appear and show cause why they should not be imprisoned. . . . This was some time in April, 1777, and among those who were summoned were Francis Little, Robert Land and Bryant Kane.[1] Kane, anticipating that he would sent to jail, kept out of the way, but Little and his family and Land and his wife appeared to answer. Nicholas Conklin was called as a witness against Land. Mrs. Land shook her fist in his face, and called him a number of opprobrious epithets, but notwithstanding her tirade, Land was condemned to prison, but he eluded the vigilance of his captors and made his escape. Mrs. Land learned that a scouting-party was to come up the river shortly, and hurried home, took her infant, then about three months old, and with her eldest son, then about nineteen, drove their cattle into the woods to keep them out of the way of the scouts, and did not return until the next day. During the night Kane's family was killed and that of Land visited by the Indians, who came up while all the occupants were asleep. At Land's house were two young women,—Phœbe, about thirteen, and Rebecca, about fifteen,—and two boys,—Robert and Abel, the latter about seventeen. The Indians came to the house about daylight, and going to the bed where the girls were sleeping, waked them by tickling the soles of their feet with the point of a spear. Captain John, a chief of the Tuscaroras, who has before been referred to, was in the habit of visiting their house, and was quite friendly. The youngest girl, supposing he was their visitor, held out her hand and said, 'How do you do, Captain John.' The Indian asked her if she knew Captain John, and she told him she did, but that now she saw she was mistaken. He said they were Mohawks, and that they had come to drive the people from the country, but that she might put on her clothes and go as soon as possible and warn the people, that they might not all be killed. Accordingly, she crossed the river and went first to Bryant Kane's and found them all dead except one little girl, who, still living, was wallowing in her blood in a clump of bushes where she had been scalped. Seeing this, she ran up the river to Mitchell's and gave the alarm, and then returned home. Meanwhile the Indians had bound her brother Abel and taken him with them, without doing any other mischief. They went up Calkins' Creek and were there met by a party of Cochecton Indians, who were friends of the whites and also to the cause of liberty. These used all their endeavors to bring Abel back with them, but not succeeding, they left him after inquiring what had been done, and being told that the Indians had a woman, some children and a very tall man.

[1] A short time before the breaking out of the Revolution, Bryant Kane made a contract for a farm on the east bank of the Delaware, near the Cochecton Falls—the same premises afterward occupied by Charles Young. Above him was the house of Nicholas Conklin, and Robert Land lived opposite. Land and Kane were both Tories. When summoned, Kane sought safety among the Indians, and afterward participated in their atrocities. Quinlan thinks he was the same person as the Barney Kane mentioned in Stone's "Life of Brant."

"The friendly Indians at once hastened to the river to confirm this report, and arrived at Land's house just as Mrs. Land and her son John returned. The latter, with the friendly Indians and what whites and other Indians he could muster, started in immediate pursuit, and overtook the maurauders at Ough Quagua, where both sides formed in battle array. A talk was called for, and by mutual consent the gun-muzzles were dropped. After considerable wrangling, it was agreed that Abel should go back, but that he should first run the gauntlet. This he did with a speed that astonished every one present. He did not receive more than half a dozen blows, and none of them were severe. The pursuing party then returned to Cochecton. As soon as the Skinners heard of the murder of Kane's family, and the capture of Abel Land, they crossed the river, and took refuge in the woods, where they were afterwards joined by the wife and children of Nathaniel Evans. All of them remained here until matters became more settled.

"About this time some of the inhabitants left the country and a few remained. Joseph Ross was commissioned by Colonel Hooper to take charge of the Indians, whose chief was called Minnotto, and these, together with the whites, concluded that, as the affairs of the Government then existed, there could be no place of greater safety for them than at Cochecton. They made an agreement of mutual protection, the Indians agreeing to watch the movements of unfriendly tribes, in consideration for which the whites were to assist the Indians in case of an attack on them. Relying on the security of this arrangement, the whites went on with their farming, feeling safe in their remoteness from the seat of war and their poverty. But as their crops matured, the delusion was dispelled, and they found that they became 'dangerous to the cause of liberty.' Robert Land, who had been a colonial justice of the peace, had escaped, as has been before narrated. Francis Little was set at liberty on parole. Solomon Decker, John Lassley, Grashon Smith and Daniel Skinner had fled for safety to a more settled part of the country. The crops they had left behind them were growing and bid fair for a beautiful harvest. There was at this time living in a place called New Tammany, one of the old settlers at Cochecton, named Bezaleel Tyler, called Captain Mush by the Indians. This man assumed to himself the title of captain, and having extensive connections all like him in indigent circumstances, to whom the stock of provisions accumulating about Cochecton would be a great acquisition, he found no difficulty in persuading them to join his command. These, together with others, had the sanction of the Committee of Safety at Paupack, from whence they marched for Cochecton on an old Indian path, until they came to the mouth of Ten-Mile River, where it does not appear they did any mischief. From that point they murdered, burned and plundered all that came in their way without opposition, until they came in sight of Big Island, where they discovered a party retreating before them, from which one man on horseback rode directly towards them, calling to them not to shoot, as he was one of the Minnotto's men. His name was Handy,[1] and he was well known to most of the company, and especially to Captain Mush, who shot him down as soon as he was within range, took his horse and left him where he fell. With the horse he overtook Nathan Mitchell, in the Benekill, a little above the lower point of Big Island, and made him a prisoner. He was in full Indian dress.[2] The rest of the [1] Handy lived in Cochecton before the war; he had been disappointed in a love-affair, and to prevent a repetition of his sorrows, had emasculated himself. He was a poor outcast, and half-witted, and spent most of his time riding about and imagining he was a man of some consequence. Quinlan, in his "History of Sullivan County," states that Handy was riding a stolen horse, the property of a Whig of Mamakating, at the time he was killed, and that the animal was recognized by some one of the company, and his fate was sealed.

[2] Mitchell had remained at Cochecton because his wife would not go away without her father, whose friendship for the revolting colonies was suspected. Mitchell was disguised as an Indian, to escape being fired upon by the savages lurking about the bush.

company continued to retreat across the island and then across the river to Skinner's Flat, from the upper end of which they passed to Ross' and made a stand. Tyler's company pursued as far as Skinner's house, and then making a stand, sent forward a small party to ascertain how many Indians there were at Ross'. The latter called over to the Indians, and in reply received a message to the effect that there were enough to give Captain Mush a good reception. When this was reported, it was concluded that it would not be safe to advance any farther, so after plundering Skinner's house, and hiding what they could not conveniently carry away, the scouts set fire to it and retreated to the river.

"When they came to Big Eddy, they discovered John Land and a man by the name of Davis coming up the river in a canoe. They had been to Ten-Mile River to mill. Captain Tyler and most of his company being well acquainted with these men, called to them, saying that they wanted to inquire about the capture and recapture of Land's brother Abel. They declared most solemnly that they would do no harm; but Davis was suspicious of their intention and at first declined going over. There were in the company a number of young men who had been mates with Land, and who, as he supposed, were on friendly terms with him, knowing no reason why they should be otherwise. He had not seen them for a long time and was anxious to talk over the affairs of their former friendship. Among them were John Conkling, William Tyler and Joseph Thomas, most of them about his own age. Captain Tyler, Moses Thomas and most of the others had belonged to the same neighborhood, and so, after considerable persuasion on the part of Land, Davis consented and they went over to the company. As soon as they were on shore they were seized, and their hands were tied behind their backs. They remonstrated, and reminded them of the treachery, and of the promises they were breaking. John Conklin answered by saying that "There was policy in war," and Moses Thomas by cocking his gun and putting it to John Land's breast, and saying that he would shoot him if he could obtain the leave. Land was very stubborn, but Davis was humble, and plead earnestly that he might be permitted to see his wife and little boy once more, stating that their whole dependence was on him, and that the grist in the canoe was all they had; that if they took this, and carried him to jail, his family would inevitably perish, all of which they well knew, for they were well acquainted with both him and his circumstances. Notwithstanding the prize was small, yet it was too valuable to them to part with for pity or humanity's sake; so they put one of their company on board of the canoe to take it to Minisink and drove their prisoners before them. When they arrived at Minisink they held a council in order to abuse their prisoners, commencing with John Land, because he was the youngest, and his feelings were most easily excited. They demanded of him how many women and children he had murdered, and when to this he gave no answer, they put a rope around his neck, threw it over a limb, and hauled him up. After he had hung a few minutes, they let him down and asked the same question. He then said that he had never killed, nor never had a desire to kill or hurt, women or children, and, as they well knew, the implied accusations were false and malicious. This provoked them, as might have been expected, and they immediately jerked him up again. This would have been his last time, had not some of his old play-fellows wanted to tantalize him a little more. They continued alternately to hang him and abuse him until their exertions had exhausted their strength, and there were none willing to pull the rope again. They then left him to anticipate what might follow in the morning, and he, with the others was taken to the log jail and shackled and handcuffed for safe keeping. This ended Captain Mush's first scout at Cochecton."

As may be seen from the above narrative, there was much bitter dissension to divide the few settlers that remained at the Cushutunk settlement during the Revolutionary War. By reason of its peculiarly isolated and exposed position on the route generally pursued by the hostile tribes in their incursions into New York State, and its contiguity to the war-path that led to the most restless Indian camps, it could hardly have escaped disastrous visitations; but the hardships of both Whig and Tory were much increased by the excesses of each,—acts that added to the intensity and hatred of the time, and gave rise to mutual charges and recriminations and political antipathies that have come down to the present. The exodus that marked the beginning of the war removed not only the Whigs, but a number of the British sympathizers, who abandoned their property and went within the King's lines, where some of them found permanent homes. The Whigs took their families to places of safety and then returned, either as scouts or to gather the crops that stood unharvested. They found that the few who had remained, and who had professed neutrality, had destroyed or appropriated their property. They, doubtless, practiced some cruelties in return, and a vengeful spirit was engendered which discriminated but little between friend and foe.

Skinner and the few neighbors who remained to brave the dangers of the dark days relied on the alliance they had formed with the friendly Indians for protection against marauding bands, but did not expect to suffer at the hands of their fellow-pioneers. Though there was no suspicion that he was in any way disloyal, his property was burned and pillaged, so that it is not surprising that there is a trace of bitterness in his narrative, as given above. As is always the case in border warfare, many deeds, prompted by personal hate or private grievance, were committed in the name of patriotism; and such may have been the murder of one Cooley, who was executed by Captain Tyler's company. Unknown to all, he had come up the river to Cushutunk early in the war, and asked permission to remain with several individuals. As he told rather an unsatisfactory story, he was refused a welcome and wandered on until he came to a deserted cabin near Little Equinunk, where he found an asylum. Here he led a harmless life amid the solitudes, supplying his simple wants from wood and stream. History does not record whom he had offended, and tradition is misty as to the manner in which he unconsciously provoked his death, but certain it is that he had been guilty of no crime for which he was dragged from his humble retreat and brought before the scouts. A brief consultation decided that he should die then and there. In vain did a few contend that it was wrong to kill him without a formal conviction by a competent tribunal; vain were his frantic appeals for life; deaf were the ears that heard his prayers and blind the eyes that saw his tears. Begging piteously for a moment's grace, he was shot even where he knelt, and his blood mingled with the stream. The minority of the company declared openly that it seemed to them a deed of murder, and that if such were the work necessary they would cease to be scouts. Thus red with blood and torch was the history of Cushutunk during the Revolution.

But at last the clouds broke; the war was over and spectral memories stalked back into the dark past, as there dawned the bright prospect of peace and security. Once more the farmer was safe at the furrow, and the woodman's axe swung free among the pines, where the scalping-knife was no longer to be feared. The people were still poor, but they went to work with a will to retrieve their ill-fortunes of preceding years. Lumbering was the most promising source of gain, and many engaged in it at the expense of agriculture, because of its returns in ready money. Though the ventures were generally successful, sometimes the rafts were wrecked on their way down the river, or the floods did not come at the usual time, and, as the people were poor, any contingency that prevented returns from their industry at the usual time caused general suffering. The milling was done at Minisink, and when a freshet of long duration prevented them from obtaining flour and meal there was much of kindness and good-will. Says one author,[1] "Without hesitation they divided their last crust with the starving and trusted in Providence for the next. So great was the scarcity of food at times, that women and children, after traveling for miles through the forest to procure food, upon receiving a few ears of corn, would gnaw the raw kernels from the cobs like famished animals. An old gentleman, who had been a witness of these scenes, while relating them wept like a sorrow-stricken woman."

The homes of the pioneers were of the rudest construction, as appears from the following from Mr. Skinner: "My father's house at Cushutunk—or rather the place where we stayed, for it consisted of a few logs thrown together and covered with bark—was for several years the principal stopping-place. There were but few houses in Cochecton where a traveler could be lodged on a somewhat primitive floor. Some remained with us two or three days, others as many weeks. In those days there was no way to get to Cochectón except by pushing a canoe thirty-five or forty miles up the river, or by traveling the same distance on an Indian path, where a carriage could not be drawn. Yet many found the way to Cochecton by the power of feet and legs or the strength of hands and arms."

The progenitor of the Skinner family was Joseph Skinner, who came from Connecticut in 1755. He had eight sons, viz.: Daniel, Benjamin, Timothy, John, Abner, Haggai, Calvin and Joseph; and two daughters, Martha and Huldah. Daniel Skinner settled at Ackhake, or St. Tammany, and had six children, viz.: Reuben, Daniel, Jr., Joseph, William H., Nathan and Lillie. Reuben, the first son, married Polly Chase, the widow of Joshua Clark, of Long Island, and settled on his father's place. He organized the first Masonic lodge in the county, and named it St. Tammany's Lodge. In 1801 he was assessed as owning two houses, twenty acres of improved land and a slave valued at fifty dollars. He was also a merchant, innkeeper and justice of the peace, and the possessor of a span of horses and two cows, his entire taxable valuation being five hundred and fifty-two dollars. His children were Daniel O. Skinner, formerly a resident of Honesdale; Anna, the wife of George Bush; Hulda, the wife of Jacob P. Yerkes; and Nancy, who married George Kinney.

Daniel Skinner, Jr., married Hannah Burleigh, of Wayne County. His only child was Ira D. Skinner, who also left one son. Joseph, the third son of Joseph Skinner, married Mercy Delop, of Litchfield County, Connecticut, and their children were Courtland, Daniel K., Sarah, Susan (the wife of Horace Belknap), Polly (the wife of Jacob Mitchell) and Matilda (who first married Charles Young, and afterwards became the wife of Nathan Yerkes).

William H., the fourth son of Joseph Skinner, married for his first wife Elizabeth Gray, of Orange County, N. Y., and of this union there were born John, Elijah, Milton, Martha (the wife of Calvin Tibbets), Dulcinna (the wife of William Kellum) and Ardacca (who married a Thompson). William H. Skinner's second wife was a widow, Fannie Thompson, and by this marriage were born David, Henry, William H., Jr., Elizabeth (the wife of Samuel Haydn), Kate and Annie.

Nathan Skinner, the writer of the history which has been quoted, married Sarah Calkins, and his children were Col. Calvin Skinner (to whom the writer is indebted for many of the following notes on the early settlers), Albro, Oliver I., Charles C., Heli, Serenna (the wife of Oliver Calkins, Jr.), Amanda (the wife of Jesse D. Thomas), Olive (the wife of John Tyler) and Zilla (who married William Stephens).

Lillie Skinner, Joseph Skinner's first daughter, married John Land; Marcey, the second daughter, became the wife of Reuben Hancket; and Sarah, the youngest, married John Conklin.

One of the early settlers whose descendants became prominent in the annals of the township was Bezaleel Tyler, who came from Connecticut with the Skinners and Calkinses, and settled above Cochecton. He was a brother-in-law of Simeon and John Calkins, and had twenty-one children, all of whom arrived at maturity, and most of whom were soldiers in the Revolutionary War. Captain Bezaleel Tyler, who was killed at the battle of Lackawaxen, was one of his children. He had previously married, and settled on Hollister's Creek, where, with Daniel Skinner, he built a saw-mill, the second in Damascus township. He also assisted in the erection of Daniel Skinner's house, which was burned by the Indians in 1777. His children were John, Moses, Oliver, Elam, Phœbe and Abigail. John married Jane Fanoy and had seven children, viz.: Bezaleel, Moses, Benjamin, Oliver, Sally (the wife of James Ross, Jr.), Abigail (the wife of Jesse Drake, Jr.) and Lydia (who married Moses, a son of Oliver Calkins, of Big Eddy).

Oliver, the second son of Captain Bezaleel Tyler, married Elizabeth Comfort. His oldest son was John, but who the others were is not known, the family moving to Dryden, New York.

Moses, the third son, married Sarah Ross, a daughter of James Ross, Sr., and John R. Ross was one of his sons. One of his daughters married Elias Calkins, of Barryville.

Elam, the fourth son, was killed in youth; Phebe, one of the daughters, married Joseph Thomas; while Abigail, the other, became the wife of Joseph Mitchell.

Nathan Mitchell, who was a prominent figure in the early history of the settlement, always lived on the New York side of the Delaware. His wife was Betsy, the oldest daughter of Captain Ross, and Abraham, one of his sons, moved to Rileyville, where he married Polly Smith. James, another son, lives at the homestead, and Nathan, Jr., lived at Rock Run. He married Anna, daughter of James Brown, and two of his sons were Stephen and Elias.

Nicholas Conklin was of Dutch descent, and came from Haverstraw Bay about 1755–56, locating on the New York side of the Delaware. He had three sons,—William, John and Elias. The latter was an Indian doctor, and lived a wild, roving life, so that little is known of him. It is uncertain whether he married and left descendants or not. William Conklin married a daughter of —— Brink, and had seven children. They were Nicholas, John Paul, William Eli, Elias, Abby (wife of James Brink, of Milford), Hester (wife of Squire Mosh), Rachel (wife of Jesse Tyler), Christine and Elizabeth.

John Conklin, afterwards known as Judge, was one of Captain Tyler's company at the battle of Lackawaxen; married Herzilla Fanoy, and was the father of five children,—Benjamin, William, Joseph, Jane (the wife of David Brown), and Sarah (the wife of Charles Little).

Moses Thomas, who has already been referred to, came from Philadelphia with his brother Aaron, in 1755, to establish a block-house at Milanville, on the flats just above the mouth of Calkins' Creek. They were both sent by the proprietaries to look after the Penn interests, and, if possible, prevent the further occupancy of the lands by Connecticut settlers. They fulfilled their mission, but afterwards became permanent settlers, and their descendants intermarried with the Yankee families they came to restrain. Moses Thomas had two sons,—Moses, Jr., and Elias,—and three daughters,—Hulda, who married Abram Ross; Sarah, the wife of Nathan Evans; and Hannah, who married Oliver Calkins. Aaron was also the father of a good family—six children. His sons were Joseph and Benjamin, and his daughters,—Polly, the wife of Solomon Decker; Charity, who was twice married, and had a number of children by each husband; Rachel, who married Jerry Lilli; and Elsie, the wife of a man named Howe. Moses Thomas, Jr., was one of Captain Tyler's company and was killed at the battle of Lackawaxen. He left four children. His daughters were the wives of Reuben Decker, Abraham Burnes and one of the Calkinses; and his son Moses, who was an infant at the time of the battle, located on the Delaware.

David Youngs was a Scotchman, who emigrated from Easton before the Revolution, arriving about the same time that Moses Thomas did. Youngs did not find a convenient place for settlement on the Pennsylvania side of the river, and located in New York State, just opposite Big Island. His wife was an English woman, and claimed to be of royal blood, on the ground that she was a natural child of George III. Mr. Youngs had five children,—David, Thomas, John, George and Isabella, who married Charles Tyler, and afterwards settled on the original Tyler property. David built a grist-mill, which afterwards passed into the hands of his brother. George Thomas married Abigail Thomas, and settled on the Lassley place, just below the Cochecton Falls. John's wife was the granddaughter of John Lassley, and they lived on the Youngs place for many years, afterwards moving to Smith Hill, where both died. George married Hannah Wheeler, and lived and died on Tyler Hill.

John Lassley moved into Damascus soon after Youngs and Thomas did, and took up a tract adjoining that of Aaron Thomas. He married Sarah Tyler, and had three children,—Cornelius, Sarah (the wife of Parks Baird) and Betsy (Mrs. Salisbury). Mr. Lassley was a Revolutionary soldier, and served throughout the entire war.

Simeon Bush was one of the original settlers, and came with the Calkinses and Skinners. He was a half-brother to the Tylers, and married Hannah Smith, of Orange County, during the Indian War. His sons were George, John and Eli, and his daughters,—Kesiah, who became Mrs. Nicholas Conklin; Polly, the wife of James Carryheart; Wadie, who married Charles Drake; Eleanor, the wife of Isaac Mills; and Abbie, who died single. Simeon Bush made out the assessment list of 1801, which is quoted elsewhere, and was a man of much prominence in the township. George, the eldest son, was also a man of mark. He was born in Damascus in 1791, and served as county commissioner in the early part of this century. In 1842 he was elected to the Legislature, and served for two years; he died in 1872, leaving several children, and a wife who was the daughter of Reuben Skinner.

Robert Land was a son of Samuel Land, an Englishman, who first settled near Wilmington, Delaware, where he took up a tract on White Clay Creek, which he afterwards (in 1684) disposed of to John Cann. In 1763, Land was sent to Cushutunk as a justice of the peace under the colonial government. He was a man of enterprise and perseverance, and his wife who was a Scott, was a woman of uncommon endurance and ability. He settled on the property now owned by Colonel Calvin Skinner, at Milanville, and it was from that home that Mrs. Land went in the spring of 1777, when the Mohawks visited Calkins' Creek, murdered Bryant Kane's family and carried off Abel Land. A short time previous to this, in accordance with the recommendations of the Continental Congress, a Committee of Safety had been formed at Cochecton, and as Land had been in the service of the King, an order for his arrest as a Tory was made. It was served, and he was condemned to incarceration at Paupack, pending a trial for his Royalist proclivities. In some way he eluded the vigilance of his captors, and escaped, after which he kept within the English lines until the Revolution was ended, and then went with his daughter and son Ephraim to Canada.

John Land remained behind and settled on the homestead, taking out a patent for four hundred and thirty acres. He married Lily, the oldest daughter of Daniel Skinner, and had eleven children. They were Phœbe, who married Dr. Luther Appley; Lily, the wife of Dr. Freeman Allen; Mercy, the wife of William Appley, of Connecticut; Marilla, who married Jesse Calkins, and settled on the Narrowsburg turnpike; Maxamila, the wife of John Burcher, near Eldred; Polly, who married a Stuttenburg, and moved to Wisconsin; Rebecca, the wife of James Louden, of Honesdale; Robert, who married a daughter of Jesse Welles, and settled at Beaver Brook; William and John, who went to Canada; Mascal, who went to Wisconsin, and afterwards to California, where he died.

Joseph Brown emigrated from New Jersey about 1790, and was for many years a well-known farmer. He had one son, Joel, who was the father of Rev. Isaac Brown, a Baptist clergyman; Joseph; Enoch; Esther, who married a Ketchum; Fannie (Mrs. G. Lord); and Eleanor.

Daniel Bush came from Stroudsburg about 1795, to make his home with Captain Jesse Drake for a time. Young Bush was a surveyor and millwright, and was also more than ordinarily handsome and attractive. Across the Delaware lived Nathan Mitchell, and Bush saw and loved his oldest daughter, Hannah. He married her and settled on the Wayne County side, though he afterward moved to New York, and was the first justice of the peace at Cochecton. His children were Thomas A., Joseph, John, Amos, Sarah (Mrs. Cotton) and Jane.

Rev. Enoch Owens came to Damascus about 1790, and settled above Cochecton. He married a daughter of Silas Tyler, and afterward located on land belonging to Stephen Mitchell. His children were Netus, James, Silas, David, Israel, Sylvan, Abigail (Mrs. Mertha Massey), Polly and Heziah.

Captain Jesse Drake moved from Wilkes-Barre about 1790, and settled on the Delaware, in the place above referred to. He had married the widow Chapman, relict of Moses Thomas, killed at the battle of Lackawaxen, and had four children,—Christina, who married Jonathan Lillie; Martha, the wife of James Mitchell; Charles and Jesse.

Thomas Shields, to whose enterprise and generosity the village of Damascus owes much of its prosperity, was a son of James Shields, and was born in Newlin township, Chester County, in June, 1743. At the age of seventeen he was apprenticed to John Bayly, a goldsmith of Philadelphia, to learn that trade, and it was stipulated in the indenture that the term of his apprenticeship should not cease until nine months after he had become of age. After completing his term Mr. Shields carried on business on his own account for a number of years, and accumulated considerable money. About 1785 he commenced to invest in wild lands in the northern part of Northampton County. He soon owned between thirty and forty thousand acres, most of his tracts lying between Dyberry Creek and the Delaware River, in Lebanon, Damascus, Oregon and Berlin townships. Among the lands he thus acquired was the old Damascus Manor, which he purchased from John and Richard Penn, on the 6th of February, 1795. The tract contained four thousand three hundred and ninety acres, and gave him the ownership of all the land fronting on the Delaware, between the old Skinner place (late George Bush's) and the Judge Thomas homestead, a distance of five miles.

Immediately after purchasing this manor he selected as a site for his residence a spot where the village of Damascus now stands, and soon afterward removed his family from Philadelphia. A saw and grist-mill were completed on Cash's Creek, near its mouth, as early as 1796, and other buildings soon followed. Here it was that Moses Calkins brought over the ice, from Philadelphia, the first burr-stones used in the county. The place was known as Shields' Mills for a while, though the owner always called it by the name given by the proprietaries twenty years before. Mr. Shields was active in devising plans, and liberal in assisting in anything that would lead to the settlement of the country, and his policy promoted rapid growth.

He was made president of the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike, and when the eastern end of the road was constructed, in 1806, he laid off a range of village lots fronting on it, and extending back some two hundred feet to other streets. During the year following Mr. Shields executed two deeds, one for a Baptist Church lot and the other for a school, and there are other substantial tokens of his enterprise in the village. His residence at Damascus ceased about 1811, when he moved back to Philadelphia, where he died in 1820. He left four children,—Robert, Thomas, John and David, most of whom lived and died in Philadelphia.

Derrick Lukens emigrated from Bucks County about 1796, being one of those who came with Thomas Shields. Mr. Lukens had married Polly North, and brought one child with him. His children were John N.; Titus D.; Betsy, who married Dr. Allen, and afterwards R. Hankins; Polly, the wife of Rev. Isaac Brown; Margaret, the wife of Colonel O. B. Brush, at one time the sheriff of Wayne County; Sally, who married Joseph L. Parsons; Hannah, the wife of John F. Avery; and Nancy, the wife of Tunis Willsey.

William Monnington came from Philadelphia, about the same time that Lukens did, and settled on a four hundred acre tract, now occupied by Stephen Yerkes. Aided by his son John, of Philadelphia, Mr. Monnington built the saw-mill at Damascus, and his other sons, James and Nathan, worked there. Besides these children he had a son Israel, who died without issue, and four daughters,—Mrs. Souders and Mrs. Vandergrif, who remained in Philadelphia, and Polly, who married William Tyler, of Tyler Hill, and Becky, the wife of Judge Thomas.

George Brown came from Haverstraw Bay about 1800, and after the death of his first wife, who was a Lassley, married Eleanor Decker. His eldest daughter was the wife of Jeremiah Lillie; Sabra, the second daughter, married Joseph Holbert; Mahalia was the wife of William Owens. The sons were George W. and Daniel, the latter afterwards lived at Bayard's Pond. Daniel Brown, a brother of George, lived at Hog Island, in the Delaware, and is remembered as the man who brought the first wagons to Milanville.

Jonathan Yerkes brought his family from Willow Grove, Bucks County, about 1800, and took up a four hundred acre tract which he bought of Thomas Shields. He built both a grist and a saw-mill on Calkins' Creek about 1810. His sons were Joseph, Titus, Jacob P., Nathan L., Sebastian J. and David. He had three daughters,—Mary A., who married E. B. Clark; Margaret; and Hannah, the wife of Ira Sherwood.

Michael Brannan came from Newburgh, probably about 1809 or 1810, and settled below the Cochecton Falls. He married Hannah Anderson, a granddaughter of Aaron Thomas, and had nine children,—Oliver; Polly, who married Stephen Youngs; Lydia, the wife of Stephen Wright; Lorette, the wife of Charles D. Lovis; Hannah J., who married Lemuel Brown; Charity (Mrs. Budd); and John, Moses and Lot.

Archbald McCollam was an Irish patriot, who settled near Benjamin Conklin, on the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike. He had one son, Neal, who settled at Galilee, and a daughter, who married William McAvery, of Mount Pleasant.

Samuel Bennett came from New Jersey about 1812, married Sally Layton, and settled near Belmont. He served as constable in 1825, and was otherwise prominent in the township. Samuel and Enos Headen came from the same State about the same time, and Samuel remained to become a valued citizen. He married Olive Hurd. Enos married Phœbe, a daughter of Silas Tyler, and moved to Ohio several years afterward.

Oliver B. Brush, who was sheriff in 1822, emigrated from Connecticut in 1810. For two years he taught school in Damascus, making his home with Nathan Skinner. When the War of 1812 broke out, he volunteered, and served with great credit. After he returned he married Margaret, a daughter of Derrick Lukens, by whom he had three sons,—Eliphalet, Oliver B., Jr., and Joseph L., all of whom live at Tyler Hill. After the death of Sheriff Brush his wife married Stephen Mitchell, and one daughter, the wife of Warren Yerkes, was born of this union.

James Boyd came from Frankford, near Philadelphia, about 1808, being brought by the Duffields, and settled on Damascus Manor, near Thomas Youngs. He volunteered in the same company with Sheriff Brush, and served until 1814, when he returned to his adopted residence. He had seven children, two of whom lived in Warren County and two in Wayne. Hon. Thomas Y. Boyd, one of the latter, bought the Tymerson Mills, near Eldred, many years ago, and has since been largely interested in the lumber business. He is a man of much enterprise and public spirit, and has twice represented the county in the Legislature.

Alexander Rutledge, a native of Ireland, moved into Damascus and settled on the Hunter lands, on the road leading from the Union settlement to the "old Gate house," as the Benjamin Conklin place was called, about 1812. His children were Ann (the wife of James Monnington), Alexander, Edward, Christopher, John and William.

William Keesler came from Haverstraw Bay about this time, and settled on the bank of the Delaware, near Skinner's Eddy. He had married a daughter of Cornelius Bolts, and had three sons,—John, Jacob and Jesse. He was also the father of several daughters, who all married early settlers. The family is widely connected.

Elijah Clark, who appears on some of the early assessment lists, came from Connecticut about 1814, and resided in the township for about fifteen years. He married Mary Ann, the daughter of Jonathan Yerkes, and had several children, among whom were Romaine, Dorinda, Lorette and Sidney. The family moved to Michigan in 1829.

William Burcher came from England about 1815, and settled at first in Mount Pleasant, where he remained for two years. He then returned to Damascus, where he has since resided.

His children were John; Samuel; Sarah, the wife of Warren Dimmick, of Mount Pleasant; Betsy, the wife of Joseph Yerkes; Helen, the wife of Titus Yerkes; and a daughter who married a Kramer.

Horace Belknap moved from Shehawken about 1820, and married Susan, a daughter of Joseph Skinner. Belknap located at the Balcom settlement, and had six children,—Joseph, Kinney; Charles Callista; wife of Caleb Schenck, of Cherry Ridge; Mary, (Mrs. French): and Laura, the wife of William Quick, of Port Jervis.

William Bonesteel came from Greene County, New York, but moved to Damascus from Sullivan County in 1850, and bought the Manor Mill. He married Rachel Rouse. Leander and Leroy were his only children that lived to manhood. Leander married Mrs. Ennis, of Damascus; Leroy married Mary E., a daughter of S. K. Vail. William Bonesteel died in 1869, aged sixty-two.

Eli Beach was born in Cairo, Greene County, New York, and after reaching his majority entered the employ of Captain Edwards, the first tanner in the United States under the present system, at Hunter, New York. After engaging in the tanning business on his own account in several places, in connection with Loren Andrews, he bought Rock Glen Tannery, at Milanville. Mr. Andrews' interest was subsequently bought by J. Howard Beach, a son of Eli, and the establishment was run for many years under the name of E. Beach & Son. Mr. Beach was a man of much enterprise and public spirit, and occupied a prominent place in the community. He was a justice of the peace, and filled other township offices to the satisfaction of all. While a resident of New York State he was the captain of a militia company, and was always known as "Captain." His wife was Miss Mary A. Gay, and their children were Hon. J. Howard Beach, Watson E. Beach, Mrs. H. L. Nichols and Mrs. Conner. Captain Beach died in 1877, aged seventy-two.

James Smith, who settled at Eldred in 1821, and was the first postmaster there, was from New York State. He married Eunice, a daughter of Deacon Loring Parsons, and had only two children who grew to manhood. They were E. H. Smith, of Bethany, and L. P. Smith, of Damascus.

Milanville is the name now given to the hamlet that has grown up partly on the track first settled by Robert Land and others, mentioned in the foregoing history. At the time Land was living there Joseph Skinner had settled at "Ackhake," and during the same year that he is recorded as living there Timothy Skinner and Simeon Calkins built a saw-mill, and "a sort of a grist-mill" on Calkins' Creek, nearly opposite the north end of the Beach tannery. They at first intended to locate the saw-mill on the river-bank, and with this intention dug a race from the old dam just above the tannery nearly to the spot now occupied by Skinner Brothers' saw-mill. It was a considerable undertaking for those days, and great was their disappointment, when, after some months' labor, it was completed and the water let in, to find that the light, sandy soil, through which it passed a portion of the way, would not stand the pressure of the water, and the race was useless. After several vain attempts to patch it up, the first selected location of the mill was abandoned, and the site referred to adopted. Both of these mills, though small, and fitted with very primitive machinery, answered the purposes of the pioneers until burned in the Indian raid of 1777. Several decades afterward another attempt was made to use the old race and this was partially successful. The portion of the excavation between the dam, and a few rods below Volney Skinner's residence, was through firm soil, and it was decided to locate a saw-mill there. This was done, and the mill was used until the present mill near the tannery was built. Portions of this second mill stood until a few years ago, and the foundation walls are still standing. The course of the old race can be easily traced at present, though a road passes through its lower end.

On the flat above Colonel Calvin Skinner's is the site of the old fort, or block-house, built by Simeon Calkin and Moses Thomas, in 1755, a short time after the mills were built. During the past century the waters of the Delaware have made very perceptible inroads on the flat, and the place where the block-house stood is now but a few feet from the water's edge. Half concealed in the low bushes that overrun the spot is a well that was once inside the stockade, and served to slake the thirst of the brave little band, composed chiefly of women and children, that held the savages at bay on that autumn day when Thomas and Willis were surprised and killed.

The house where Brant Kane's family were murdered in the following year stood on the New York side of the river, about midway between the site of the block-house and Colonel Skinner's residence. No trace of it now remains, nor, indeed, is the precise spot where it stood perfectly certain.

The tannery, which of late years has given an impetus to Milanville, was started in 1849 by David Clemments, James Horton and —— Robinson. After a very short time Clemments succeeded to the business, and ran it until 1854, when he sold out to Captain Eli Beach and Loring Andrews. Mr. Beach was a tanner of wide experience and much enterprise, and he at once made changes that greatly improved the quality of the product, and the business began to improve from the time he took hold of it. Changes were made in the method, and additions to the plant erected, so that its capacity was greatly increased. Subsequently Mr. Andrews' interest was bought out by Hon. J. Howard Beach, and the firm became Eli Beach & Son. The senior member of the firm died in July, 1877, and was succeeded by his sons, who still conduct the establishment.

A store was opened in connection with the tannery and has been maintained by the firms ever since. Until 1861 Damascus was the nearest post-office, but in that year an office was established at Milanville, with J. Howard Beach as the postmaster, an office which he still holds.

In 1832 Alonzo Bently and Jacob Burger, of Philadelphia, built a saw-mill just below the Cochecton Falls, and secured lumber rights over a large tract of land adjacent. Three years afterward the mill was carried away by the high water. Subsequently the timber rights were leased to Nathan Skinner, and the tract is now controlled by the Skinners, who have large lumbering interests in the vicinity.

The Skinner Brothers' mill was built in 1882, with W. W. Williams as millwright, and has a capacity of ten thousand feet of boards per day. Its saws and other machinery are driven by a thirty horse-power engine, and the boilers, by recent improvements, are heated by burning saw-dust. The builders and present owners are Volney and Milton L. Skinner, sons of Colonel Calvin Skinner, both of whom have been prominently identified with the lumber interest of the Delaware for many years.

Milanville is delightfully situated and abounds in picturesque scenery, so that it is already gaining popularity as a summer resort. The hamlet has several stores, blacksmith and wagon-shops and a school-house in which there is a Sabbath-school held. Regular service is sometimes conducted there from the Damascus charges.

Damascus Village.—In the foregoing history of the township the story of the village has been nearly all related. The early settlers of this portion of the Delaware Valley located on both sides of the river, and, as will be seen hereafter, the enterprises and interests of Damascus and Cochecton were nearly identical, and the leading spirits were men from both sides of the river. Prior to the advent of Thomas Shields the old manor property was unbroken forest, except, possibly, some unimportant clearings made by one or two "squatters," of whom no record but dim tradition remains. The Cushutunk settlement, extending for a number of miles up and down the river, must have had its centre of population about Milanville, where all the small interests of the weak colony centred. Here the earliest mill was located, and here the settlers came to have their coarse grists ground, to get advances of ammunition and provisions on skins they were curing or lumber they had ready to raft, and transact such other small business as their simple pioneer life made necessary. Reuben Skinner had the first tavern, and if strangers had penetrated the forests, and come to the frontier for adventure and speculation, they stopped with him, and if mail left at Easton, "to be called for," was for any of the settlers, the fact would be there reported by the returning raftsmen and Durham boaters. This old tavern was built on the site of the building burned by Captain Tyler, and was opened to the public soon after the Revolution.

The purchase of the manor, in 1795, brought about a change in the state of affairs. Thomas Shields, the new proprietor, was a man of much energy and enterprise. He had come into the wilds of Northampton County to develop a new country, induce settlers to locate, appreciate the value of his recent acquisition in land and dispose of the property at a good profit. While a shrewd business man, who had built up a fortune from small beginnings, he was not without public spirit, and took immediate steps to promote the general welfare of the settlement. He brought with him from Philaaelphia a number of skilled mechanics, and within two years after he had selected his place of residence a saw and a grist-mill were running merrily near the mouth of Cash's Creek.

In connection with these, he bought lumber and such little grain as there was over the needs of actual consumption, and gave in exchange staple goods from Easton and Philadelphia. Several years before this Ebenezer Taylor had located on the other side of the river, and commenced mercantile business, and thus Damascus became the centre of supplies. During the next ten years it shared with Cochecton the interests of the settlement. Charles Irvine, a native of Ireland, who had fled from the oppression of the English government under the younger Pitt, had come to the latter town as a schoolmaster, and having organized a stock company, built the first frame house in the town for a school-room. It was there that many of the earlier settlers of the second generation made their first timid steps in the rugged path of knowledge. So, too, there were religious meetings there, and other adjuncts of prosperity, and the establishments of one village or the other supplied the wants of the people for miles around.

After the completion of the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike Mr. Shields laid out the village plot, and a year afterward, in 1807, deeded lots for church and school. Three years later John Duffle started the first hotel in Damascus village. Soon afterward William Tyler opened a hotel in the building now occupied by Warren Tyler, and after running it for a few years, moved to Tyler Hill. In 1815 the building occupied by Duffle was burned, and a year later Charles Drake opened his house that ran for many years.

The first temperance tavern in Wayne County was that kept by George Bush, who married Ann Skinner. He was the son of Simeon Bush, and was born in Damascus in 1791. His parents were among the pioneers, and his early advantages were small. He was trained as a river steersman, and after following this for a number of years he bought the Lush farm, afterwards occupied by his son, and married Annie Skinner. In 1818 he bought a property on Skinner's Eddy, which he opened as a hotel, creating no little excitement among the raftsmen by announcing that no intoxicants would be sold on the place. In that day liquor was sold everywhere, and its use to excess was not considered more than a slight impropriety. Mr. Bush thought differently, however, and, what was a still greater surprise, his tavern became one of the most popular on the river. He took a prominent position in the public affairs of his time, and represented Wayne and Pike Counties in the Legislature in 1842–44. He died in 1873.

When Thomas Shields gave up his residence in Damascus he sold his mills and what remained of his land to an association or partnership known as "the Manor Company." It was composed of Moses Thomas, Charles and Jesse Drake, Moses and Bezaleel Tyler and Simeon and George Bush. The mill dam was located on the site of the one now used by Leroy Bonesteel, but the mill itself was farther down the stream. Charles Drake, who lived where W. W. Tyler now has a store, rented the mill of the Manor Company, and operated it for many years. Finally, in 1841, the tract on which it was situated was sold to Walter S. Vail, and the mill, which had become old and worthless, was torn down, and the dwelling now occupied by Frank Baker was erected on its site.

The need of a grist-mill was soon felt, and in 1850 William Bonesteel and the Manor Company, or what remained of it, built a new mill just below the dam. About the time it was completed a fire broke out and destroyed everything except the wheel and mlll-stones, but it was soon rebuilt. Subsequently it passed into the hands of William Bonesteel, who bought out the other partners, and after his death, into the hands of his son, Leroy Bonesteel, the present proprietor. The mill has three run of stone, and is driven by both steam and water-power.

In 1825 Loring Parsons and Henry Dibble erected a carding-machine, fulling-mill and cloth-dyeing establishment at Damascus. It was about a mile west of Cochecton, on the property now occupied by Mr. Cromwell. Although small, and designed for custom-work only, it did a thriving business, for in those days the spinning-wheel was a familiar object in every farmer's kitchen. In about 1832 it passed into the hands of R. T. Parsons, who subsequently disposed of it to J. T. Bush. The business was abandoned about 1865.

The first store in Damascus was opened by Walter S. Vail about 1826, and was located on the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike, quite near the river. In 1831 Hiram Bennett and Hon. D. B. St. John were taken into partnership, and the firm-name was Walter S. Vail & Co. This was kept up for three years, and then Bennett sold out, the other partners carrying on the business in their own name for a year. Then Charles Irvine bought out St. John's interest, and afterwards Vail sold his to W. W. Tyler. The firm then became W. W. Tyler & Co., and remained so until 1856, when Irvine sold to James S. Vail, and Tyler & Vail was the style adopted. In 1858 Vail retired, and after Tyler had conducted the business alone for a year he disposed of it to Philip O'Riley, of Oregon, with whom Charles Irvine was associated for a year and a half, under the style of Charles Irvine & Co. This was succeeded by T. & P. O'Riley, which lasted until 1881, when A. J. Cuddeback became proprietor, and remained so until 1884, when the business was abandoned.

W. W. Tyler built a saw-mill on Cash's Creek, just opposite his present place of business, in 1859, and it has since been in operation. It is a small affair, with an up-and-down saw, and is only used at present to get out square timber. In 1866 Mr. Tyler opened the store he now occupies in the old Charles Drake house.

Post-Office and Mail Facilities.—It is probable that the first letters to the early settlers at Damascus were sent by messenger, either by the Durham boats from Easton and Philadelphia or by such travelers as might be journeying into the Minisink region.

In 1803 a post-office was established at Milford, to which the mails were brought once in two weeks, the route being from Lancaster, by Bethlehem and Stroudsburg, to Milford. After that, letters were sent to Milford "to be called for." On the completion of the turnpikes from Newburgh to Great Bend, in 1810, a mail-route was established from Danbury, Conn., via Fishkill Landing and Newburgh to Chenango Point, and a year later a post-office on this route was established at Cochecton. This, of course, gave Damascus a mail service that was adequate to the demands of the times, and it was not until 1824 that the need of an office on the Pennsylvania side of the river was greatly felt. In that year an office was established, and William H. Clarke was the first postmaster. He was succeeded by Dudley B. Clark, and then, in 1826, Walter S. Vail was appointed. He served until 1849 or 1850, when the office passed into the hands of N. W. Vail, who kept it until 1855, the date of Charles Irvine's appointment. After two years James S. Vail was made postmaster, and held office until 1859, when he gave place to W. W. Tyler, who served until 1866. The next appointee was Mark Apley, who resigned in 1873, at which time W. W. Tyler, the present incumbent, was reappointed.

The West Damascus post-office was established in 1869, with George Welch as postmaster. Several years later he gave place to Mrs. Mary Mitchell, the present incumbent.

St. Tammany's Lodge.—Little or nothing is now known of this organization, except that it was instituted at a very early period, and that Nathan Skinner was a prominent member, and filled a number of offices in it. The records and jewels were burned thirty years ago, and those who were among the constituent members are in their graves. An edition of "Harris' Discourses," an early Masonic publication, contains a list of subscribers, and in it the following names are credited to St. Tammany Lodge, No. 83: George B. Guinniss, Reuben Condit, Jesse Drake, Nathan Monington, Joseph Guinniss, Jacob Tyler, Dudley B. Clark, George Bush, Noah Philips, Silas Tyler and David Guinniss.

THE DAMASCUS ACADEMY, which for more than a quarter of a century has been the leading educational institution of this portion of the Delaware Valley, has been attended by many vicissitudes, and, during that period, has stood high on the hill of success and progress, and again so low in public esteem as to nearly succumb to financial embarrassment and failure. Neglect and indifference, which never keep dates and records, the warp and woof of historians' work, make some of the earlier information meagre, though enough is obtainable to trace the progress of a well-defined effort, among a few leading spirits, to secure good educational advantages in this portion of the Delaware Valley. The subject of building an academy was first discussed by some of the leading citizens some thirty-seven years ago, and resulted in rather an unsatisfactory meeting to consider the matter, called at the Presbyterian Church on the evening of August 18, 1848. The propositions then laid before the citizens were not received with favor, though the seed was sown by a few strong advocates, and it matured soon afterward, when a second meeting was held in the Baptist Church, at which proper measures were taken to forward the project and a committee was appointed to select a site. When the location was decided upon, a third meeting, also at the Baptist Church, appointed a committee to buy a piece of land containing one acre from Charles Drake for two hundred dollars. It was the site that had been previously selected, and was a portion of the old Damascus Manor. This meeting also selected a board of trustees, consisting of Moses Thomas, Moses Tyler, John Mitchell, Webster Sutliff, James C. Curtis, E. S. Page and Walter S. Vail, and another committee was empowered to solicit subscriptions of stock at five dollars a share, and secure a charter. Subsequently it was reported that a sufficient amount had been subscribed, and Moses Tyler was elected president of the board, with Charles Irvine as secretary and treasurer. The latter drafted the charter, which was obtained in 1849, and incorporated the institution as the Union Academy of Damascus. The necessary arrangements for the erection of the building were soon made. Joseph Tyler laid the foundation, and Cogswell Gordon, the architect, with the assistance of Joseph M. Brigham and Abraham Tyler, succeeded in completing the structure during the summer of 1849. The total cost of the building was one thousand and fifty dollars, which was considered really more than the improvement was worth.

At a meeting of the trustees, held March 9, 1850, it was decided that the first term should begin on the first Monday of the succeeding May; that the fall and winter terms should commence on the 20th of September, and continue, with one week's vacation through the holidays, until the 20th of March, 1851. Rev. A. M. Calkin was employed as the first principal, and during the first term the attendance was so large that it became necessary for him to obtain a lady assistant. He also took the academy for the second term, in September, 1851, but was released at his own request, and James L. Appley was employed in his stead, commencing work in the spring of 1851, and continuing until the following July, when Mr. Calkin returned. He remained this time until the close of the scholastic year in 1856, when he was succeeded by Wheeler Mitchell, who taught for five months, and gave place to W. A. Newton, of Narrowsburg. The latter rented the academy for one year, during which time he succeeded in getting the rental reduced from forty to twenty-five dollars, and was re-elected in March, 1859, for a second year. After his departure the academy remained closed for a time. It had been a financial failure, and no one seemed willing to guarantee the amount necessary to secure a principal. However, in October, 1861, Misses McClogan and Vaughn opened the school, only to give it up after a few months, and be succeeded by C. J. Lain, who also remained but a short time. In February, 1862, John Cairns came, remaining until April, 1865, when R K. Scudder was secured for one year. L. D. Tyler took the principalship in 1866, and had a large patronage; but he remained only a short time, and was succeeded by Miss Bush, whose stay was likewise transient. During the latter part of the year 1870 the academy was closed, and an attempt was made to buy up the stock and convert the school into a private property, but it was unsuccessful, and shortly afterward J. A. McLaury opened the school with fair prospects of success. He remained for six years, doing excellent work, and building up the reputation of the school, and was succeeded by L. W. Tyler (2d), was taught one term and gave place to W. W. Fletcher in 1877. He was assisted by W. J. Turner. The next principal was Rev. R. J. Kellogg, who was also pastor in the town at the time, and after he went to serve other charges, Frank Tuthill taught for some months.

S. D. Barnes, the next principal, remained for two years and his first term had not closed before the necessity for a new building was manifest. When he took the school there were but eleven pupils, but the number increased steadily, and soon the stockholders decided upon better facilities. On June 19, 1879, a new board of trustees was elected, consisting of C. E. Beach, J. M. Page, L. Bonesteel, Marcus Appley, J. T. Tyler, W. J. Bush and W. W. Tyler, and upon organization Charles E. Beach was elected president, and Leroy Bonesteel secretary. This was the first decisive movement toward a new building, although some of the more energetic stockholders had been planning and estimating the cost of the contemplated improvement and soliciting subscriptions to a new fund. To this latter there were generous responses from Hon. J. Howard Beach, Mrs. D. M. McCollough, J. M. Page and others. A proposition to cut down the trees with which the academy tract was covered, and sell the lumber, excited violent opposition, but was finally carried, and a part of the lumber was made use of in the new building, while the rest was rafted to Philadelphia, and sold at a good profit. The work of rebuilding was commenced in July, 1880, and was completed in the following January. The building has a frontage of seventy-two feet, and is twenty-four feet deep. It is two stories high, with a Gothic roof, and is surmounted by a well-proportioned cupola sixty-five feet high. There are two airy study-rooms, each twenty-seven by thirty-three feet, and a number of recitation-rooms and other conveniences for the systematic conduct of a large school. The first term of the new academy began December 3, 1879, and at its close Mr. Barnes resigned. He was succeeded by T. N. Glover, who remained two years and then gave place to Isaac R. King, who closed his engagement in June, 1885. Since that time no one has been selected.

Damascus First Baptist Church.—The fact that Thomas Shields, the purchaser of the Damascus Manor, was an ardent Baptist led to the church of that village being the first in the county to own and occupy a meeting-house. The edifice was erected by Mr. Shields about the year 1800, and was deeded, together with the lots on which it stood, in trust, for a regular Baptist Church and society, when organized.

In the fall of 1820 Rev. John Smitzer visited Damascus and vicinity, but was not invited to preach there because of his close communion views. He called at the residence of Mr. Stephen Mitchell, however, and had an earnest conversation with Mrs. Mitchell, who had once belonged to the same church with him, and to this may be traced the beginning of the Damascus Baptist Church. Early in the following autumn Mr. Smitzer again visited the village, and soon afterwards twelve persons were organized as a regular Baptist Church. A council of recognition was convened at Damascus, August 26, 1821, and nineteen persons—five males and fourteen females—were recognized, seven of them being baptized in the Delaware River. On the 8th of September Jonathan Yerkes was chosen church clerk, and in November Isaac Brown made deacon. The church was admitted to the association in 1822.

In March, 1826, Mr. Smitzer resigned his charge. During the first year he had supplied the Damascus Church once a month, devoting the remaining time to Bethany and Canaan, and during the subsequent years of his pastorate he had divided his labors between Bethany and Damascus.

Although destitute of a regular pastor, the pulpit was supplied by Rev. Enoch Owen, a resident and constituent member, until Rev. Horace Jones commenced his labors, in May, 1827. He remained until 1830, when Rev. Charles H. Hubbard was called, and served until 1834. Mr. Robert C. Brisbane, a licentiate, supplied the pulpit for a time during Mr. Hubbard's absence.

In 1832 a new church edifice was erected, and was dedicated on the 7th of November. Mr. Hubbard resigned in February, 1834, and there was no stated preaching until April, 1835, when Rev. Junito Bixby was chosen for the fourth pastor. In December, 1836, while visiting some friends in Susquehanna County, he died suddenly and once more the pulpit was vacant. During the interim of nine months John T. Mitchell, a licentiate, supplied the charge, and in November, 1837, Rev. Joseph Currin was called. His pastoral relation lasted until April, 1839, and at this time the membership had increased to eighty.

Rev. Henry Curtis commenced his labors, as the sixth pastor, in May, 1839, dividing his work between Damascus and Bethany. During his pastorate much work was done in settlements adjacent and the foundations of other congregations were laid. Under his ministrations a church was organized at Callicoon, N. Y., with twenty-one members, chiefly dismissed from the Damascus Church. Mr. Curtis resigned in February, 1849, leaving the church with one hundred communicants.

Rev. John T. Mitchell was then engaged for six months as stated supply, and was followed by William C. Ulyat, a licentiate, who supplied the desk for eight or ten weeks. Mr. Mitchell was then employed again, until Rev. Truman O. Judd became the seventh pastor.

The Baptist Church of West Damascus was constituted during his pastorate. Mr. Judd resigned his pastorate and retired from the association in May, 1852, being followed by Rev. Andrew Hopper, who served until 1854. Rev. John C. Shearman was his successor, and supplied the church once in two weeks up to 1855, when his entire services were secured. Abijah M. Calkin, who had been for many years a member of the Presbyterian Church, offered himself at a covenant-meeting about this time, and was baptized. Subsequently he was ordained to the Baptist ministry, and, in 1857, succeeded Mr. Shearman as pastor.

During the year 1855 the congregation, which had become a most prosperous one, purchased a lot on the west bank of the Delaware, a few rods below the church, and erected a tasteful parsonage. A great revival took place in 1856, after a series of meetings lasting for ninety days, and the membership was swelled to one hundred and thirty. In the year 1857 the semi-centennial celebration of the Abington Baptist Association was held in this church.

Mr. Calkin remained pastor of the church until November, 1866, "beloved by all." The pulpit was then supplied by T. F. Smith for a month, commencing October, 1867, and then he was ordained and received a unanimous call.

In July, 1877, delegates were appointed to a convention called at Port Jervis for the purpose of considering the formation of a new association on the line of the Erie Railroad; and in August of the same year the church withdrew from the Abington Association and joined the new organization. During this year the congregation purchased additional land for a burying-ground, at a cost of one thousand dollars. Mr. Smith's pastorate closed in April, 1873, and, after an interval of a year, Rev. Walter Gallant began his labors, April 12, 1874. During the interval that elapsed between these two pastorates the church edifice was rebuilt and refurnished at a cost of six thousand dollars. It was dedicated June 2, 1874, the services being participated in by the following ministers: Rev. J. R. Remsen, Aldenville, Pa.; Rev. William McKinney, Port Jervis, N. Y.; Rev. J. R. Angel, Damascus; Rev. W. P. Hellings, Scranton; Rev. E. M. Blanchard, Addison, N. Y. Mr. Gallant resigned in December, 1875, and in May, 1876, was succeeded by Rev. I. N. Earl. In October, 1874, the church withdrew from "The Orange and Sullivan Association." The labors of Mr. Earl closed the following April, and in September, Rev. J. A. Bakewell was called, serving until April 1, 1880. F. H. Cooper supplied the pulpit the following summer, during which the church resolved to ask admission into "The Wayne Baptist Association," which received it August 25, 1880. Rev. S. N. Wescott became pastor the next October, and continued to serve until 1882, and was succeeded by Rev. C. H. Fitzwilliam, the present pastor, October 14, 1883.

The Second Damascus Baptist Church was an offshoot from the First Church, and was composed originally of persons who lived chiefly in adjacent neighborhoods situated some six miles from the village meeting-house. For some years prior to the separation of the two congregations Rev. J. T. Mitchell had been stated supply, holding service in the neighborhood school-house. The nucleus thus formed was soon strong enough to have an independent existence, and, on December 19, 1851, at a council composed of brethren from the churches of Clinton, Callicoon, Honesdale and Lebanon, letters of dismission were granted to eleven persons,—seven males and four females. The sermon of recognition was preached by Rev. Henry Curtis. The infant church chose Rev. John T. Mitchell for its pastor, and he served acceptably until his death, which took place in the summer of 1856. He was immediately succeeded by Mr. John H. Dodge, a licentiate, and also one of the constituent members of the church, who acted as stated supply. He had served the church prior to this time, having occupied the pulpit in the autumn of 1852, during which time the regular pastor and most of his family were prostrated by severe illness. An interesting Sabbath-school and Bible-class were sustained, and the church was active in benevolent work of every kind. In October, 1857, Rev. Newell Callender was called, and, soon after his acceptance, commenced a series of protracted meetings in which he was assisted by Rev. E. A. Harris. At the close of these, forty-nine were baptized and admitted on profession of faith, and the church was much strengthened.

The Damascus Methodist Episcopal Church.—The Damascus Circuit was organized in 1831, and the ministers, until 1843, were from the New York Conference. The first class was organized at Milanville, and was led by John Tyler. Other appointments during the early history of the circuit were at St. Tammany, Galilee and Conklin Hill.

The early records of the circuit are quite deficient, and the following list, though containing the names of all the pastors that could be obtained, is necessarily incomplete. They were Reverends Law, Silliman, Faulkerson, Smith, Webster, Hibberd, Barns, Ferris and Perkins.

Some of the most prominent members of the church during the early history of the circuit were Geo. Bush, Judge Tyler, Jesse Bush, Benjamin Tyler, Calvin Tyler, Joseph Sutliff.

Until 1857 the respective classes worshipped in a Union Church, at Cochecton. During that year the Methodists withdrew, selling their interest to the Presbyterians, and built a church in Damascus village, on the site now occupied by the present edifice. This was during the pastorate of Rev. E. W. Breckenridge. The first cost of the church was one thousand six hundred and five dollars. In 1874 during the pastorate of Rev. J. R. Angel, the church was rebuilt, at a cost of about six thousand dollars. The parsonage was built by Rev. N. S. Reynolds.

The following, in the order named, have served the charge since the building of the church in 1859: Reverends E. W. Breckenridge, C. White, M. Swallow, D. Williams, S. Barner, J. L. Rase, P. D. Clark, N. S. Reynolds, J. Underwood, J. R. Angel, R. J. Kellogg, M. D. Fuller, A. W. Cooper, A. W. Loomis and A. C. Oliver.

The Presbyterian Church of Cochecton, though located in New York State, is supported largely by residents of Damascus township, with which its history is closely identified. The society to which it belongs was organized on March 9, 1812, in the school-house at "Cochecton Settlement," by the election of Oliver

H. Calkins, Simeon Bush, Moses Calkin, John Conklin, Elias Conklin and Ebenezer Witter as trustees, Ebenezer Witter and Bezaleel Calkin presiding at the meeting. In August following, Rev. Charles Cummins, of Florida, N. Y., preached at Cochecton, and admitted to church membership the following persons: Simeon Bush, John Conklin, Elias Conklin, Ebenezer Witter, Hannah Bush, Molly Skinner, Charlotte Conklin, Jane Tyler, Hannah Jones, Martha P. Richards, Eleanor Taylor, Hannah Witter, Hulda Conklin, Eleanor Bush and Elizabeth Brown, and the organization of the church was completed by the selection of Ebenezer Witter, Simeon Bush and John Conklin as ruling elders, and Ebenezer Witter and Simeon Bush as deacons.

The archives of the church covering the period previous to 1840 have not been preserved, Only the names of a few of the early pastors have been preserved. Among those who ministered to the infant church were Revs. Charles Cummins, Benjamin Van Keuren and James Petrie. At a meeting held on the 8th of March, 1839—presided over by Moses Calkin and George Bush—Moses Calkin, Jarad Irvine, Alexander A. Irvine, James C. Curtis, Charles Young, Nathan Skinner, Charles Drake, George Bush and Walter S. Vail were appointed trustees of an organization known as "The Presbyterian and Methodist Episcopal Society of the Town of Cochecton;" and a subscription paper to raise a building fund was started. The necessary amount was soon pledged, and, on May 6th, Moses Calkins deeded the church lot to the trustees for two dollars. The deed contained a proviso according the Presbyterians the right of buying out the Methodists at the expiration of ten years, by paying what had been contributed by the latter denomination. The contract for the church edifice was signed in June of the same year, and the building completed, at a cost of fifteen hundred dollars, on January 28, 1840, the dedication taking place on the 20th of the following month. It was afterwards determined by the trustees that the building should be occupied by the Presbyterians and Methodists every alternate week, and that it might be opened to other evangelical denominations when the owners were not using it; but that it should not be "occupied by any denomination for the purpose of preaching or lecturing on the abolition of negro slavery, or the formation of any society connected with abolition in its present and popular sense."

On the 29th of April, 1855, the Presbyterian portion of the society reorganized as "The First Presbyterian Church and Congregation of Cochecton, in connection with the General Assembly of the Old School Presbyterian Church of the United States of America." Walter S. Wail, Charles Irvine, Robert T. Parsons, William McCullough, Ellery T. Calkin and James C. Curtis were chosen trustees, and during the ensuing twelve months the title of the Methodist element was extinguished, and the building became the exclusive property of the Presbyterians. Subsequently it was improved, furnished with a bell and organ and other conveniences for worship. The clergymen who have served the church as pastors and as stated supplies are as follows: George K. McEwen, from 1840 to 1841; William Riddle, 1842 to 1843; John Mole, 1845 to 1847; William Hunting, 1851; G. K. Mariner, 1852 and 1853; Thomas Mack, 1853 to 1859; Erastus Seymour, 1860 to 1864; Theron Brittain, 1864 to 1875. In 1876 Rev. George E. Northrop took the charge, and, in 1880, was succeeded by Rev. Samuel Murdoch, the present pastor.

The following persons have served as elders in the church: Ebenezer Witter, Simeon Bush, James Jackson, Hiram Dibble, Moses Calkin, Robert T. Parsons, James McArthur, Abijah M. Calkin, Ezra F. Calkin and Silas C. Beckwith. On the 5th of September, 1857, nineteen members were dismissed from this church to form the First Presbyterian Church of Damascus, mentioned elsewhere. The church is now in a prosperous condition.

The Cochecton Bridge Company.—In the early part of the present century the question of a toll bridge over the Delaware River between Damascus and Cochecton was much agitated, and, in 1817, a sixty years' charter was granted to the Cochecton Bridge Company, in which the following incorporators are mentioned: William Tyler, Benjamin Conklin, Moses Thomas, Moses Calkins, Oliver H. Calkins, Joseph Mitchell and William Brown. The first commissioners (now called directors) were William Brown, Benjamin Conklin, John Conklin, Oliver H. Calkins and Francis Crawford. Two years later, in 1819, the first bridge was built by Major Wheat. It had but one pier, and was so unsubstantial in its construction that it was never used, and fell of its own weight soon after completion. Its collapse does not seem to have shaken the faith of the stockholders in Major Wheat, however, for in the spring of 1820 he moved to Cochecton and commenced work on another bridge, with two piers, Garrett Tymerson having charge of the carpenter work. This was completed in 1821, and the bridge company having complied with the terms of the charter, became regularly incorporated and secured a toll franchise. James Jackson, who was the first secretary and treasurer, paid the first dividend of two dollars a share, which was declared June 1, 1827. This "Wheat Bridge," as it was always called, stood until the spring of 1846, when the western pier was undermined during the high water, and fell, together with the Pennsylvania and middle spans. A charter for a ferry was at once obtained, and as soon as a scow could be built, Albert Smith was employed as ferryman. Subsequently the ferry was leased by Thomas O'Reilly, who managed it for some time; afterwards it came again into the hands of the bridge company, and Lukins Brush was in charge.

A contract for a new bridge was made with Thayer & Benton, of Springfield, Mass., in the spring of 1848, the price to be ten thousand dollars, of which seven thousand five hundred dollars was to be paid in cash, and the balance to be in bridge stock. An assessment of fifty per cent. was made to meet the cash payment, and soon after the work was commenced the contractors failed, and made an assignment of the material on hand to the company. Joel C. Benton was employed to complete the bridge, and it was opened for travel in the winter of 1847–48. During the next spring this bridge also collapsed from structural weakness, and the New York span fell to the shore, but was not carried away. Soon afterward, the New York pier was rebuilt, and a new span was put in place by the company, which seemed to have had enough of contracts, and hired its men by the day, putting Elihu S. Page in charge of the work. This bridge, which had three piers, was opened in the winter of 1849–50. More trouble occurred in the spring of 1851, when the Pennsylvania span of the Benton bridge, which had been retained in rebuilding, fell of its own weight, and was carried away. Recourse to the ferry was once more had, and Bateman S. Mitchell took the helm. No move was made until 1854, when Webster Sutliff and Edward Bloomfield built the present Pennsylvania pier, using the material of the old middle pier, and swinging the stones across by means of an immense derrick. A contract was also made with Solon Chapin, of Easton, for building the two western spans, the eastern span, built by the company, being still standing. This bridge was opened in 1854, and stood until the great flood of 1857, when the whole valley of the Delaware was swept by a fearful freshet. The ice, which had been unusually thick, gorged at Cochecton Falls, and piled up to such a height that the bridge was lifted from the piers, and carried off when the gorge went out.

Once more Ferryman Mitchell and his flatboat did duty, a wire-rope ferry being improvised. Meanwhile steps were taken to secure another bridge. Many of the stockholders had tired of the continual assessments to which they had been subjected, and agreed to assign their stock to those who were still willing to make further investment, provided a new bridge was opened for traffic within two years from November, 1858. Captain Eli Beach, who was a moving spirit in the project, secured this pledged stock, after some difficulty, and a contract was made with Solon Chapin to complete the present bridge by the 1st of February, 1859. The terms were complied with, and the present structure, which is higher than any of its predecessors, was opened in due time. Since then it has but once given any trouble; that was in 1872, when it was discovered that the middle span had settled somewhat, but the necessary repairs were made without interrupting travel.

GALILEE, which lies in the northern part of the township, was settled later than the middle and southern portions, the pioneers here being the Conklins, Tylers and Keeslers of the second generation, and the Sutliffs, Rutledges and others. Already there is the nucleus of a fine village, with a church, post-office, smith, wheelwright-shop, a Grange hall and several stores and other buildings. The first post-office was established here in 1848, with Philip P. Brigham as postmaster. He served until 1869, when Joseph Sutliff succeeded him, and held office until 1871, when the post-office was abolished. Its re-establishment took place in July, 1884, and David W. Berry, the present incumbent was appointed postmaster. The mail is tri-weekly.

A Methodist Episcopal Class was established in Galilee in 1840, with Joseph Sutliff as the first leader. The first members enrolled were Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Brigham, Mr. and Mrs. David Sutliff, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Brigham, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Sutliff and Mr. and Mrs. Calvin Marks. About this time regular preaching was commenced, the supply being from the Beach Pond Circuit. The pastors who have served the congregation, with the order of their succession, are as follows: Rev. William Silsby, Rev. Barnes, George Porter, Charles Perkins, —— Young, —— Ferris, Erastus Smith, Morris Carrie, E. W. Breckenridge, Minor Swallow, Silas Barner, David Williams, Peter Clark, Charles White, C. E. Taylor, James Race, N. S. Reynolds, James Underwood, Joseph Angel, M. D. Fuller, A. W. Cooper, A. W. Loomis. In 1876 a church edifice, which cost about two thousand dollars, was erected, the fund being raised by subscription, and service is held there regularly, twice in three weeks. There is also a flourishing Sunday-school.

The early settlers about Galilee included some of the families concerning whom details have already been given. Webster Sutliff, seems to have been one of the first to make any industrial improvements. He built a saw-mill on Galilee Brook, about 1825–26, the same one that is now owned by Joseph Sutliff.

The latter located in Galilee about 1835, and had six children. They were Polly (Mrs. Simeon Bush); Susan, the wife of James Monnington; Catherine, the wife of Albert Burton; Joseph R.; Emily, the wife of L. F. Tyler; and Anna V. (Mrs. Henry Hendricks).

David Sutliff came from New York about 1830, and settled on the Galilee and Damascus road, on the place he still occupies. His children are Joseph S., Hiram B., Olive (Mrs. D. W. Berry), Lyman K., Martha (Mrs. G. O. Hitchcock) and Mary (wife of George Wilmer).

Hiram Brigham was an early settler who came from New York State. George is his only surviving child.

Philip Brigham, a brother of Hiram, came from Oswego County in 1835, bringing with him a wife and child. His sons are James, A. S. and Orin W. Brigham, and Virgil, who was taken prisoner at Deep Bottom, and died within the Confederate lines. The only daughter is Francis, the wife of Julius Keesler. In 1883, Philip P. Brigham and David Sutliff both celebrated their golden weddings, within two months of each other.

Calvin Marks, a son of Jacob Marks, of Conklin Hill, settled near Hiram Brigham. He had several sons, two of whom were killed in the Civil War. One son, Horace, still survives. The Wilcoxes were also early settlers, but all of the family are now dead or have moved elsewhere.

PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY. — Damascus Grange, No. 405, Patrons of Husbandry, was organized at Galilee in December, 1874, with the following officers: Master, Horatio Hadsall; Overseer, Benjamin Lewis; Lecturer, Walter J. Bush; Secretary, Sophia E. Brigham; Steward, Albert Marks; Assistant Steward, Frank Bush; Chaplain, Philip P. Brigham; Gate-Keeper, Aaron S. Brigham; Ceres, S. V. Brigham; Flora, Sophia E. Bush; Pomona, Mary E. Keesler; Lady Assistant, Amanda Marks. The present membership of the Grange is about forty.

TYLER HILL is a pleasant village about three miles west of Damascus, which owes its first importance to the enterprise of Israel Tyler, who built a saw-mill on Woodruff Brook many years ago. In 1852, M. F. Van Kirk, now of Honesdale, who had been running an umbrella stick factory at Seelyville, moved his machinery to Tyler Hill and located near the saw-mill, which had then fallen into decay. He erected a substantial building to be used as the stick factory, and also rebuilt the saw-mill, which he used in getting out his lumber. He remained there for five years and then sold out to Tenyck Dupuy, who operated the business until 1872, when it was bought by Israel Tyler. The latter gentleman had built a grist-mill on the site of the old saw-mill, in 1857–58, that had added much to the business of the place. The mill has three run of stone driven by an overshot wheel with eleven feet radius, and runs on custom-work. Mr. Tyler also added a planing-mill to the saw-mill plant and otherwise improved the business, which was run in connection with his store at the village.

The store was started by William Fortnam in 1848, and was sold to John Mills and W. W. Tyler two years later. After a short time Israel Tyler secured Mills' interest. Mr. Fortnam built a new store a little farther up the village about this time, and shortly afterward it was bought up by Mr. Tyler. At the latter's death, his sons, M. and L. D. Tyler, succeeded to the business. They have since erected a fine store-room.

In 1875 a post-office was established at Tyler Hill, and William Fortnam was appointed the postmaster, which office he still occupies. The village has several shops and other conveniences, and preaching is occasionally held there in the school-house, although there is no organized congregation. Several of the residences are quite handsome, and all of the buildings display excellent taste.

Darbytown takes its name from N. S. Darby, who ran a tannery there for many years. The business was commenced by Charles and Webb Horton and George Knapp, who built the tannery in 1851–52, and ran it under the style of Horton & Co. for a few years. This firm also ran a store in connection with their business. They afterwards sold out to Mr. Darby, who operated the tannery until 1876, when the supply of bark in the neighborhood was about exhausted. There is nothing done in the place at present.

Branningville.—There is a pleasant and thickly-settled neighborhood about Branningville, which takes its name from John D. Branning, who built a mill there in 1860. As early as 1830, David Guinnip came from Narrowsburg and took up a tract of wild land there. In 1832 he built a saw-mill and commenced clearing up the fine timber lands that shut in the brook. At this time his nearest neighbors were the Calkinses, and most of the region for several miles around was densely covered with hemlock. The good price that lumber then commanded, and the ready market for bark afforded by the tannery, twenty years later led to the rapid improvement of the lands, and the vicinity contained some of the best farms in the county.

The grist-mill which Mr. Branning built is now in the hands of O. R. Packer, and does a good custom business. It has three run of stone and is driven by an overshot wheel with arms of ten feet radius. A store was formerly run in connection with the mill, but this has been abandoned during the past few years. In February of the present year a post-office, known as Atco, was established, and O. R. Packer was appointed postmaster. There is a prosperous school there, and twice a month preaching is supplied from charges of the various denominations at Narrowsburg.

Boyd's Mills.—The settlement in the vicinity of this hamlet owes its existence chiefly to some mills that were built a short distance apart, some forty years ago. In 1843, Truman S. Tymmerson and Hiram Willis erected a saw-mill which was known as "Tymmerson's Mill." It was operated by its founders until 1867, when Joseph Wood and Thomas Y. Boyd bought out the business and rebuilt the mill, with steam as a motive-power, shortly after. Mr. Wood died in 1877, and his partner succeeded to the business, which has largely increased under his judicious management. The present capacity of the mill is about twenty-five thousand feet per day, and a dozen men are employed at the works.

The post-office, which was then Eldred, was established in 1837, with James Smith as the first postmaster. He served until 1846, and was succeeded by William Hartwell. The latter gave place to Willis Sherwood in 1850, and, two years later, Thomas Y. Boyd was appointed and served until 1865. He was followed by John Comfort and Henry J. Loundsberry, who each had the office for one year, and in 1867, William H. Tegler came in, remaining until 1869. Mr. Boyd was then reappointed and held office until September, 1874, when he gave place to John Orr, who served until June, 1882. During his term the name of the office was changed from Eldred to Boyd's Mills. Mr. Boyd was reappointed in 1882; C. P. Tegler, the present incumbent, in 1885.

In 1881 a grist-mill with one run of stone was built by Mr. Boyd, who also conducts a store and several other branches of business. In 1836 John Leonard built a saw and cider-mill on the north branch of Calkins' Creek, and operated it for ten years. It was then sold to Captain Eli Beach, and in 1850 passed into the hands of Wood & Boyd. In 1859 Isaac Lovelass purchased a half-interest, and acquired the entire ownership in 1880. William Crocker has a blacksmith and wagon factory near this mill.

The first store was established by Comfort & Godfrey, in the spring of 1858, in a building which stood on the site of the one now occupied by the commodious establishment of ex-County Commissioner C. P. Tegler.

Jabez Stearns, a son of Joseph Stearns, who was one of the earliest settlers in Mount Pleasant, took up a tract of land on the north side of the north branch of Calkins' Creek in the early part of this century. Under great disadvantages he succeeded in obtaining a good education, and afterward devoted his energies to giving the same great boon to his children. There were six of these,—viz., David W., Polly, Harriett E., Laurette, Irene and Francis. Several of them afterward became identified with the educational interests of that and other sections of the county.

William Hartwell moved from Hartford, Conn., in 1830, and settled about one mile north of Boyd's Mills. He was prominent both as the postmaster of the hamlet for several years and as an active citizen. He died quite suddenly in 1880. Mr. Hartwell was a county commissioner at the time of his death, and had been an energetic man who made his influence felt throughout the whole region. His finely-improved farm is now occupied by his son-in-law, J. S. Burcher.

On the farm of D. W. Wilcox, another of the pioneers of this section of the township, is the largest elm-tree in the county. Its height was, before it was prostrated by a severe storm on the 27th of June, 1876, one hundred and twenty-six feet; its breadth at the top, eighty feet; its circumference, three feet from the ground, twenty-four feet eight inches. A portion of the tree was hollow, and after it blew down much honey was found in the cavities. The trunk still remains where it fell, and bids fair to last a century.

Stephen Wood, who came from the eastern part of Connecticut, located near Eldred in 1837, and was an active pioneer. Joseph Wood, his son, is widely known as a leading lumberman, and was a member of the firm of Wood & Boyd.

Hiram Willis and Truman Tymmerson came in about 1843, and took up lands here. Soon afterwards Tymmerson built the saw-mill, which gave the first name to the locality. Both have since moved to New York State.

James Smith settled near what was afterwards Tymmerson's Mills, in 1824, and, after clearing up a farm, went into the lumber business and erected a saw-mill in 1840, and became prominent in the early developments of the place. He died in 1858.

Loring P. Smith, a son of James, is extensively engaged in dairying and fruit-growing, and has an improved ridge-farm, a part of which he devotes to wool-growing, at which he has been very successful. He was probably the first male child born in the vicinity.

Lewis Crocker came to this locality in 1858, and engaged in blacksmithing. He also cleared up a farm, in the centre of which stands the Union Church. Mr. Crocker died in 1873, and his farm is now controlled by his son, Thomas J. Crocker, who is one of the most extensive horticulturists in the locality. His orchards contain all the leading varieties of fruit that will grow in this region, and he has done much to interest others in this profitable branch of farming. William H. Crocker, another son of Lewis, is also engaged in fruit-culture, as well as wool and stock-raising and dairying; and William Eighney also gives much attention to these pursuits.

John Burcher, who, in his eightieth year, is still bright and active, settled here in 1820, and has reared a family of considerable size. Three of his sons—William, James and Titus—are now deceased, while John and Joseph occupy farms near by.

Among the other prominent settlers were Alexander Roger, in 1833; Levi Little, in 1836; Miles Sherwood, in 1838; Alva Noble, in 1834; David Orr, in 1855; and many others.

The Union Church at Eldred was erected in 1854, at a cost of about twenty-five hundred dollars, most of which fund was raised by subscription, so that there is little or no debt on the edifice. It is used, jointly, by three congregations,—the Presbyterian, the Methodist and the Baptist,—though there is no regular organization of the latter faith. In connection with the church there is a well-kept cemetery, which, like the edifice, is used by all denominations.

As early as 1842 there was a Presbyterian organization at Eldred, and, although it was not a special church, there was preaching every second or third Sunday, the pulpit being supplied from the Presbyterian Church at Cochecton, of which the congregation was then a branch. In September, 1857, Rev. Thomas Mack presided at a meeting which perfected the organization of the Presbyterian Church of Damascus. At that meeting James McArthur, Hiram Willis, John Orr and William McArthur were made ruling elders, and the following members were enrolled: James McArthur and Agnes, his wife, Margaret McArthur, Claudius McIntyre, Jane McIntyre, William McArthur and Nancy, his wife, Alexander McArthur and Ann, his wife, Hiram Willis and Eleanor, his wife, Caroline E. Pelton, John Lovelass, John Orr, James Orr and Catherine, his wife, Ann Lovelass, Eliza Orr and William Lovelass.
